M A J E S T Y.

SIR,

Although the quality of this work be truly such, that, considering the brightnesse of Royal Majesty, and the obscurity of its own extraction, it cannot expect a bare acceptance, much lesse plead any merit in this addresse, yet doth it find more reason for hope than despair; for as much as the whole World hath taken notice that your Majesty's Grace and Clemency is founded more upon the transcendent goodnesse of your own Disposition than the qualifications of your Subjects. Allowance hereby being made for what is mine, it were needlesse to insist upon the Nobility and usefulness of the subject, the excellency whereof as humane transcendeth not your Orb, and the utmost improvement of which is within the sphere of your activity. It were a piece of pedantry to shew to your Majesty that History is the store-house whence ~~Precedents~~ may be fetched for all sorts of Actions, Publick and Private, Military and Civil; that it is a Mirrour of prudence to shew both their beauty and deformity, a Touchstone to discover deceits, an incentive to virtue, and a terror unto vice; that in it are contained the Prudence of times, imbecillity and strength of Nations, Reasons of State, Councils of Peace, and Stratagems of War; that in it Monarchy triumpheth over the Confusions, Alterations, and Seditions of Popular Government. And should I go about to instance in the various helps it affoordeth to the management of Civil matters, I might justly incurre more than the censure that light upon him, who was so impertinent as to read a Lecture of the Art of a General in the presence of Hannibal. For it may justly be said that your Majesty hath improved History to the utmost ; that your actions have so far imitated antient Patterns as to exceed them. Others have wasted and destroyed Nations, you have recovered and restored three dying ones. Others have raged with fire and sword, have rooted out, overturned, and made desolate ; your Majesty by Mercy and Grace hath replanted, settled, and enriched. Alexander Conquered the effeminate Persians, and subdued other Nations whom their own unfitness for Military matters helped him to overcome. Cæsar tamed the naked Galls, and painted Britains, whom fool-hardiness and barbarism had armed against themselves ; or if there be any other Atchievements of them, or others, which seem more glorious, yet the valour of their Soldiers, the experience of their times, and vicissitude of humane affairs, challenge to themselves the greatest share of reputation. Your Majesty hath subdued those things which are beyond Mars his reach: You have tamed wild and extravagant passions of men, Conquered stubborn and perverse dispositions, laid low prejudice, and convinced such, whom all these distempers had rendered affectedly ignorant and disobedient. Your Majesty's Conquests therefore so much more excell the commendations of others, as it is more glorious to cure than kill, to restore than to destroy, to follow the dictates of Compassion and Mercy, then of indignation and revenge, to Conquer the mind than the body ; and indeed to overcome one's self than subdue others. That this is no flattery History will ascertain future times, and both the mouths and hearts of your People at present do testifie, which, though in other matters they may disagree, yet all unite in this consent, that you are the True Father of your Countrey. In our acclamations during those solemnities of your Majesty's Royal Coronation, seeing there is no need of wishing you the Goodness of Trajan, we so much the more pray that the Happinesse of Augustus may light upon you, and that those solemnities may in one part imitate the Sæcular ones amongst the Romans, that though some of us have heretofore seen the like, yet through the length of your happy reign none of us may do it for the time to come. I for my part, though a vvel-wisher to History, unfeignedly desire, that not till after very many years so great an accession of glory may come to it, as will accrue from the passages of your Majesty's Government ; and that in the mean time your Majesty may be as happy in the love and loyalty of your People, as they are in your Princely clemency and care. To this, both a sense of merit and duty binds me, being subject and servant,

Your Majesties most loyal, and most humble

Will. Howel.

P R E F A C E.

THe French (who first Introduced this custom into the World of writing Prefaces before the works of others) have used that liberty with so much excess in the commendation of their friends, that they have rendered it not onely suspected to the Reader, but prejudicial to their rep^{te} whom they intended to honour by it. But as I cannot approve the indiscreet zeal of those persons that would rather abrogate a good Office when abus'd, than endeavour to reform it, I would neither wave an employment which gave me the occasion of hinting to the Reader some such things as may be of concernment to him in the perusal of this work, and which the modesty of the Author would not permit him to communicate, neither on the other side would I willingly recede from the strictness and severity of truth. So that whatsoever shall fall from me to his advantage shall not need any favourable construction to make it passe, nor shall I take that freedom to mix fiction and History together: The use of this latter is so obvious to every eye, that it is needlesse to speak much of it, it shall suffice me in short to say, that by the knowledge of History we are taught wisdom, and led to vertue, there being nothing in the Actions or Fortunes, either of publick or private persons, to which somewhat in former Ages bore not a resemblance, and which by a due consideration of the circumstances we may not with profit apply to our present occasions. How much we are excited to virtue by it, they that know the power of Emulation in noble minds will easily conclude: which is manifest by the famous examples of Themistocles, whom the victories of Miltyades robbed of his repose, of Alexander, who was stirred up to the desire of glory by reading the actions of Achilles, as Caesar by reflecting upon his; add to this, that such persons whom these Precedents of vertue will not encourage to it, are aw'd by History from running headlong into vice, when they cannot but look on the writers of the present Age to be set as spies upon their Actions, and must expect when they are dead to be exposed without fear or flattery to the Impartial censure of the living. For who is there that would

would so much value the pleasure of a glasse of Wine, as not to abstain from drinking it, if he knew it had been all night steep'd in Antimony.

These, besides many others, are the benefits which accrue to us by the knowledge of History in general, but that I may inform the World how much it is acknowledging to the worthy Author of this Institution in particular, and wherein those excellencies of his consist, which distinguish him from the ordinary crowd of Historians, Ut possit digito monstrari & dicier hic est, I must take leave to insist upon these ensuing heads, wherein I shall plainly make appear to the equal and candid Reader, that History is reduced by him in this work to such order, and exact Method, as never yet in any Language.

For, first you have here all the Empires in distinct Chapters by themselves, with the Contemporaries of them distinguished in the same manner from each other, and from the Empire to which they were Coætaneous. Whereas both in Systems and in larger Volumes of General History they are mingled together with a strange confusion, like the several ingredients of an Olio in the same Dish, where the variety of the Meats destroy the taste of one another, and he that would read any History by it self, finds it immediately embroyld and interwoven with the affairs of other Nations, so that he will not easily form a perfect Idea in his mind of that which is given him but in parcels.

In the next place this Author has furnished you with a general Description of Greece, its antient Kingdoms and Commonwealths, from their first Originals, the successions of Kings, changes of Government, and forms of the several Republicks, with the power and nature of their respective Magistrates and Officers, not omitting the most considerable Customs, Laws, and Antiquities of each of them, deduced from the best Historians, whom you still find quoted in the Margent; this, as it hath never been intirely performed by any Author heretofore, so ought it to set a peculiar mark of Honor upon ours, who hath been carefull to give us an exact account of that Countrey, which was the Mother of Arts and Sciences.

After this, if we will turn our eyes upon the Macedonian Empire, and the several parts and branches of it, as the Kingdoms of Syria, of Macedon, and Egypt, we shall still have greater occasion to admire the learn'd diligence of the Author. The Græcian Monarchy after the decease of Alexander not being more dismembred and rent in pieces by his Successors, than by those Writers who have transmitted the memory of it to posterity, particularly, the Asian and Egyptian Kingdoms under the Seleucidæ and Ptolomies have never been compiled in one History, and I have often wondred in my perusal of this Institution, by what means the Author of it could arrive at so clear a knowledge of those perplex'd successions, it was certainly a work of great labour to compare Historians, and to weave these several Arguments and loose pieces into one entire Loom, which I the rather mind the Reader of, because it is not easily perceiv'd by every ordinary capacity, for the uniformity of the style, and the unbroken order of the whole is such, that they onely who are conversant in Antiquities are able to judge what travel and study were required to it.

The Roman History next invites our observation; wherein the successe of this Author hath sufficiently recompenced his worthy pains: I dare confidently affirm, No modern Pen hath yet carried it on with so great light from the Original of the Citie to the time of Constantine. For from the banishment of Tarquin to the new modeling of the Government by Augustus, you have all the Intermediate Changes, Alterations, and Seditions of it, while yet a State, as the contests of the Patricians and Commons, with the several motives of them, The displacing and restoring of Annual Magistrates, the Description of their Offices, the Rites and Ceremonies of their Religion; all collected with great diligence from the Fathers of Roman History, but never given us in one body by antient Authors, or by any of later dayes. I confesse I have read a French Historian, who from the reign of Augustus almost to that of Justinian hath given me the greatest satisfaction of any man; Yet he often amuseth himself (as some of our bad Chroniclers at home have done) with passages of small concernment, & below the Dignity of an Historian to relate: and from the Foundation of the Citie to Augustus, pays his Readers with a bare Translation of Florus. Sr. Walter Rawleigh (never to be mentioned without honour) concludes his History with the end of the Macedonian War, and the conversion of that Kingdom into a Roman Province: much about the same time we are forsaken by our best Guide Livy, whose Decads from the Captivity of Perseus to the time of Octavius Caesar (whose Contemporary he was) are wholly lost: for in the conclusion of his 45th Book (the last which is left us) he introduces King Prusias speaking to the Romans, whom he came to visit, in these words; Deos qui urbem Romam incoherent Senatūque & Populum Romanum salutatum se venisse, & gratulatum quod Persea Gentiumque Reges vicissent, Macedonibusque & Illyriis in Ditionem redactis, auxissent Imperium. But as this Author hath supplied the Defects of Livy, and continued the Roman History five hundred years beyond Sir W. Rawleigh, so in the alteration of the Government from a Commonwealth to a Monarchy by Augustus, the reasons which induced the Emperour to make that change, the manner how, and the form of it, are delivered with so great care, and describ'd with so much life, That I could not but take a particular notice of it; and (with the civility of those that carve to others where themselves best like) invite the Reader to a more exact observation of that which hath given me so great contentment.

Neither

Neither hath he deserved lesse of Christian than prophane History : for from the Primitive times till Constantine the Great he hath deduced the Successions of Bishops in the principal Sees, with the practice of the Christians, and a faithfull relation of their sufferings in all the persecutions.

For what concerns our own Island, I think he hath perform'd the part of a true English-man, and a lover of his Countrey : for he hath vindicated the Antiquity of its first Discovery by the Phœnicians, and that not onely by the probable reasons alleged by that great person Bochartus for the Etymology of the word Britannia, but by other indeniable, and convincing circumstances, which as it redounds to the honour of our Nation, so reflects a part of that glory to our Author.

One particular of no slight consequence I had almost omitted : That as the Reader may without any intervening matters impertinent to his present purpose read the History of any Empire, or Kingdom Contemporary to it, by it self, so he may likewise observe that the principal passages in all of them are linck'd together by Synchronisms, not onely placed in the Margent, but in the beginning or end of every notable Occurrence.

Thus I have briefly, and with much sincerity couch'd together some of those Excellencies, which amongst many others I have observed in this Institution of History : of which if I may presume to give my private opinion, (though I am conscious to my self how little it ought to signifie to the World) I think the work taken all together is for the order of it handsomly and judiciously contrived, for its style perspicuous, and for the learning in the severall parts of History, Antiquity, and Chronology, uncommon. Those who desire a greater politenesse in the style may consider, that the florid way of writing, which hath undeservedly acquired so great a name to some of our own Age and Nation, is nothing proper to an Historian, and that our Author busied himself in matters more serious, and of greater use, he chose rather the plain but comely strength of the Dorique Pillar, than the Effeminate, though curious shape of the Corinthian. For my own part, I confesse that plainnesse and unaffected simplicity is pleasing to me : and I think no Intelligent Person that goes upon businesse, will leap Hedges out of the open and direct Road, to Travel over Flowry Fields, or painted Meadows.

CHAP. I.

From the beginning of the World, to the beginning of the first Empire.

IN the beginning God created the Heaven and the Earth. By Faith we understand that they were framed by his Word, so that things which are seen, were not made of things which do appear.

2. Mns habitation being made and conveniently furnished the sixth day; then (and not till then) was he made of the dust of the Earth, and God breathing into his nostrils the breath of life, he became a living Soul. Being placed in the Garden of Eden; and a meet help wanting to him, Eve was framed of one of his ribs. Of all the Trees of the Garden, except that of the knowledge of Good and Evil, they might safely eat; and at such time as they should eat it, they were surely to dye. But the Serpent beguiled the woman, who did eat thereof; and giving to her Husband, he also did eat. Hereby they rendred themselves guilty of remporall and eternall death; they were condemned to labour and sorrow; and those not confined to their own persons, but extended to their whole posterity, involved with them in the same guilt: the demonstrating whereof might seem the Scope of this present Work; nothing having succeeded but vanity and vexation of spirit: nothing but labour and travail under the Sun.

wife Cain and Abel; though in what years is not expressed. Abel was a Keeper of Sheep, and Cain a Tiller of the Ground. By Faith, Abel offered to God a more excellent sacrifice than Cain, by which he obtained witness that he was righteous, and contracted such envy, that his Brother slew him in the field. The voice of his blood cryed to God from the ground, and drew down this punishment upon Cain, (besides that of the ground formerly laid upon his Father) to be a Fugitive and Vagabond in the Earth: Then departed he from the presence of the Lord, and went into the Land of Nod, where he built a City, and called it Enoch, after the name of his Son. His Family was propagated to Lamech, the fifth in descent from himselfe, by whom the Jews * have thought him to have been slain, by reason of Lamech's words to his two wives: that he had slain a man to his wounding, and a young man to his hurt: if Cain should be avenged seven fold, then Lamech seventy and seven fold. After the death of Abel, Adam begat Seth, in the hundred and thirtieth year of his Age, as Moses (c) maketh expresse mention; neglecting the account of time in the Family of Cain, because his wicked race perished in the Flood: the Church of God being to be continued in the posterity of Seth, of whom also (as to the flesh) his Son himselfe was to proceed.

And posterity.

4. In the race of (d) Seth, is laid down the account of years from the Creation to the Deluge. For Seth, being born when Adam was 130 years old, begat * Enos at the age of 105; Enos being 90, begat Cainan, and Cainan when he was 70, begat Mehalelec. From the birth of Mehalelec to that of his son Jared passed 65, from Jared's to Enoch 162. and thence to that of Methuselah 65. Methuselah when he begat Lamech, was aged 187 years; Lamech when he begat Noah was 182, and Noah at the time of the Flood had lived 600 years, all which amount to the summe of 1656; each year of the Father's age being supposed compleat at the birth of his Son. All these by divine providence, for the propagation of Mankind, obtained a very long time upon the Earth. Though Enoch had the shortest, yet he never died, being taken up by God, after he had walked with him 365 years. Methuselah his son of all others, arrived at the greatest age, being 969 when he died. Yet, in a certain sense, Adam lived longer than he; for being created in his perfect strength, and fit for generation, he had the advantage of 60 years, before which age we read none of them to have had any children; Nature then requiring a longer time for maturity. If 60 now be added to 930 years, which he lived, the number exceeds that of Methuselah's age by 21. Seeing the World required it, it cannot but be presumed, that each of these begat other children, and some of them before these here mentioned. But such being but collaterall to that line, which was to be brought down to Noah, (who was to continue the generation of Mankind, and to repopulate the Earth) Moses upon that account, had no occasion to make mention of them.

Man's wickedness causing a Deluge.

The order of the Deluge.

(5) In the 480 year of the life of Noah, God seeing all flesh to have corrupted it selfe, and as well the posterity of Seth, as that of Cain, to be given up to all wickedness; it repented him that he had made Man. He resolved not alwaies to strive with him, yet gave him the space of 120 years to repent in. If no amendment appeared in that time he fully determined by an universall Deluge to destroy Man and Beast, with the creeping thing, and the Fowls of the air. Yet Noah a just man found grace in his sight, and being a Preacher of righteousness to the wicked World, the Lord was graciously pleased to make choice of him and his family to be a remnant and a seed, out of which Mankind and his Church might be propagated and repaired. He commanded him to build an Ark of * Gopher wood, into which he was to take his wife, his sons and their wives, with some of every living thing of all flesh; of the clean by seven, and the unclean by two. On (e) the tenth day of the second Month, he commanded him to bring the living Creatures into the Ark: On the seventh after, he entered it; and on the same day, the rain began to fall, and so continued for 40. dayes, and as many many nights. For 150 dayes the waters prevailed upon the Earth, (reckoned from the first fall thereof); insomuch that fifteen Cubits upward the Mountains were covered, and all flesh died that moved upon the Earth, both of Fowl, and of Cattel, and Beast, and of every Creeping thing that creepeth upon the Earth, and every Man. But God remembering Noah, and every living thing, and all the Cattel that was with him in the Ark; after the forty dayes, the windows of Heaven were stopped, and the rain from Heaven was restrained, and at the end of 110 more (which make up the 150) the waters were abated. This fell out on the 29th day of the 7th moneth, and the 196 of the year consisting of Lunar moneths; or the 17th day of the 7th moneth, if they were Solar.

* Here the word begat, is to be understood in the same sense as the Hebrew יָלַד, the Greek γενῆαι, and the Latin gignere, which are applied to Mother as well as to Father, and betoken birth rather than conception. The Latin word genitus and natus, signify the same thing. Tunc ille Aeneas quem Dardanio Anchisa Alma Venus Phrygia genuit. Simoentis ad undas?

The Ark re-
1st.

6. On the 17th. day of the 7th. moneth the Ark rested upon the Mountains of Ararat, according to the Hebrew; if, in this place, the version of the 7th. and Hierome in the vulgar, be not rather to be credited (which have the 27th) seeing it is not probable that the Ark should rest the same day, or two dayes before the waters begin to decrease. On the first day of the 10th. moneth were the tops of the Mountains seen, and forty dayes after, Noah sent forth a Raven which went to and fro, untill the waters were dried up from off the earth. The Raven returning no more unto him, seven dayes after he sent forth a Dove to see if the waters were abated, which finding no rest for the sole of her foot returned unto him. He stay'd yet other seven dayes, and again sent forth the Dove, which in the evening brought in her mouth an Olive leaf; so that he knew the waters to be abated. Then, seven other dayes passed, he sent her out the third time, and she returned not to him any more, the waters being now so much fallen, that the ordinary Hills might be uncovered, wherein she might continue and feed; although the Plains and Vallies were still overwhelmed. On the first day of the first moneth of the 601 year of Noah's life, the waters were dried from off the face of the earth; yet so, as it still remained moist and dirty, having been so long a time soaked with such quantity of moisture. Therefore he stay'd yet 55 dayes more, till the 27th. day of the second moneth, before he went out of the Ark; so much time having been requisite for drying the ground (especially in low places) and for the growth of grasse, and other things necessary for the sustenance of living Creatures, which had now continued in the Ark 365 dayes, or a full solar year, which exceedeth the lunar eleven dayes.

is.

7. The Ark rested upon the Mountains of Ararat; by which place most understand Armenia, rejecting the pretended Verses of Sibylla, which place it upon a Mountain of Phrygia, near to the Citie Celana, and out of which the two Rivers Marস্যas and Meander do issue. Some will have it to have rested about Araxene, a Plain of Armenia, through which the River Araxes runneth, by the foot of the Mountain Taurus. But the far greater number consisting both of Heathens, Jews, and Christians, pitch upon the Mountains of the Gordyaans, otherwise called Carduchi, Cardiai, Cordyai, Corduani, Gordi, Cordei, Curdi, &c. the Hill it self being variously named Kardu, Cardon, Kurud, Kardynus, Cordyaus, &c. What Hill soever it was, it must have stood Eastward of the Countrey of Shinar or Babylonia, and the Vine must have naturally grown there; upon which, and other accounts these Gordyeen Mountains are rejected by a learned (*) Writer of modern times, who affirmeth that Ararat named by Moses is not any one Hill, so called, no more than any one Hill among those Mountains which part Italy from France, is called the Alpes, and will have the same ledge of Hills running from Armenia to India, to keep the same name all along, and even in India, to be called Ararat. For that the best Vine naturally groweth on the South-side of the Mountains Caucasi; and, because of other excellencies of that soyl, he thinketh it most probable that Noah there settled himself and planted his Vineyard. And he alloweth best of the opinion of Goropius Becanus, who conceived the Ark to have rested on the highest Mountains of that part of the World.

wrote of the Ark's resting upon the Cordyaan Mountains of Armenia, and how those that came to see the Reliques of it (which yet were to be seen in his time) plucked off some pitch which they used to carry about them, as an Antidote against infection. Hierome the Aegyptian, who wrote the Antiquities of Phœnicia, related the same; besides Mnaseas, and many others: amongst whom Nicolas of Damascus is considerable, who in his 96 book spake of the Hill Baris, in the Countrey of the Mynians, (a people in Armenia) upon which many saved themselves in a Deluge, and one being carried thither in an Ark, there rested; who might (saith he) be the same man concerning whom Moses the Law-giver of the Jews wrote. Xisuthrus by one (f) is related, being forewarned of a Deluge by Saturn, to have fled by Boat into Armenia, where, the waters decreasing, he sent out Birds to discover dry Land; which, finding none, returned to him again. He is said by (g) a second to have escaped a great Deluge which hapned in his dayes, (being also forewarned by Saturn thereof), by providing an Ark, wherein, with himself, birds, creeping things, and beasts were preserved. (h) A third brings in an Aegyptian Priest declaring to Solon, out of the monuments of Antiquity, that before the particular Ogygian and Deucalionian Deluges, there was an universal one, by which the Earth was much defaced. (i) Another yet telleth a story like in all things to the History of Moses, but that Deucalion is placed in the room of Noah. The particular Deluges which hapned afterwards in Greece, and other places have by the ancients been confounded with this; and (k) some think they did not in reallity differ from it.

He is compared with Saturn.

9. Noah, before the Flood, begat three Sons, Sem, Ham, and Japhet; of which the last in order seemeth to have been the first in Nature, although the contrary is defended; and yet so, as Cham is never accounted the eldest. (l) Noah is, with great probability, thought to be Saturn, so much talked of by the Heathen; for many things concur to perswade us to it. He was the common father of all mankind after the Flood, which thing is by Orpheus attributed to Saturn. Not onely a just person, as Saturn (m) was, but a preacher of righteousness: From the time of the Flood to the division of the Earth, he had a natural Dominion over all mankind, which space fitly answereth to the Golden Age under Saturn. In that Age, there was but one Language, which Mythologists (n) so far extended as to make men & beasts to have spoken in the same Dialect. Noah is called an husband-man, (or, in the Hebrew phrase, a man of the Earth); and Saturn's wife, Rhea, is the same with the Earth: he (o) being also said to have taught Janus the use of the Vine and sicle in imitation of Noah, who planted a Vineyard. From Noah's once being overtaken with Wine, the liberty of the Saturnals might proceed; and from his cursing of Cham with servitude, the custom (p) observed amongst the Romans during that solemnity, of exercising servile Offices. The occasion of the Curse was Cham's seeing his father's nakednesse, and making a jest thereof; and the Poets (q) feign'd a Law made by Saturn that none should see the gods naked and go unpunished. Saturn and Rhea are said (r) to have been begotten of the Ocean and Theis, and thence the ancient Romans would have (s) the badge of Saturn to be a ship; which things much accord with the History of Noah. Saturn devoured all his Children but these three, Jupiter, Neptune, and Pluto, who divided the World amongst them, as did Sem, Cham, and Japhet. Of these, Cham the youngest agreeth with Jupiter, being named Jupiter Hammon. Japhet with Neptune, for that he had his portion in Islands and Peninsulæ's. And Sem being for his goodnesse hated by idolaters might by them be condemned to Hell and termed Pluto.

Cham is Jupiter.

Japhet Neptune.

Sem Pluto.

The posterity of Sem.

10. Two years after the Flood, Sem being an hundred years old begat Arphaxad, who is rationally (t) thought his eldest Son; although Elam and Assur be named before him, the Scripture in Genealogies not alwayes observing the order of birth. Arphaxad at the Age of 35 years begat a Son called Selah, according to the Hebrew; but the Greek Translation of the 72. maketh him at the Age of 135. to have begat Cainan, which is followed by Luke in the Genealogie of Christ. Much is said on both sides for these several readings;

ings; but most likely it is that this Cainan was neither thought of by Moses, the 72 Interpreters, nor St. Luke; but that by a mistake of the Transcribers he crept into the Copies of Luke, and the 70. Beza had a Copy of Luke very antient, and now in the publick Library of the University of Cambidge, wherein he is not found; and, what is more, he was not acknowledged by the primitive Church, as appeareth by (u) Irenaeus: That the Version of the 70. most antiently had him not, is probably inferred from Josephus; who, though he wrote in Greek, and usually followeth that Translation, nameth him not; neither doth Epiphanius against Hæresies, nor Hierome in his Hebrew Traditions, though he there discourseth of the differences betwixt the Hebrew and Greek Copies. Neither is he read in all Copies of the 1 Chron. 1. In Moses he is no where to be found, either in the Hebrew Text, or the Chaldean, or Samaritan Versions. Selah (or Schelah) at the Age of thirty years begat Heber, from whom many think the Hebrews and the Hebrew tongue to be so named. Heber being 34 years old begat Phaleg, so called because in his dayes the Earth was divided.

of Babel.

11. The division of the Earth was occasioned by the confusion of Languages, and this by building of the Tower of Babel. (x) Josephus telleth us that God had several times admonished men to separate themselves, and inhabit the Earth: which they impiously taking in an ill sense, as though he did it upon design to destroy them; at the instigation of Nimrod, the son of Chus, and Nephew of Cham, (who now ambitiously affected dominion over them) agreed to build a stately Citie, and a Tower which should reach to Heaven, to defend them from danger, in case another Deluge should overwhelm the Earth. They came from the East into the Land of Shinar, and there began their work. Some put no other distinction betwixt the Citie and Tower, but will have it onely a Citie adorned with Towers. Others place them at a great distance from each other: but it (y) seemeth evident, that some one notable Tower was begun, and that in the Citie, which was situate upon the River Euphrates. To put an end to this design God confounded their Language, that they understood not one another's speech, and hereupon the Citie was called Babel, signifying confusion, and the Land of Shinar, afterwards known by the name of Babylonia, sometimes called Babel it self, and the Citie Babylon, in several Languages. Of this great passage a tradition also remained amongst the Heathen, as appeareth by (z) Abydenus, Histrans, and Sibylla, who made mention of it, the Land of Senaar, and of Babylon, which they acknowledge was so called from Babel, in the Hebrew tongue signifying confusion. Hence also the fable arose concerning the Giants fighting against the gods, and their making a way to Heaven by heaping up Mountains one above another; which attempt was blasted by Jupiter his Thunderbolts.

His five Sons.

1. Elam.

12. What the sons of men (in opposition to the people of God so called) laboured to prevent in the building of Babel was thereby brought upon them; the Lord scattering them abroad upon the face of the Earth, and yet doing them more good then they intended to do themselves. Some will have the three sons of Noah to have divided the Earth by Lot, which as yet could not be sufficiently known, and at such a Citie (namely Rhinocoluca) as was not built till many Ages after, by (a) Aclisanes, King of Aegypt and Aethiopia: Nay, one (b) proceedeth so far as to brand him with Herésie whosoever doth not believe it. Cham, though the youngest, was advanced by the Heathen above the rest, and named Jupiter: Japhet, as the eldest, had the prerogative of birth-right; but Sem for his piety was preferred by his father, through Gods dispensation, and obtained the choicest inheritance which extended to this, and a better World. He hath five (c) Sons mentioned in Scripture, Elam, Assur, Arphaxad, Lud, and Aram. Of Elam descended the Elamites, or Elymeans, Neighbours to the Medes, and whom Luke placeth betwixt Media and Mesopotamia; from whom also the Neighbouring Regions were named. For Susan the Metropolis of the Susians is by Daniel placed in the Province of Elam; and, besides that, (d) Gabriana, Carbiana, Massabilica, and Susiana, as far as to the River Eulem; near the mouth of

2. Affur.

13. From Affur descended the Affyres, called afterwards Affyrians, and from him was named Affyria, properly so called, (which was the Countrey lying about Ninas, or Ninive), named also anciently (e) Aturia, and (f) Affyria, and in latter times (g) Adiabene. In it Strabo placeth the Babylonians, Elymaeans, Paratacans, Godians, Mesopotamians, Arabians, and Syrians (from Agypt to Pontus, where the Leuco-Syrians dwell) called also Affyrians. Syria and Affyria were of old time promiscuously used; but at length custom obtained that Euphrates, or Tigris, parted them. From Arphaxad, Josephus would have the Chaldeans issued, which as he and others say were anciently called Arphaxadeans; but in Scripture they are constantly read Chasdim from Chesed, or Chased son to Nachor, the brother of Abraham, and therefore owe their Original rather to him; and from Arphaxad seemeth to have received it's appellation a part of Affyria, called Arphaxitis, and named Arrapachitis by Ptolomy. From Lud came the Lydians anciently also known by the name of Maones, as we have it from Herodotus and others; the Carians and Myrians also, who inhabited the South part of Asia, beyond the River Maander, being reckoned of the same Original by him. Of Aram descended the Arameans and the Arimi, called Syrians, after the growth of the Affyrian Empire. Four sons of Aram are mentioned by Moses, which (*) elsewhere are reckoned amongst the Sons of Sem, viz. Huz, Hull, Gether, and Mas, or Mesech. Vide Eundem.

Their seat.

14. Huz, or Hz, by general consent of the ancients built Damascus. There being two besides of the same name; this hath made a confusion amongst Writers. One (h) was the Son of Nachor, the brother of Abraham, whose seat is called Ausius (i) in the Greek, and his posterity Ausite, a people of Arabia the desert, mentioned by Ptolomy. (k) Another of the posterity of Esau, or Edom; who fixed in Arabia the stony, on the Borders of Canaan, from whom Idumaea is (l) called the Land of Hz. Hull (by Josephus named Oirus) as they say, inhabited part of Armenia. Gether was the father of the Bactrians, according to Josephus; according to Hierome, of the Carians and Acarnanians; and Mercerus strangely joyneth all these Nations so far distant in place, together in Original. Mas (called also (m) Mesech) is thought by Josephus to be the founder of the Mesaneans, a people near the Camp of Pasinus, about the mouths of Tigris. Hierome maketh him the father of the Maones; being the same with the Lydians, whom he himself deriveth elsewhere from Lud. (n) Others will have him to have given Original to the people, inhabiting the North part of Syria, between Cilicia and Mesopotamia, near the Mountain Masius; or to the inhabitants of this Mountain, called Masieni and Masiani. Eber the Son of Selah, besides Phaleg, had another Son named Jostan, whose thirteen Sons Moses relateth, as the founders of so many Nations; Almodad, Sheleph, Hazermaseth, Jerah, Hadoram, Hzal, Diklah, Obal, Abimael, Sheba, Ophir, Havilah, and Jobab. Their dwelling was from Mesha, as thou goest, saith Moses, unto Sephar, a Mount of the East. They inhabit, saith Josephus, from Cophenes, a River of India, thit Countrey of Syria which lieth upon it; as now the Text is: which cannot but be false Geography. And for Syria, Aria is rather to be read, which, as Pliny saith, according to the judgement of others, included three other Provinces of the Gedrosi, Arachote, and Paropamisada, being terminated with the River Cophetes. 15. But neither in this place is there any thing to be met withall like Mesha, or Sephar, or any people thereabout of the same name with Jostan, or his Sons; neither could that Ophir, to which Solomon sent for Gold by Sea, and which they also will have denominated from one of the thirteen, be near Aria, which lieth at the foot of the Mountain Paropamisas, at a vast distance from the Ocean. Great Bochartus therefore placeth them in the Mediterranean parts of Arabia the happy, the inhabitants whereof, if they may be heard, challenge Jostan for the founder of both the Arabian Nation and Language,

- Almodad* 1. guage, calling him otherwise Cabtan. From Almodad then, descended the Almodeans, by the Greeks called Allumacota, whom Pio omie placeth in the middle of Arabia, near the head of the River Lar, which emptieth it selfe into the Persian Sea. From Saleph the Salapeni, who lived more remote upon the borders of Arabia Deserte, not far from the spring of the River Betius. From Hatsarmauech (which word is variously written, and by the Arabians called Hadramauth or Chadramauth) were named the regions Adramyta, Charramis, Chauramis, and the Inhabitants Atbramotita, Chauramotita, Chauramota, Aramita, and Adramita, whose Metropolis was anciently called Sabota, Sabbata, Saubata at this day Sebam. From Jerach came the Alilai, a people inhabiting near the Red Sea: Jerachai in Hebrew, and Alilai in Arabick, being the Sons of Jarlach, Hilal, or the Moon.
- Hadoram* 5. 16. From Hadoram issued the Drimanti placed by Pliny upon the Persian gulf, near the Mace. From Uzal, the Inhabitants of the Kingdom of Alieman (in the eastern part of Arabia) seem to be descended, Sanaa the Metropolis being by the Jews still called Uzal. Diela in the Chaldean and Syrian tongues signifying a Palm; from him must that part of Arabia have been called, wherein that Tree most grows, inhabited by the Minai. Obal (in the Arabian tongue Aubal and Abal) seemeth to have passed over the gulf into Arabia Troglodytica, and to have given name to the mart-Town and Bay of Abalises or Analises. Abimael was the Father of the Malita, whom Theophrastus maketh to have inhabited one of the four Regions fruitful in spices. Of Seba came the Sabeans properly so called, named also Sabate, who dwelt by the Red Sea, betwixt the Mineans and Catabanes, which Nations also together with the Chauramota, are by Writers often included amongst the Sabeans. Besides this Seba, there were three others of that name and founders of Nations. As (o) one the Son of Chus, another (p) his Nephew by Ragmah, and the (p) third the Son of Jockshan and Nephew of Abraham. Seba the Son of Jostan joyned to the Arabian Sea; the rest to the Persian; so that the Sabeans (of whom the Greeks and Romans know no distinction) are said by Pliny, to live from Sea to Sea. The Son of Joksan lived on robbrie; but the rest by Commerce with other Nations. Ophir (in Arabick, Anphar, signifying most rich) gave name to that part of Arabia near the Sabeans, which was inhabited by the Cessanite, Casandres, or Gasandra, so called from the Treasures; gold, for it's plenty, being here in little request. Another Ophir there was also in India; in the Island Tuprobane, as most probable; the Phœnicians being accustomed to give old names to new-found places. From Chanila the Son of Jostan (for there was another of this name, Son to Chus) descended the Chaulonite, called otherwise Carbi, and Cerban, the most warlike of the Arabians, whose seat is yet called Chaulan. Of Jobab the last of the thirteen, came the Jobabira placed by Prolomy next to the Sachalites. This was the habitation of the Sons of Irelau from Mesha, called otherwise Musa and Muza a famous port upon the Red Sea, as one goeth to Saphar a mountain Eastward, where was a City of the same name; both Port and City being well known to the Egyptians and Æthiopians, who used to trade into these parts. This was the inheritance of the Sons of Sem, the choicest of all, though contained onely within Asia.
- Japhet's porti-* 17. To Japhet fell a very considerable part of Asia, and all Europe, the on. least of the divisions of the Earth, but better improved than the rest, and far more populous; of later times the seat of learning, of two Empires which extended their power to the inwards both of Asia and Africa; and in an especial manner blessed with more than worldly prosperity, since Japhet dwelt in the tents of Sem. The Greeks acknowledged him for their Founder, by the name of Iapetus, than whom they thought nothing more ancient. Moses reckoneth seven of his Sons, and as many Nephews. The Sons are (q) Gomer, Magog, Madai, Javan, Tubal, Meshech and Ticas. Josephus maketh Gomer the Father of the Galatians, which if so, the same Originall ginall must be extended to the Gauls, of whom the other were but a colonie; and to some the names of Cimmerii and Cimbri, whereby the Inhabitants of the Western parts have been known, as also those of Kumero, Kumeri and Cymbro, which our ancient Britains (of the same stock with the Gauls) called themselves, seem to own no other originall. But another thinketh the Land of Gomer to be that part of Phrygia called Catecaucemene, lying upon the rivers Cayster and Maander and the City Philadelphia; the Plains of which consist of a burnt kind of Earth like to ashes, and the hilly parts are all stonie, the whole Country being brittle, adust and easie to be inflamed. This he gathereth from the signification of Gomer and Phrygia, both which import burning; Moses, (according to his judgment) nor alwaies calling the Founders of Nations by their true and proper names, but by the names of the Countries which they planted. Ever when the word is of the plural number, as of the Sons of Javan, Cuthim, and Rodanim; and all the Sons of Masaim and Canaan (except Sidon and Heb) must needs be names of peoples, not of particular Men. Haisarmanesh he proveth to be the name of a place onely, for that it signifieth the region of Death; as Dikla, a place of Palm-trees, Ophir a rich, Jobab so called from the desert, and severall others.

Gomer's three Sons.

Togarmah, 3.

18. Gomer hath three Sons mentioned by Moses; Askenaz, Riphat, and Togarmah. From Askenaz those descended, according to Josephus, by the Greeks called Rhemes; which who they were, is not to be understood. Most probably, by Askenaz is signified Bithynia, in which is the Bay Ascanius, besides a Lake and River of the same name; or Troas and Phrygia the lesse, in which were Ascania, both Country and City, and Island Ascania. From Riphat, Josephus deriveth the Paphlagonians, a people of Asia the lesse, near Pontus, and neighbours to the Phrygians. Togarmah is variously expounded by Writers. It appeareth out of Ezekiel, (r) that Gomer and Togarmah were not far distant; both North of Judea; and that from Togarmah came Horses and Mules to be sold at Tyre. Hereto well agreeth the opinion of Josephus, who placeth Togarmah in Phrygia, to which Cappadocia was near adjacent, North to Judea, and excelled in the breed of Horses and Mules.

2. Magog.

The same with Promethus.

19. From Magog, Japhet's second Son, descended the Scythians, according to Josephus and others; Gog and Magog, being that part of Scythia about Caucasus, which the Colchi and Armenians (whose language was half Chaldean) called Gog-hasan, (i. e. the Fort of Gog) and thence the Greeks, Caucasus: to whom also Gogarene was known, which Stephanus describeth to be between the Colchi and Eastern Iberi. Magog seemeth to be the same with Promethus. For as Promethus was the Son of Japhet, so Magog of Japhet. Promethus was feigned to be fixed to Caucasus, and Caucasus was the seat of the Scythians of old time, till they expelled the Cimmerii, and succeeded them; Promethus brought down fire from heaven, which might take Originall from Magog his finding out of Metals in Colchis and Iberia. And the Fable of his Heart, or Liver, being eaten by an Eagle, may be found in () the word Magog, which signifieth to be dissolved or to decay. Hierapolis, a City in Syria, seemeth to have been called also Magog from him; seeing (f) Vide Bochartum lib. 1. Deucalion the Scythian, and Son of Promethus, is by Lucian said to have consecrated the Temple there to the Syrian Goddess. From Madai it's generally granted, that the Modes are issued; the Medes and Persians being constantly in the Books of Daniel and Esther, named Madai and Paras. From Javan descended the Iones, (or all that inhabited Greece, from Thrace to the Isthmus of Corinth, the Macedonians being included). Homer calling them Jaones, and Alexander being signified by (i) Daniel under the name of the King of Javan.

3. Madai.

4. Javan.

His 4 Sons.
Elisa, 1.

20. The Sons of Javan were Elisa, Tarsish, Kittim, and Dodanim, from whom four Provinces took their names. From Elisa Aeolis, according to Josephus, but rather Elis (the most ancient and ample region of Pe'oponnesus, part whereof is by Homer called Alisium). to be taken for the whole Peninsula.

(i) cap. 8. v. 21.

2. Tarshish. sula. From Tarshis, Josephus and others derive Tarsus, the great City in Cilicia, some Carthage, another Tunis; but Eusebius and Bochartus understand the Iberians or Spaniards, amongst whom was a place called Tartessus. Besides this, there was another * Tarshis in the Indian Sea, whither ships went from Eson-gaber; and indeed, whatever the word originally signifieth (whether Cilicia or any other place) it is secondarily applied to the Mediterranean Sea, which reacheth unto Phœnicia, and sometimes seemeth to denote the Ocean it selfe. Josephus will have Citium to have possessed himselfe of the Island Cyprus, where was a City called Citium, the native place of Zeno the Stoick; and hence he saith the Hebrews called all Islands and maritime places by the name of Cheshim. Others will have the Chians, some certain Nations of India, others Cilicia, some Macedonia to be understood by this word. The Romans are by Daniel signified under this name, and in Isa y were of old the Cities Ceria, Echetia, and the River Cetus; and Chittim imports the same thing with the word Latum, betokening to lye hid. The opinion therefore of Josephus is very probable, that these Islands and Coasts of the Mediterranean might be known to the Hebrews, under the name of Cheshim. Dodanim (omitted in Josephus) by some is interpreted Dardani-
 4. Dodanim, or rather Rhodani- nim. ans, by others Dodaneans. But most antiently it was read Rhodanim, which the Greek rendreth Rhodians, though the name o' Rhodes is later than Moses his time. Bochartus therefore placeth this people in Gaul, about the River Rhodanus (now Rhene) which he proverh, not to have been so named from Rhoda, a Town there founded by the Rhodians. Rhodanim, he saith, signifieth Yellow or Saffron-coloured, which agreeth well with the colour of the hair of the ancient Gaules, either naturall or affected; wherein also the Brittains shewed themselves descended of the same stock, as Jornandes judgeth.
3. Tubal.
 6. Mesech.
 21. Tubal and Mesech (the fifth and sixth Sons of Japhet) are joyned in Scripture, most commonly, together; as near to each other. Josephus from them deriveth the Iberians, and Cappadocians, who had a City in his time known by the name of Mazacha. Bochartus understandeth by Mesech and Tubal, the Moschi and Tibareni, which are so joyned together by Herodotus, as Mesech and Tubal in the Scripture. The Moschi (besides Moschica properly so called) possessed all from Phasis as far as Pontus of Cappadocia; the Moschian Mountains reaching so far. Then next succeeded the Tibarens, according to Strabo, who extendeth their borders to Pharnacra and Trapezond, the Moschian and Colchian Mountains; so that they lay betwixt the Trapezuntians and Inhabitants of Armenia the lesse. Tubal and Mesech are noted by Ezechiel, to abound in Slaves, and Brasse, which, by the consent of Authors, fitly agreeth with the regions of Pontus; especially Cappadocia. From Thiras most Authors derive Thrace, a woman of which Country was called Threissa; and many names there, both of places and persons, perswade the same thing. This was the portion of Japhet, answerable to the blessing of his Father; that God should enlarge him. For unto it belonged all Europe how big soever, besides Asia the lesse, Media, part of Armenia, Iberia, Albania, and those vast Tracts towards the North, inhabited of old by the Scythians, and now by the Tartars: To say nothing of the new World, into which it's probable the Scythians passed by the Straits of Anian. To his Posterity belong the Northern parts, which by Jornandes, an Historian of the Goths, are deservedly termed, The work-houses of people, and sheaths of Nations.
7. Tiras.
 22. Curfed Cham was not excluded from Earthly blessings. To his lot fell Egypt, and all Africk, a great part of Syria and Arabia, besides Babylonia, Susiana, Assyria, and other Countries, which his Grand-son Nimrod possessed himselfe of. David very often calleth Egypt the Land of Cham or Ham: the ancient Inhabitants themselves Chamia or Chemia. In Arabia and Africk the name of Ammon (the aspiration being taken away) was univerally known, as appeareth by Ammon a River in Arabia, the promontory Ammonium, and the people called Ammonii. In Africk, the City Ammonis upon the River Cinyphus. The Chappell of Ammonis in the Island Meroe. In Marmarica, the City Ammonia vulgarly Parasionium: And the Ammonian Country, where was the famous Oracle of Ammon. Nay all Africk was called Ammonis or Ammonia. Ham signifieth hot; in which respect it agreeth well with the Greek word Zeus, the name of Jupiter. Ham was Noah's youngest Son; so was Jupiter the youngest of Saturne. From Cham's living in Africk, the hottest part of the World, Jupiter may be counted the Lord of Heaven. And Saturne his being made an Eunuch by his Son Jupiter (or Calius by his Son Saturn, as Macrobius hath it) seemeth to relate to that fault, for which Cham received from his Father a curse instead of a blessing. Of these things Bochartus giveth abundant satisfaction, to name no more.

His 4. Sons.

23. Four Sons of Cham are recorded by Moses; Chus, Misraim, Phut, and Canaan. From Chus, by a generall mistake, the Ethiopians in Africk have been thought to be descended; whereas by the land of Chus in Scripture is meant (u) part of Arabia, inhabited by the Chusaeans, called also Cusaeans; of whom were the Madianites, and Sephora the wife of Moses, who did not flie into Ethiopia and there marry her. They inhabited above Egypt upon the Persian Gulfe, in part of Arabia the stonie and the happy; thought by some to be the same with the antient Scenites, and the moderne Saracens, being called Scenites from dwelling in Tents, and Saracens from their robberies. Chus hath six Sons mentioned; viz. Seba, Havilah, Sabtah, Raamah, Sabiecha and Nimrod. Raamah hath two, Seba and Dedan. All these inhabited about the Persian Sea. Except Nimrod, whom Moses affirmeth to have fixed his seat at Babel. By the name of Mizraim is to be understood the Father of those who inhabited Egypt, thrice in Scripture called Masor (the singular number of the word Mizraim) as it's thought, from the straightnesse of it, being extended out in length from the Sea towards Syene. From Mizraim, Moses deriveth seven People or Nations: Ludim, Ananim, Lehabim, Naphthubim, Pathrusim, Castubim (out of whom came Philistiim) and Caphthorim.

As for Ludim, Bochartus by ten Arguments proveth the Ethiopians to be meant thereby, whom he will have also a colonie of the Egyptians. By Ananim the Nomades of Africk, who inhabited about Ammonis, and in Nasamonitis, and for Anamians might easily be called Amonians and Ammonians; they being also a colonie of the Egyptians and Ethiopians, as appeareth out of Herodorus. Of the same Original he maketh the Nasamones, Amantes, Hammanientes (who * made their houses of salt) and the Garamants. Lehabim or the Lehabians are thought to be the same with the Libyans bordering upon Egypt, from whom this denomination might passe to those that inhabited the greatest part of Africk. Naphthubim he placeth in Marmarica upon the Mediterranean Sea; Pathrusim in Thebais, a Province of Egypt, called Pathros, and by many distinguished from Egypt, though peopled from it.

25. Castubim he maketh to signifie the Colchi, though so far distant from Egypt, out of which they descended, and from Palestine, the Inhabitants whereof descended from them; both their Language and life in all particulars so absolutely agreed with the Egyptians, of whom by the Heathen also they have been thought a colonie, left there by Sesostris in his expedition, though they be of more antiquity then he. The Caphthorim seems to have been Neighbours to him, from whom also together with them, the Philistines descended, as appeareth from * Scripture. They are therefore to be placed in that part of Cappadocia, which lyeth next to Colchos about Trapezond.

It is probable that, upon the report of the richnesse of these places, the Aegyptians sent out a Colonie (for this drew thither Phrixus, Jason, Sesostris, the Medes and Persians, and of later times the Saracens out of Arabia): which finding the Climate too cold; or the Country not to answer expectation; or perhaps molested by the Scythians and others; part thereof resolved to return home, and in their way seated themselves in Palestine, after they had expelled thence the * Anims. The Captain of this Expedition seemeth to have been Typhon, reported by the Greek Poets to have made War against the gods, and to have peirced as far as Caucasus; but, after many battells, being stricken of Jupiter with a thunderbolt, to have fled into Palestine, where he dyed at the Lake of Serbonis and there still lyerh buried.

To Misraim fell Egypt and most of Africk, as far as the Lake of Trisonis, which divideth Africk into two equall parts. To Phut, all from the Lake as far as the Atlantick Ocean, as may be gathered from

By Canaan was inhabited the Land, which thereupon bore his name, and was afterwards conquered by the Hebrews. His Family was propagated as far as the Sea, the Phœnicians being descended of him, as Eupolemus an Heathen Writer, in his Book of the Jews, bare witness, saying, That Saturne begat Belus, and Chanaan; and the later begat the Father of the Phœnicians: besides, one Cna is said by Sanchoniathon (a most ancient Phœnician Writer) to have been the first Man that was called Phœnician; whence by Stephanus, Phanice is called Cna, and the Phœnicians Cnai. But, what is more, the Scripture calleth Phœnicia the Land of Canaan.

The beginning of Nim-

1. AFTER the division of the Earth; Nimrod, as we said, the Son of Chus and Nephew of Cham fixed his seat at Babel, and therein first began a Kingdom; having joyned to it (a) Erech, and Accad, and Calneh, in the Land of Shinar. By Erech, the ancients understood Edeffa; and by Accad, Nisibis: But neither the names nor situation of these Cities do agree; they being in that part of Mesopotamia which lyeth towards Armenia, and very far from Babylon. Therefore Erech is rather to be taken for Arecca a City of Susiana upon Tigris, mentioned by Ptolomy, which also seemeth to be the same with Ayderica or Anderica (b) in Herodotus; Ard in the Persian tongue signifying great. And well Arecca might so be called, which was so long, that sailing up the River one should meet with it three severall dayes, one after another; as the Historian relateth. Bocharius thinketh Accad (called also Archad) to have given name to the River Argad, which ran through Sitracena a Province near to Babylonia, &c. since called Apolloniatis. By Calneh (which is also Calno and Cauno) is to be understood that City, by the Parthians, re-built and called Ctesiphon. It stood upon Tigris, three miles from Seleucia, being the Metropolis of Chalynitis, a Province denominated from it, and mentioned by Strabo, and others. Babylon was exhausted by the building of Seleucia, as Pliny (c) telleth us; and the Parthians built (or re-built) Ctesiphon in Chalynitis, three miles off, to drain Seleucia.

2. The duration of this Babylonian or Assyrian Empire till Sardanapalus is variously assigned; the cause of which seemeth to be, for that some derived the Originall thereof from the birth of Chus, as Cappellus * thinketh, and so Herodotus might assign 1520 years to the continuance of it. Others from the beginning of the Babylonian Kingdom, as Diodorus, who reckoneth 1400 years to the death of Sardanapalus. Some from the building of Ninive, as Ctesias, who hath 1360. And lastly, others from the death of Belus, as Tragus and Eusebius, who give to it 1300 years. That Nimrod should begin his Kingdom within an hundred years after the Flood, is not very probable, as neither that the building of the Tower of Babel happened within that time; which would have been too short a space for the propagation of mankind to so great multitudes. An hundred years after the Deluge, Phaleg was born, in whose dayes it was that the Earth was divided. Some make the division to have been at the same time of his birth, and thence his name imposed, as from a thing already done, or in doing. Others assign it to the latter end of his dayes, and will have his name prophetically given by his Father; But there are not wanting, who take a middle way betwixt these two, and think the division made, when he was come to ripeness of age; or in the middle of his years; the number of which amounted to 229. When Alexander the great had conquered Babylon, which fell out about the 3675th year of the World; Callisthenes the Philosopher, who followed him in his Wars, at the desire of Aristotle his Kinsman, inquired into the Antiquities of the Chaldeans, and could find no observations of any longer date then 1903 years; which being cast back from the foresaid years, fall in their beginning, Nimrod named Belus.

3. Nimrod, the founder of this Empire, was by his subjects named Re', or Belus, which signifieth Lord, or Sovereign. That he was the ancient Belus, is thence proved; that * most of the old Writers accounted Be us the builder of Babylon, although some attributed it to Semiramis, herein relying upon the credit of Cleſias, which now is deservedly suspected by learned men, and in no case worthy to stand in Competition with that of Berosus the famous Babylonian Priest (who, as Pliny saith, had a Statue erected to his memory at Athens with a gilded tongue) nor with that of Abydenus, who also collected his Histories out of the Chaldean Archives. After Moses hath spoken of the four Cities, which were the beginning of Nimrod's Kingdom; we read that out of that Land (of Shinar) Aſſur went forth and built Niniveh and the City Rehoboth, and Calah, and Pesen, between Niniveh and Calah. Some, according to this Translation, will have this Aſſur to have been the son of Sem, who having built Niniveh, and founded the Aſſyrian Kingdom, Nimrod dispossessed him, or his; or some manner of way obtained, and joyned it to the Babylonian, as Julius Africanus hath delivered. But others contend that this Aſſur is the name of the Countrey, and not of a Man, and that it is to be read: And out of that Land went out (Nimrod) into Aſſur, (i.e. Aſſyria) and builded Niniveh, &c. Otherwise they think it would be out of the way, for Moses to mention the son of Sem in this place, where he is in hand with the Genealogie of Cham; neither could it be peculiar to him to go out of this Land and build Niniveh, seeing all mankind almost, at the division of the Earth, went out of it. The last reading onely maketh the sense intire; for how else could the four Cities properly be said to be the beginning of Nimrod's Kingdom, except he added more unto it? Lastly, this seemeth very urgent that, in Scripture, Aſſyria is called the Land of Nimrod.

Whether he built Niniveh.

4. He was a mighty Hunter before the Lord, or, therein none was to be compared with him; things being said to be such before God, as were so indeed, or in an eminent manner; He judging not according to outward appearance, but as they are in their own natures. By the means of Hunting it is probable that he made way unto his Monarchy. For under pretence of what was very necessary at this time (when men were few, scattered, and lying abroad, without defence against wild beasts, which ever especially abounded about Arabia and Babylon) he might gather a band of men, and by such exercises (which the Heathens (d) by their practice, as well as opinion shewed to be convenient for breeding of Warriours) train them up, till he converted their force from beasts to men. What was performed by him seemeth to have been attributed to his successors. Ninus is (e) said to have gathered an Army of Arabians, and therewith to have subdued the Babylonians; which seemeth to have related to his Conquest of that Countrey. For being a Chascan, and consequently an Arabian, he might by the assistance of his own Countrey-men and Kindred effect it; whom he (f) rewarded with that Region beyond Tigris, which thence was, by the Hebrews, called Chus, by the Caldeans, Chuth; Cissia, by the Greeks; and Chuzestan (i.e. the Province of Chus) by the Persians. From his usurping the right of Noah, some think the Fable to have sprung, of Saturn being cast out of his Kingdom by Jupiter; the word Nimrod signifying a Rebell, and answerable to his carriage. He is also judged to be the true Bacchus; this word being little changed from Bar-Chus, that is, the son of Chus. Bacchus was the son of Jupiter, and he was the Grand-son of Jupiter Hammon. The most ancient name of Bacchus was Zagreus, which signifieth a strong hunter, answerable to the Epithete given to Nimrod. He undertook an expedition into the East, wherein seem to be contained the Facts of Nimrod and his Successors. Bacchus was feigned to be born at Nysa in Arabia; and Nimrod was also an Arabian. And not unlikely might Nimrod be thought to be over the Vines, who first reigned at Babylon, where was that most excellent kind of Wine, dignified by the Ancients with the name of Nectar. To the reign of Belus, or Nimrod, 65 years are given by Julius Africanus.

5. Ninus his son succeeded him, and canonized him for a God, which gave, as 'tis said, the first occasion to Idolatry. He made a confederacy with Arius, King of Arabia (which Countrey withstood most Conquests); and then invading Armenia, forced Barzanes the King thereof, to submit to his Vassallage. Next he entred Media, where he took and Crucified Phamus the King; and then, being pricked on by desire of glory, and encouraged by his successe, he subdued all the people of Asia in seventeen years, except the Indians and Bactrians; the latter whereof under Conduct of their King Zoroastres (or rather Oxgaries, for Zoroaster the great Magician lived many ages after) stoutly opposed him, and yet at length were brought under, as we have it from Diodorus, who reporteth also that Ninus built Ninive, which he so named after himself. Whether he, his father, or any other built it, A Citie it was of great bignesse, strength, and ornament, being in compasse sixty miles; of a Quadrangular form, incompassed and fortified with a Wall a hundred foot high, and of such a breadth as three Charriots might have been driven together a-breast upon it; adorned also with Towers, 200 foot in height. The place of it is not agreed of, and (b) some think there were two Cities of this name; one upon Euphrates in Comagena, and another in Assyria beyond Tigris. As for Ninus, many things done both by his father, and successors seem to be attributed to him. He reigned 52 years; and the manner of his death is diversly related. (c) One saith, he was shot with a Dart as he lay before a Town. (k) Another writeth that Semiramis his wife (whom he had chosen for her admirable beauty and now doated on) obtained leave to wear his Royall Robe, and reign over Asia five dayes; and then, when she had got the power into her hands, commanded one of the Guard to kill him: But a (l) third, onely relateth him to have been secured in prison.

6. He left a son by Semiramis, named Ninyas, who being but young, she put on mans Apparel, and counterfeiting his person as well as Sexe is reported to have done very great things; part of which might rather be challenged by the two foregoing Kings, and by some that followed her. The resemblance of her son in all the lineaments and proportion of his body took away suspicion; for the further prevention whereof, she commanded the same kind of Garment to be worn by the people. At length, when she thought she had got fame sufficient, she made her self known, which detracted not from her glorie, but added to the lustre of it. She re-edified and enlarged Babylon, incompassing it with a Wall made up of Brick, Sand, and a certain Clay, or slime clammy, like Pitch, which there abounded: and *restrained, by new works, the violence of Euphrates which formerly was wont to overflow into the Town. Not content with the Empire as her husband left it, she enlarged it by the Conquest of Ethiopia, and made War upon India, though without successe; in which undertaking she onely had Alexander the Great her Æmulator, as Justin affirmeth. But, after she had reigned 42 years, either for that she would have had to do unlawfully with her son (being reported exceeding vicious of her body), or because he was impatient of her so long retaining the power, he slew her; although some say, she voluntarily resigned the Kingdom. After her death she was feigned to be turned into a Dove, and worshipped for a Goddesse under that shape; the occasion of which seemeth to have been the bearing of that bird pourtraited in her Ensign.

7. Ninyas, or Ninus, (as Justin calleth him) succeeding, imitated neither Grand-father, Father, nor Mother; but giving up himself wholly to an effeminate course of life, would be seen by none except Concubines and Eunuchs. Yet to him is ascribed that policick ordering of the Militia, which was imitated constantly by his Successors. A yearly choice was made of Officers and Souldiers out of each Province, to lye in Garrison in the Citie, and to be ready at all Essayes, there to continue for one year; at the end of which they were succeeded by new Levies. Hereby, the subject was contained in obedience; and yet, by suffering the Souldiers no longer to continue together, all conspiracies and plots were prevented, which might else have risen amongst such multitudes; the space of a year not being sufficient for such through and and intimate acquaintance, as might produce any considerable stir. Those that followed Ninyas for thirty Generations trod, for the most part, in his paths; nothing either memorable, or certain, remaining of them, except of Teutamus the 20th. from Ninyas, to whom Priamus King of Troy, when he was besieged by the Greeks, sent for aid. This Teutamus is said to have sent him a supply of 10000 Aethiopians, and as many of the inhabitants of Susiana, with 200 Chariots, under the Command of Memnon, who bearing himself very valiantly against the besiegers, was at length by the wiles of the Thessalians, circumvented and slain. 8. The 30th. in order was Tonos-Concoleros, by the Greeks and Romans A.M. 3166. called Sardanapalus, ennobled onely above the rest, for his excessive in effeminatenesse, and his ruin caused thereby. He spent all his time amongst women; with whom he would sit and spin, imitating them in all things possible, so as scarce ever in his whole time was he seen of the other Sex. This extraordinary corruption of manners gave occasion to two of his greatest Officers to compass his destruction. For Belesis (or Belochus) the Governour of Babylon, a great Magician and Astrologer, out of the Doctrine of the Starres, foretold to Arbaces Governour of Media, (otherwise called (m) Arbachus, (n) Obachus, and (o) Pharnaces), that one day he should obtain the whole principality of Sardanapalus, and excited him to attempts suitable to such an achievement. Arbaces herewith puffed up, promised him the possession of Babylon, if his Prediction should take, and laboured to ingratiate himself with the Captains of the several Provinces. Then, having a great desire to see what manner of life the King lived, he hired an Eunuch to bring him into the Palace, where beholding with his eyes his dissolute carriage, he despised him, and much more encouraged himself in the hope given him by Belesis. They now resolved, the one to draw the Medes and Persians, and the other the Babylonians to revolt; and Arbaces communicated his design and purpose to the Governour of Arabia his great friend.

He obtaineth three victories over them.

9. These things being as diligently put in practice, as readily undertaken, Diodorus. the next year an Army of 400000 men coming up to Nimiveh, where the King then lay; under pretence of relieving the former year's Guard, resolved to employ their force in the ruin of the Assyrian Kingdom. Sardanapalus, having timely notice of the revolt, drew out such forces as were in the Citie, and falling upon the Rebels in the Plain, put them to the rout. They flying to the Mountains, and recollecting their courage, came down again and engaged; but with the same successe: after which they retreated to the same place. Hereupon Arbaces calling the Officers together to advise what was to be done, all of them were for disbanding the Army and departing home, except Belesis, who urging them with what the Starres portended, prevailed with them to stay; but to no other purpose than that the King might gain the third victory, which shortly happened. Now they fully resolved to be gone; when Belesis, his credit being deeply engaged, spent the whole night in viewing the Stars; out of the mystery of which he was bold to affirm, that help would come of its own accord, and great changes follow, if they would have patience but five dayes longer. They being yet prevailed with, for this once; before the five dayes were expired, news came that great forces were coming from Bactria to the aid of the King. To them Arbaces sent, and easily perswaded them to joyn with the Conspirators.

Is worsted twice.

10. Sardanapalus knowing nothing of this, and puffed up with his successe, returned to his former course of life; which Arbaces understanding from certain Fugitives, and how his Army lay in a secure and careless posture, drew down upon it in the night, made a great slaughter, and drove those that escaped into Nimiveh. Hereupon the King committed the conduct of the Army to Salamenes his wives brother, and took upon himself the defence of the Citie; but the Rebels twice in the field overthrew his forces, and killed the General with most of his Souldiers. Then was the Citie closely besieged, and many ny Nations revolted to the conspirators; which the King considering, and sensible of his condition, sent out his three Sons, and two Daughters, with a great treasure, to Costa, the Governour of Paphlagonia, and, dispatching Courriers into several Provinces, took what care he possibly could for the making of new Levies.

11. Neither was he behind hand in providing all things within, that were necessary for resistance. There being no fear of storming the Town, by reason of the wonderful strength and height of the walls. He considered the main danger to lye in the affections of the inhabitants; to whom, that they might have no cause to attempt any new thing, he supplied all necessities in a plentiful measure. Two years and above he held out, and doubted not but to be able to do it, till relief should come; and the rather, for that they had an Oracle that Ninive should never be taken, till the River first proved an enemy to it; which he never could suspect. But in the third year fell such rains, that Euphrates (or Lycus, upon which some conceive that Strabo placeth the City, and not Euphrates, nor Tigris, as others) swelling with abundance of waters, made a breach in the Wall twenty Furlongs in length. At this the King utterly discouraged, as judging the Oracle to be fulfilled, lest he should fall alive into the hands of his enemies, he built a pile of wood in his Palace, upon which he heaped his treasures, and rich attire; and, making a little room in the midst, wherein he bestowed himselfe, his Concubines and Eunuchs, set fire to the heap, and so perished with this Company and the Palace. Such was the end of him, who placed all his felicity in his sensuall appetite, which he would have also recorded in his (p) Epitaph, and advised the Reader to imitate. He is reported to have built (but rather he restored) two Cities of Cilicia in one day, viz. Tarsus and Anchiala; in the later of which was his (q) Monument to be seen, being a Statue of stone, with the finger and thumb of the right hand joyned together is about to give a fillip. Upon the Monument was written in Assyrian Characters: Sardanapalus the Son of Anacyndaraca built Anchiales, and Tarsus in one day. As for thee, Friend, Eat, drink, and play: for all things else are not worth this, viz. that fillip. In him this line of the Assyrians failed, the Empire being divided into two Principalities, after it had continued about 1400 years, reckoned from the building of Babylon. This fall of Sardanapalus hapned about the year of the World 3186, 43 years before the first Olympiad.

12. The (r) besiegers understanding what was become of Sardanapalus, presently entred in at the breach, and took the City. Then, invelling Arbaces with a royall robe, they created him King; who rewarded them according to their deserts, and allotted the Provinces to their severall Governours. Belesis, according to agreement, having received the principality of Babylon, and understanding from an Eunuch how great treasure Sardanapalus had burnt with himselfe, begged the ashes of Arbaces, under pretence of having made a vow, in the heat of the War, to carry them to Babylon, and therewith to raise a lasting Monument of the destruction of the Assyrian Empire. He, being ignorant of his covetous design, graunted his request; but when the matter was discovered, referred his judgement to a Councill of Officers who condemned him to death. Yet, being desirous to begin his reign mildly, he not onely remitted this punishment, but permitted him to enjoy all the gold and silver already transported; and, what remained, which amounted to many talents, he conveyed it to Ecbatane the chief City of the Medes. (s) Diodorus and (t) Strabo tell us how he levelled Ninus (or Ninive) with the ground. Some (u) think it was onely the Castle; seeing the City had afterwards Kings, if not comparable to the rest, yet great and powerfull, which they think might descend from Belesis.

13. Herodotus (x) writeth how the Medes, having freed themselves from the Assyrian yolk, lived for many Ages without a King, in way of a popular government. But (y) Ctesias of Gnidus an Author of something a later date (who served Cyrus the younger, in his expedition against his Brother Ariaxerxes, and being taken prisoner in the Battell, was for his excellent skill in Physick, which he professed, received into favour by the King, and lived in good esteem in his Court 16. years, pretending to transcribe his History out of the Records of Persia, reported that Arbaces, after the overthrow of the Assyrians, reigned 18. years: and as he left the dominion of Asia to the Medes, so also the Sovereignty over them to his Son Mandaucos. That Mandaucos, having reigned 50. years, left the Kingdom to Sesarmus, who reigned 30. Him followed Arius, and reigned 50, then Arbians 22, Arsens 40, in whose time the Cadusians revolted through the procurement of Parfodas the President of his Council, whom he had offended. Ariynes 22. Artibarnes 14 (in whose reign the Parthians revolted, and gave up themselves to the Saca). And last of all Assyages his Son, who being overthrown by Cyrus, the Empire was thereby devolved upon the Persians.

14. That Ctesias out of design wrote things contrary to Herodotus, is probable enough, and that he is fabulous cannot be denied; yet have we a succession of Kings elsewhere (2) recorded, though such an one as scarce in one name agreeth with that of his. Sesarmus is said to have succeeded Arbaces, and continued 30 years, then Medidus 40, Candiceas 13, and then Deioces, whom Herodotus will have to have first obtained sovereignty over the Medes. For having, as he (a) writeth, an ambition that way, he made himselfe popular by pretence to the love of Justice, which then ran at a low ebbe amongst them, for want of authority. He first took upon him to decide the controversies of his own Village, which performing with much equity and conscience, thence became known to other parts, and at length became so famous, that few would bring their causes before any other Judge than him alone. Being aware of this, he withdrew himself, giving out that no longer could he undergo such a burthen, and thereby neglect his private affairs. Hereupon, robberies, violence, and oppression, returned throughout the Country; insomuch, that the people, gathering together from all quarters, after a serious debate, concluded there was necessity of having a King, under whose protection every man living, might the better minde his domestick matters. Deioces was chosen by universall consent, who, having got the power into his hands, caused them to build a City for his residence, which he called Ecbatane, and having ruled with abundant severity 53 years, left the Kingdom to his Son Irarius. He, after he had reigned 22, left for successor his Son Cyaxares, who having long struggled with various Fortune, (as afterwards will be seen) gave place to his Son Assyages, Father to Mandane the Mother of Cyrus.

15. Belosis obtained Babylon, as was said; but how long he held it, or who succeeded him immediately, is not known. About 71 years after, Nabonassar, or Nabonassar, obtained the Kingdom there; from the beginning of whose reign, that famous Ara, or Epoche, known by the name of Ara Nabonassari, is derived. It is counted from the first day of that Egyptian month Thoth (Feb. 26.) which fell out 746 Julian years, and 310 dayes, before the Ara of Christ, as Cappellus and others reckon; 424 years before the death of Alexander the Great, according to Ptolemy (b) the Prince of Mathematicians, in the 8th Olympiad. This Author hath preserved the names of such as succeeded Nabonassar, in his Catalogue of Kings. He reigned 14 years, after him Nadius 2, then Cherzius or Porus 5, Jugens, or Illusius 5, and then Mardokempadus 26. In his time happened the (c) three most antient Eclipses of the Moon, observed by the Babylonians. The first of them in the first of his reign, and the 28th of the month Thoth, the 27th year of Nabonassar. The second in his 2nd year, on the 18th of Thoth. And 176 dayes, 20 hours and an hulse after this, the third Eclipse fell out, on the 15th day of the month Phamenoth. Scaliger and others, think this Mardokempad to be the same with him, who in the (d) Scripture is called Merodach-Baladan, the Son of Baladan. But Cappellus conjectureth there were two Merodach's, Sons of Baladan and Nephews of Nabonassar, whereof the one was called Merodac-Kempad, and the other Merodac-Baladan.

16. Mardokempadus, having reigned 12 years, was succeeded by Arki- as, who ruled 5. Then followed an Inter-regnum for two years, after which Babylus obtained the Kingdom for 3, then Apronadius 6, Rigibelus one, Mesessimordak, 4; after whom another Inter-regnum ensued for 8 years, he being also written Mesessimordac. Now the Royall Race seemeth to (c) one, to have failed, and Esarchaddon the King of Assyria to have again subjected the Babylonians to his Kingdom; and his reason is, for that he who followed at the end of this Inter-regnum is by Ptolemy called Assaradinus, which he thinketh to differ onely from Esarchaddon in the sound of severall Languages. If so, this is he, who brought out of the East Country, Strangers to inhabit Samaria, whence Samaneffer had, 40 or more years before, transported the Ephraimites. He is also, by the posterity of this new Colonie, called the great and noble Assnapper. But how this Assyrian Kingdom had sprung up again, during these two Principalities of the Babylonians and Medes, is to be considered.

The arising anew of the Assyrian Kingdom. How, when, and by whom.

17. It is not probable that the vast Empire of Sardanapalus was all (nor perhaps the greatest part) subject to Media and Babylon; but that, although Arbaces left not the Medes to their liberty, yet severall people he did, for want of power to keep them under: Hence in some time the people beyond Euphrates, wearie of this anarchie and confusion, under which they laboured, might be willing to admit of a Prince again, though not of the old stock of Belus; whose successors having far excelled in power and dominion, the Greeks accounted Sardanapalus the last King of the Assyrians. Who this new Prince should be, remaineth very obscure. One (f) thinketh him that same Phul, who made an incursion into the Land of Israel, in the time of Menachem, fixing the beginning of his reign, in the 4th Olympiad, 17 years before that of Nabonassar. Another (g) will have Tiglath-Pileser (or Thilgath-Pileser, or Theglath-Pha'assar) to be the man (in Ælian, he saith, called Thilganus) whom also he accounteth the same with Ninus Junior, mentioned by Eusebius (h) having assumed the name of the first founder of the Assyrian Empire. This Tiglath-Pileser, at the invitation of Judah, went up against Rezen (i) King of Damascus, and killing him transported his Subjects into Kir, a place (as Josephus will have it) of upper Media. He died when he had reigned 19 years, and was succeeded by Salmanasser; to whom (k) Hisea King of Israel refused to pay tribute, entering into confederacie with So King of Egypt against him: But Salmanasser besieged him in Samaria, and at the end of three years, taking the City, carried the Israelites into captivity into Chelach, Cheber, and Nebar-gesan, Cities of Media, where he, as well as his predecessor, might have power, if, (*Dei*ces, as yet not having obtain'd the Kingdom) this Country was still subject to a popular Government, or rather in a confused Anarchie.

Senacherib.
A. M. 3287.

18. After the subversion of the Kingdom of Israel, he overran all Phœnicia and Syria. He sent an Army against the Tyrians at such time as Elulæus their King made War upon the Citizens which had rebelled; but a peace was presently made, and he drew back his Forces. Not long after Sidon, Acce, Palatyrus, and other Towns revolted from the Tyrians to him; so that they alone standing out, he returned, and having a supplie of 60 ships from the Phœnicians, ingaged with them in a Sea-fight; but they having but 12, yet overthrew his Fleet, and thereby obtained great credit. At his return, he set guards upon the River, and water-courses, and there kept them five years together, which constrained them to make a shift with Wells and Pits, as Alexander (i) related out of the Tyrian Annals, translated into the Greek tongue, wherein the name of Salmanasar was recorded. Salmanasar dying, Senacherib his Son succeeded him, called also Sargon in (m) Scripture, as some think. He infested all Asia and Egypt with War; into the latter of which, as he descended, in his retreat he fore (n) distressed Hezekiah King of Judah, who making his application unto his God, obtained deliverance, to the confusion of the Assyrian and his Army. Herodotus telleth a story, How when he came to Pelusium, Seibes the Priest of Vulcan then King of Egypt, by his prayer to his god, procured all the habilaments of War to be eaten with Mice ; so that being rendred unable to fight, he was forced to draw back his Army. But the Prophecies against Egypt ascertain us that this expedition proved very disastrous to it, and that many Captives were thence led away, which the Priests, from whom Herodotus had his information, hid this, and all other things that tended to the dishonour of their Countrey.

19. Returning from Egypt into Palastine, he besieged (p) Lachish, and thence removed to Libnah, where he wrote a blasphemous Letter to Hezekiah. For hearing that Tirhakah King of Ethiopia (or Arabia) (by Josephus called Tharaces, by Strabo, Tearkon) was coming against him in behalf of the Egyptians, he removed for fear, and God sent his Angel into his Camp, who slew in one night 85000 men, which thing as a plague was also recorded by (q) Berosus. Then returned he (as God had promised Hezekiah) with great consternation into his own Land, where raging against the Jews that dwelt at Niniveh (if credit be to be given to the book of Job) he was after 44 days slain in the Temple of his idol Nisroch, by his two sons Adramelech and Sharezer, (who fled for it into the Land of Ararat, or Armenia) and Esarchaddon his son reigned in his stead.

Esarchaddon
Assaradinus.

20. This Esarchaddon is thought (and that probably) to be the same with Assaradinus mentioned by Ptolemy in his Catalogue of Kings, and who subdued Babylon. It is also thought that (r) this is he, who when he brought a new Colony into Samaria from Babylon, Cuthah, Ana, Hamath, and Se-pharvaim, at the same time making an inroad into Judaea, (as 'tis very probable) took (s) Menasseh the King thereof in the Thorns, and carried him in Captivity into Babylon; for it appeareth from both these passages mentioned in Scripture, that at this time that Citie was subject to the King of Assyria. After Esarchaddon (or Assaradinus) had reigned thirteen years, Saosduchinus succeeded him according to Ptolemy; and not Meroach whom the general opinion will have, (being King of Babylon) to have killed him, and again overthrown the Empire of the Assyrians. For this succession is founded upon a feigned (t) Author imposed on the World, with several others of the same credit, and therefore deserveth to be rejected. The time of this Saosduchinus falling in with that of Deioces (who according to Herodotus built Ecbatane the Metropolis of Media) if any credit be to be given to the book of Judith, we may judge him to be that Nabuchodonosor mentioned there to have overthrown Arphaxad, King of the Medes, and builder of that Citie, in the great plains of Ragan. After he had taken him in the Mountains, he slew him; plundered Ecbatane, and then returned victorious unto Niniveh, where he feasted his Army for 120 days. The year after, entering into Consultation how to subdue the several Nations about him; he ordained Holophernes his General, who straitly besieging Bethsara, a Town of Judaea; by the wisdom and courage of Judith, the Widdow of one Manasses of the Tribe of Ephraim, was circumvented, and had his head cut off in his Tent.

Chuniladams.

21. Saosduchinus, (or Saosducimus) having reigned twenty years, Chuniladams succeeded him, thought also to be the same with Saracus, mentioned by Alexander Polyhistor. Against him came (u) Phraortes, the son of Deioces in revenge of his father's death; after he had first of all others subdued the Persians, and the rest of Asia. But his good fortune here forsook him, and he perished with the greatest part of his Army, in the 22 year of his reign. His son Cyaxares succeeding is said to have been more puissant than his Ancestors, and the first that distinguished the people of Asia into several Provinces, and Souldiers into their several ranks of Pike-men, Horsemen, and those that used Darts. He fought with the Lydians; at which time so great an Eclipse of the Sun hapned, that the day seemed to be turned into night. Having brought to his obedience all Asia, beyond the River Haly, he gathered his forces together, and went against Niniveh with intentions to destroy the Citie. He overthrew the Assyrians in battle and besieged the place; but it hapned at this time that a great Army of Scythians

(u) Herodotus lib. 1. 102. &c.

The Scythians having driven the Cimmerians out of Europe, under conduct of Madyes, the obtain Asia 28 son of Prothya, (called otherwise Jadathyrus) their King, still followed them, and from the Lake Maosis, leaving the Mountain Caucasus on their right hind, pierced into Media.

22. Cyaxares hereby was constrained to raise his siege, went, and gave them battel; but was overthrown, and lost the Dominion of Asia, which the Scythians having obtained, marched straight for Egypt. Psammetichus the King met them on their way, when they had new entered Palastine, and by good words backed with money prevailed with them to go no further. They enjoyed the Dominion of Asia 28 years; after the expiration of which term, managing their affairs with as great neglect as formerly they had used diligence in polling and rifling the Countrey; the greatest part of them being entertained by Cyaxares, were made drunken and slain, and the King recovered his Dominion. During these things, (x) Nabopolassar a Babylonian, and General to the Assyrian King contracted affinity with Astyages the son of Cyaxares, and Governour of Media: Nebuchadnefar the son of Nabopolassar marrying Amylis daughter to Astyages. The effect of this alliance was that they jointly set upon Baracus, or Chynaladanus in Niniveh, and taking the Citie slew him therein, after he had reigned 22 years. At this time the Prophecies against Niniveh seem to be fulfilled in its destruction. For in the latter end of the Greek book of Tobit it is written that Nebuchadonosar and Assuerus took Niniveh, Tobias being yet alive, who is said to have lived 127 years (or, as the Latine hath it, 99.) 95 having already passed from the taking of Samaria; at which time he was carried Captive with his father into Assyria by Salmanasar.

23. Chynaladanus being dead, Nabopolassar (or Nabulassar) obtained his Kingdom in the 123th year of Nabonassar, according to (y) Ptolomy, whose Canon of Kings also (as to the term of years collected from the particular reign of each) directly answereth to this account. (z) Against him came up Pharoh Necho, and took Carchemish, a Citie situate upon Euphrates, killing Josiah the King of Judah, who attempted to stop his passage. He holding this Town, the (a) Governour of Cælosyria and Phœnicia revolted from the Babylonian, who being now unable to undergo the trouble of War made his son Nebuchadnefar King with him in his 17th year, and sent him with an Army to subdue Egypt and Syria; with him joyned (b) Asiabares, King of the Medes, whom some think to be Cyaxares, and others more probably Astyages his son. In this expedition he made Jebojakin King of Jud b, his tributary and drew him from the obedience of Egypt; which Necho taking in disdain, came up against him and ingaging once more at Carchemish was overthrown and slain, as may be gathered out of Scripture. (c) Whilest Nebuchadnefar was prosecuting his victories, overrunning all from the River of Egypt to the River Euphrates; in the mean (d) time his father being sick at Babylon, died. After he had reigned 21 years, as it is now in the Catalogue, for which some learned men think 29 is to be read. He understanding hereof disposed of the affairs of Egypt and other Countreys, and giving order for the conveyance of the Judean, Syrian, Phœnician, and Egyptian prisoners, he himself made haste through the desert, and took possession of the Government reserved for him by the Caldeans.

24. He distributed the Captives into Colonies about Babylon, adorned the Temple of Belus (which Semiramis had built) with the spoils; repaired and increased the buildings of the Citie, and fortified the Channel of the River, that the Enemy should not make use of it against the Town. He added a new Citie to the old, and compassed both with three Walls of brick. He raised divers remarkable edifices, built a new Pallace, and about it a Garden, or Wilder nesse, so much celebrated by the Græcians. His wife being a Mede, and, according to the nature of her Countrey, delighting in Mountainous Woody prospects, brought him to imitate with Art what was wanting in the plains of Babylon. This Garden was made four-square, taking up in compasse sixteen Acres, in height equalling the Walls, set with Four mone-hs after, he also carried away Captive, Jechonias, or Jehojachim his son, and made Mattaniah his Uncle King in his stead. This Mattaniah, whom he named Zedekiah, rebelled against him notwithstanding his solemn Oath of fealty taken at his institution, and therefore in the eleventh year of his reign he was also taken by the Babylonian, had his eyes put out, and was so carried to Babylon: the Temple and Citie were burnt with fire, and the people led into Captivity, as will appear in its proper place.

His pride.

25. Nebuchadnesar returning home was exceeding proud, and puffed up at his successe. He erected a great Image of Gold; in the Dedication whereof all his chief Officers were commanded to fall down and worship; which was obeyed by all except three Jews, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, the companions of Daniel. For their punishment they were cast into a fiery Furnace, heated seven times hotter then usual, and so miraculously preserved from the fury of the flame, that not an hair of their heads was sing'd; though it killed those that cast them in. At this, the King astonished, by publick edict acknowledged Gods power, and forbade the blaspheming of him. Yet repented he not of his pride, and, notwithstanding a sufficient warning given him by God in a dream, exalted himself in the conceit of the greatness and splendour of Babel, which he had built for the house of the Kingdom, by the might of his power, and for the honour of his Majesty. But the same hour, as he was answered by a voice from Heaven, the Kingdom departed from him, he was driven from men, made to eat grasse as Oxen, and his body was wet with the Dew of Heaven, till his hairs were grown as Eagles feathers, and his Nails like Birds Claws; and seven times passed over him, till he knew that the Most High ruleth in the Kingdom of men, and giveth it to whomsoever he will. And this time prefixed being expired (seven years as most suppose, though some reckon but three and an half, counting for times, Winter and Summer) his reason returned to him, with the glory of his Kingdom, his Honour, and Brightnesse, his Councillors and his Lords sought unto him, he was established in his Kingdom, and excellent Majesty was added to him. Therefore he shamed not by a publick writing to own the thing; praised, honoured, and extolled the King of Heaven, all whose works he confessed to be truth, his wayes judgement, and that those that walk in pride he is able to abase.

What is found
Heathen.

26. Of these strange passages the Heathen were not utterly ignorant. (e) Abydenus wrote, that, being exceeding proud, and going up upon his Palace, he was taken with a Divine fury. This he had out of the Annals of the Caldeans, who fancied him to have been seized on with a propheticke spirit, and so to have vanished. (f) Megasthenes in his fourth book of Judea, endeavoured to shew how this King in valiant exploits exceeded Hercules by far; that he subdued the chief Citie of Africk, and a good part of Spain. Diocles, in his second book of Persia, made mention of him, and Philostratus both in his Histories of Phenicia and India; writing that he fought against Tyre thirteen years, which 'tis probable, at length he took by composition, and there placed Baal King in the room of Ichobalus. What he did against this Citie, God, taking as service done to himself, promised him the Land of Egypt for his wages, which we must accordingly believe to have been paid. At length, having foretold that Babylon should be lost to Cyrus, as Abydenus wrote; he died, after he had reigned 43 years, being in Psolomies Catalogue of Kings, called Nabocolassar, which may be corruptly written for Nabodolassar.

Evilmerodach his Son succeeded him, who lifted up the head of Jehoiakim King of Judah, in the 37th year of his Captivity, spake kindly unto him, set his Throne above the Throne of the Kings that were with him in Babylon and changing his prison garments, allowed him a continuall diet all the dayes of his life. But for his wickednesse and debaucheries, he continued not long, being circumvented by Neriglissor his Sister's Husband, and slain when he had reigned but two years. Neriglissor after his death, reigned Laborosardochus.

Nabonidus.

4. After him came his Son Laborosardochus, who being of an untowardly disposition, was made away by his Relations, after nine months, and they preferred to his place one Nabonidus a Babylonian, by Ptolomy called Nabonadius, by others Nabannidochus and Labynius. [(g) Who reigned 17 years, for which some think 27 is to be read.] This succession we have from Berosus the Caldean, attested by Ptolomy, who yet leaveth out Laborosardochus, either for his small continuance, or because he reigned together with his Father. But learned Men do not agree in the manner of reconciling this History with what Daniel hath written of Belshazar. Some will have Labynius or Nabonodus, to be Belshazar, Nabonodus being the last of the Kings, which Belshazar also seemeth to be; at his death, Babylon being taken by Cyrus, as the interpretation of the writing on the wall hinteth: Peres, thy Kingdom is divided, and given to the Medes and Persians. As for Darius the Mede, he seemeth to them to be no other then Cyaxares the Son of Astyages King of Media, and the Uncle of Cyrus, who of his own accord delivered Babylon to him: and they think this sufficient to prove that Laborosardochus could not bee Belshazar, because hee hath but nine months assigned him by Berosus, whereas we read in Daniel of the third year of Belshazar.

Whether the same with Belshazar.

28. Others think they have ground enough to denie Nabonidus to be Belshazar, who is called the Son of Nebuchadnezzar; in regard no such relation is mentioned by Berosus, that can intitle him to so much as his grand-child, which Laborosardochus was by his Daughter, being called his Son by a common Hebraism: For the Latin version of Josephus which maketh Nabonodus of the blood; it is in no case agreeable to the Originall which plainly relateth him to have been of the * conspiracy. For the 5th year of Belshazar it well enough agreeth with Laborosardochus, because he reigned 4 years, with his Father, and, after his Father's death, nine moneths by himself. Now the History of Daniel onely relateth Belshazar to have been slain; not that Babylon was then besieged by Cyrus: it being improbable, say they, that a time of so great danger, the King and his Nobles should spend in feasting and jollity; but rather likely, that behaving himselfe too insolently in that drunken fit, he was knocked in the head by his Companions, as Berosus * hinteth, and the Scripture rather seemeth to approve than contradict. As for the interpretation of the Writing on the wall, it might note what was already determined, and within a little time was to be accomplished concerning Cyrus the Persian, who being at that time known to the World, could not be hid from Daniel, who had met with his name long before in the Prophecie of Isaiah, and had his mind, without doubt, fixed upon the 70 years of Captivity foretold by Jeremiah, to which a period should shortly be put by that person. That Darius Medus was of Median descent appeareth, but that he was King of the Medes can no way be evinced; especially seeing that no ancient Greek Historian maketh mention of Cyaxares the Son of Astyages, (whom we read to have had but one Daughter) except Xenophon; and he either one purpose seemeth to thwart Herodotus, or to have written his Cyropedia, rather (h) to shew what a Prince ought to be, than what Cyrus was indeed, and so to have taken some of that liberty of invention which others (i) have done of late upon the same and other Subjects. But though Joseph Scaliger may seem to show more reason for this later asserion, yet Pererius truly affirmeth the thing to be obscure, perplexed, and difficult.

29. If Laborosardochus bee taken for Belshazar, then Nabonidus must be the same with Darius Medus; whom further, some would have to be the Brother of Astyages, not his Son, and yet called Cyaxares. In him the Empire of the Babylonians ceased, and was derived upon the Persians by Cyrus, whose first beginnings are to be viewed, with the progresse of his actions, which made way to that pitch of greatnesse whereat he arrived. Herein Historians do not relate the same things. That Astyages was his Grand-father is acknowledged by all, except Ctesias, who will have them nothing akin, and calleth him Astyigas: His Father's name is granted to be Cambyses, his Country Persia, but his condition is diversly reported of. Herodotus writeth how Astyages dreaming two dreams concerning his Daughter Mandane, (which by the Wizards were interpreted to portend the losse of his Kingdom, through the greatnesse of her issue) gave her in marriage to one Cambyses a Persian of obscure fortune; and not satisfied in this security, sent for her when she was with child, and as soon as the Boy was born, gave him to one Harpagus to be made away. Harpagus fearing he might afterwards be called to an account by the Mother, for violence offered to the Babe, delivered him to the King's Shepherd, to be exposed in the Woods unto the mercie of wild beasts. This being done, and the Shepherd's Wife lately brought to bed of a still-born child; she prevailed with her Husband to fetch him home; nursed and brought him up as her own Son amongst the Shepherds. At seven years of age being chosen King of the Boyes in their play, he executed the office with severity, towards such as were disobedient, and for this was complained of by their Parents to the King. Being sent for and accused of the crime, he would acknowledge none, alledging he had done like a King; and standing in his justification without the least change of countenance, Astyages was struck with admiration, and presently called to mind his dream. Upon examination of the Shepherd, he got out the whole matter; owned him for his Grand-son, because he thought the dream fulfilled in his boyish reign amongst the Shepherds; onely he thought it good to send him out of the way into Persia.

30. But to punish Harpagus for his disobedience, he invited him to supper, and caused to be served up to the table his onely Son; of which, after he had eaten heartily, and approved the meat, he let him see his entertainments, by the head, hands, and feet, reserved in another platter. Harpagus for the present kept down his passion, seeming to acquiesce in the King's pleasure, untill Cyrus came to man's estate. Then, hearing of his activity and forwardnesse, he resolved by presents to make him his friend, meditating a convenient way of revenge by the means of this Youth, from whom he expected something answerable to his Grandfather's dream. Knowing Astyages his tyrannicall carriage towards the Medes, he insinuated himself into the chief of them by degrees, and secretly perswaded them, that it was convenient he should be removed from the Government; especially seeing they might with some plausibility place Cyrus in his Seat. Having thus made War, he wrote Letters to the young Man, into Persia, (which, to prevent discovery, he sowed up in the belly of an Hare) wherein recalling to his memorie what he had suffered from his Grandfather upon his account, he solicited him to draw the Persians to revolt; then to come down with an Army into Media, where he might be sure of him or any other the Kings Generals, and so easily become Master of all.

31. Cyrus considering of a way how to accomplish this business, which now he made no lesse than a design, called the Persians together; first give out that he was chosen their Generall by Astyages, and then easily perswaded them, by laying open, how much Liberty was to be preferred before that Slavery they now underwent, to close with him and break out into open rebellion. The old Man hearing of this, sent a messenger for him; but he returned answer, he would come sooner than he should have cause to desire his company; whereupon he armed his Subjects of Media, and forgetting how he had formerly injured Harpagus, committed the Army to his conduct. Harpagus revolting, he lost thereby the first Battell; yet was not daunted, but threatened Cyrus, nailed to crosses the Magicians, who had perswaded him him to dismiss him, and arming all both old and young that were in the City, led them out to a second engagement, wherein his success was worse than before, he being taken prisoner. When Harpagus, boasting of his revenge, insulted over him, he taxed him of imprudence and injustice: of the one, for that having power to make himselfe King he should transfer the dignity to another; and of the other, because, for to revenge a private injury, he had enslaved the whole Nation of the Medes, out of which he might rather have chose one to the Kingdom, refusing it himselfe, than him who would now so order the matter, that the Persians, slaves before, should be Lords and Masters of all. Thus Astyages lost his Kingdom, after he had held it 25 years, enjoying all things else at his Grandson's hands, till his naturall death. And the Medes became subject to the Persians, after they had enjoyed the dominion of Asia beyond the River Halys, the space of 128 years, (except that space wherein the Scythians kept them under) in the 2d year of the 55th Olympiad, of the World 3446.

Crasus King of Lydia.

32. Cyrus having obtained the sovereignty of Persia and Media, was within a while provoked by Crasus King of Lydia, who at this time was grown eminent, having improved the inheritance which descended upon him from his Ancestors.

is called.

The Lydian Nation was of great antiquity, so named from Lud the Son of Sem, or rather descended of him who by Moses is so called; both he and they having obtained this name from that Country, which from the crookednesse and winding of the River Meander took the appellation of Lud, in the Phœnician Language signifying crooked or winding: The Greeks say, that the Lydians were first called Maones; and Lydia Maonia, from Maon, an ancient King of Phrygia and Lydia, who was thought to have been the Father of Cybele, Mother of the gods, and that long after him reigned Lydus the Son of Arys, and Brother of Tyrhennus, from whom they fancie the Country to have been named. Better is the opinion of Stephanus, who deriveth Maonia from the River Maon or Meander. For, though the Greeks might call them Lydians, yet that their right name was Indians, appeareth from the Latin words, Ludus, Ludo, Ludio, &c. whence derived; seeing it is granted, that the first Players came from (l) Lydia into Hebruria, so to Rome, as the Lydians (m) boasted themselves to have been inventors of those Games, which afterwards were common with them to the Greeks. Hence it appeareth, that though the Country might be called both Lydia and Maonia, from the selfesame thing; yet most ancient was the name of Lud. After the Posterity of Lydus, reigned the Heraclida or those that were descended from Hercules, by his Son Alcaus. The first was Argon, saith Herodotus, the Son of Ninus, Grand-son of Belus, and great Grand-son of Alcaus; the last was Candaules the Son of Myrsus, by the Greeks called Myrsinus. Candaules (n) or Candylos, signified a certain kind of Lydian meat made of Flowre, Cheese, Honey, Bread, and Flesh; the Lydians being accounted the first (o) of all Nations, that busied themselves in Cookery, insomuch that they became a Proverb for it.

The Royal
Lydia

33. The Antiquity of the Lydians appeareth further out of the ancient Fables: Attis, Tamalus, Pelops, Niobe and Arachne, being of this Country: Their fruitfulness, from the Colonies they sent out into Peoponnesus and Caria, into Eururia also, as they say. Their valour and power is shewn to have been of great antiquity from their holding the dominion of the Sea 92 years, which they took from the Cretians about the time of Jephe, and 1200 years before Christ, losing it again and recovering it afterwards. But Candaules with his Family being extinct, and the Kingdom devolved upon the Mermnada (of whom Crasus descended) the power of the Nation grew greater also at Land. These Heraclida, held it the space of 505 years, through 22 Successors unto this Candaules, who so far being enamoured of his Wife as he esteemed her the most beautifull of all women, constrained his servant Gyges to see her naked. She espying Gyges whilst therein he onely satisfied his Masters will, offered him the choice of killing her husband, and marrying marrying her with the Kingdom, or of suffering death himself; one of their two lives being the least she could require in way of Justice. He, in so great a strait, preferring his own safety before his Master's life, slew him in his bed-chamber, the place where the fault was committed, and so enjoyed the Queen with the Kingdom; wherein he was confirmed by the Oracle of Delfos, to the sentence of which, he and his adversaries had agreed to stand.

34. Gyges reigned 38 years, in which space he made War upon Miletus, and Smyrna, and took the City Colophon. Ardys his Son and Successor subdued Priene, fought against Miletus; and in his time the Cimmerians being expelled their seats by the Scythian Nomades, passed into Asia, and took Sardis, all but the Castle. He reigned 49 years. His Son Sadyates 12, who gave place to Alyattes his Son and Successor. Alyattes waged War with Cyaxares King of Media, and expelled the Cimmerians out of Asia, took Smyrna, and set upon Clazomena. In the 6th year of the War betwixt the Median and him, whilst they fought upon equall terms, the Sun was eclipsed, which Thales, one of the 7 wise men, had foretold to his Mileians. Both the armies seeing the day beginning to be turned into night, left off fighting and then by the mediation of Syennesis the Cilician, and Labyrinthus the Babylonian a peace was concluded; Ariena the Daughter of Halyattes being married to Astyages the Son of Cyaxares. From the Tables of Ptoomy (or of Hipparchus) it appeareth that this Eclipse happened in the 4th year of the 44th Olympiad, the 147th of Nabonassar, the 4th day of the Egyptian month Pachon, (which answereth to the 20th of September) 2 hours and 25 minutes before noone; 9 digits being eclipsed, and the duration almost 2 hours. Halyattes pursued also the War left him by his Father, against Miletus, the Inhabitants whereof received from him two great blows, for that none of the Ionians helped them, except the Chians, in way of requitall for the aide they had afforded them against the Erythraeans. At length, having notice that he intended to send a messenger into the City, at the command of Thraasybulus their Prince, they brought all the provision they had into the marketplace; which appearing to be much, and as such related to Alyattes, he thinking himselfe mistaken in his former belief of their distressed condition, made Peace with them; and died after he had reigned 57 years.

35. Crasus his Son succeeded him at the age of 35 years. He made War upon Ephesus, which when he besieged, the Towns-men for their security, gave up the City to Diana, by a rope fastned from the wall to her Temple; but for all this he brought them under and subdued all the rest of the Greek Cities in the continent. He brought into his subjection all the people of Asia within the River Halis, as the Phrygians, Alysiens, Bithynians, Paphlagonians, the Mariandyni, Chalibes, Thracians, Thyni, Carians, Ionians, Dorian, Aolians, Lycians, and Cilicians. Being grown great, and flourishing with wealth, and flourishing with glory, the choicest wits of Greece flocked to Sardis, and amongst the rest Solon the Athenian, who being now in his travells, had been with Amasis of Aegypt, and now came to visite Crasus. He kindly entertained him, and, shewing him his treasures, out of a vain conceit of his own felicity, demanded of him, Whom he thought the happiest Man. He answered, he esteemed for such, one Tellus an Athenian, who having lived in good credit, and leaving divers Children and Nephews of honest and virtuous carriage, died in the War at Eleusine, after he had first helped to put to flight the enemy; for which he was honoured by his Citizens with a publick and stately funerall. Crasus expecting, if not the first, yet the second place, asked him, Whom he accounted next to Tellus. He replied Cleobis and Bison, two brothers of Argos, who had sufficient to live on, and being very strong, had gotten the better in tryall of Masteries. On a time at the feast of Juno, their Mother being to be drawn in a Chariot to the Temple, and the Heifers not at hand, they yoked themselves, and drew her thither. She being much affected with the piety of her Sons, prayed the Goddesse that whatsoever was best for Man, might be bestowed on them, who sleeping that night in the Temple, were found dead in the morning, and honoured by

36. The King was troubled that his felicity should be so little valued, as not comparable to that of private men. But Solon plainly told him, that all things were uncertain in this life, and no man ought to be accounted happy til his End; for which Philosophy, as strange to the Courtiers, he was dismissed with small reputation for learning. Cræsus, growing exceeding proud and irreligious; to humble him, had a dream that the choicest of his two Sons, (whereof one was dumb) should be slain with the iron head of some weapon. Hereupon he removed all things of that nature out of the way, looked to him diligently, and married him out of hand. But at this time it hapned, that a certain wild Boar haunted about the Mountain Olympus in Mysia, which doing great harm to the Inhabitants, they were in no wise able to master, and therefore sent to Cræsus, desiring him to send his Son, accompanied with a sufficient train, to hunt and kill the Wild beast. He plainly denied, because of his dream, to let him stir from home; but the young Man, having a great desire to the exercise, thereby to approve himselfe for activity to his new married wife, obtained leave to be sent, saying, that no such thing would be used in the game as that of which he had dreamed. He committed him then to the care of one Adrastus the Son of Gordius (and he of Midas) King of Phrygia, who having at unawares killed his brother, had been banished by his his Father. When they came into the field, and had dislodged the Boar, Adrastus throwing a dart at him, chanced to hit the young Man, and so fulfilled the dream; for which, offering him selfe to be killed, upon Cræsus his refusal, as done without any intention, he yet slew himselfe. Cræsus took the accident very heavily, and kept himselfe in mourning two years.

37. This mourning was broken off by the prosperity of Cyrus, who having now overthrown the Kingdom of the Medes, advanced highly the affairs of Persia. Herein he found himselfe exceedingly concerned, so as to withstand, if possible, his successe, and make an addition thereby to his own Fortune. For encouragement in this design, he sent to enquire of the Oracles far and near; which answering with one consent, that he should overturn a great Principality, he was much encouraged, not doubting but that of the Persians was meant thereby; and much more after the Oracle at Delphos, had (in answer to his requiry, whether his Empire should long continue) bid him look to himselfe, when a Mule should have possession of the Sovereignty of Media; taking this in a literall sense, notwithstanding the constant ambiguity of such answers. Now (the Oracle giving way to it) he sent to make a League with the Lacedæmonians, who being obliged to him, easily complied; though no supplies do we read of sent to him. For he, being in great haste, prevented the sending of any; and, with all the force he could make, invaded Cappadocia, to revenge, as he pretended, upon Cyrus, the injurie offered to Astyages his Brother in Law; but indeed to lay that fertile Country to his own Dominions. Having passed the River Hays, he came into a place of Cappadocia called Pteria, the most safe of all the Country, near to the City Sinop, which was situated upon the Euxine Sea. Taking up his quarters here, he made incursions, took the City of the Pterians, with all the rest round about, and banished the Syrians (so were the Cappadocians called by the Greeks, till subjected to the Persian Empire) though they had nothing ill deserved at his hands.

38. Cyrus coming against him sent to the Ionians, to draw them to his party; but they standing off, he proceeded, and pitched his Camp against Cræsus. After some skirmishes the Armies engaged, and a very hot dispute continued till night parted them, many falling on both sides. Cræsus, though neither party owned any defeat, was blamed by his Soldiers for engaging with so numerous an Army; so that, Cyrus not stirring out against him the next day, he thought it best to retreat to Sardis, and sent out of hand for aide to Amelis King of Egypt, and Labynirus of Babylon, whom he had by a League obliged to him: to the Lacedæmonians also to dispatch their Auxiliaries within 5. month, with which resting that winter, he would re-invade the the Persians the following Spring. Accordingly he dismissed all his mercenaries standing then in no need of them, as he thought; which Cyrus hearing, resolved with all speed to follow him to Sardis, hoping he might utterly defeat him before he could recollect his Forces: and accordingly marching into Lydia he prevented any message of his coming. Cræsus, though exceedingly perplexed at so unexpected a thing, gathered his subjects together, as time would give leave, and provided for his defence; which the other perceiving, and fearing the power of his Horse (wherein the Lydians excelled all other people of Asia) took off the burthens from all the Camels, that followed the Camp, and setting Riders upon them, placed them in the front; the smell of which (when the Armies joyned) the Horses not enduring, turned aside. Yet were not the Riders thereby deterred from fighting, but, dismounting, performed on Foot what could be expected, till over-powered rather with number than valour, they were put to flight, and besieged in the

39. Cræsus thinking he might possibly be able to hold out some considerable time, sent again to his confederates to hasten their succours. But Cyrus on the fourteenth day of the siege offering a great reward to him that should first mount the Wall, one Hyrades, a Mardian, having taken notice of a place, which because of its height and precipitancy was held impregnable, and therefore neglected by the besieged (where yet he had seen a Souldier come down to fetch his Helmet he had let fall) made means to climb up, and after him more and more followed, till the Citie was thereby surprized. All places being full of slaughters, a Souldier not knowing Cræsus, was about to kill him; which he neglected, as willing to dye with his Kingdom. But his dumb son, affrighted at the danger he saw him in, is said to have broken silence (or dumbness) with this expression; Man, do not kill Cræsus, and thenceforth to have enjoyed the use of his tongue. Thus Cræsus overturned a great principality, as the Oracle had foretold, after he had reigned fourteen years, and been besieged so many dayes. Cyrus adjudged him to death, and had burnt him alive, but that he, almost too late, remembered the words of the wise Law-giver of Athens, and cried out Solon, Solon, Solon! Cyrus commanded the Interpreters to demand of him whom he invoked (thinking it to be some God he mentioned): to which he answered, when compelled to speak, that he named one whom rather than any thing, he would have to speak with all Princes; and, being urged to explain himself, told the whole story concerning the discourse betwixt him and Solon. Herewith the Conquerour was so affected, that, considering the uncertainty of his own prosperous condition, though the pile was already kindled, yet commanded he the fire to be quenched, and receiving him into his most inward counsels, held him ever most dear, and in great esteem for his wisdom; wherein, after such manifold experience, he excelled. This hapned in the fourth year of the 58 Olympiad, the fifteenth year of the reign of Cyrus. A. M. 3460.

40. When the Ionians and Eolians heard that Cræsus, with so little ado, was utterly subdued, they sent to Cyrus, offering to put themselves into his hands, on the same terms as the Lydians were received; but he returned them no satisfactory answer, because of their refusal formerly to joyn with him. All of them then, (except the Milesians, those having yielded themselves) made their application to the Lacedemonians, who refused to grant any aide; but sent some to make discovery how matters went in Asia. The Messengers finding Cyrus at Sardis, according to order, acquainted him with the pleasure of that Republick, Not to suffer him to molest any of the Greek Cities. He enquiring what the Lacedemonians were, presently sleighted them, and answered, That, if the Gods preserved him, they should have cause to bewail their own calamities, and not busie themselves with what concerned the Ionians. He committed Sardis to the custody of Tabalus, a Persian; to Pactyas a Lylian, the Treasure of Cræsus and others: and so set out for Ecbatane, making little account of the Ionians (against whom he in-

After his departure Pactyas revolted, and drawing into Rebellion the Maritime Coasts, besieged Tabacus; whereat Cyrus being angry, as esteeming it a plot of the Lydians, Cræsus fearing worse things might come upon them, after an excuse of the generality, advised him to take from them the use of Arms, and enure them to effeminate courses whereby they would easily be kept under. Cyrus, according to his advise, dispatched away with an Army, one Mazares a Mece, who finding Sarais deserted by Pactyas, put in execution what Cræsus had advised. By this course was brought to passe, that the Lydians, to whom for valour no Nation in Asia could be compared, grew infamous for effeminate nesse and luxury; so that gluttonous (o) and voluptuous persons, (p) such as made it their profession to afford incitements to debauchery, received Epithets from their name.

41. Pactyas having fled to Cuma, Mazares sent to demand him of the Citizens; but, they dismissing him, he fled to Mytilene, and thence to the Chians, who sold him to Mazares. He then reduced such as had revolted, and harraising the Countrey of Priene, with that lying upon Meander and Magnesia, fell sick and died. Harpagus the Mece succeeded him, and out of him undertook an expedition against the Ionians. The Phocæans being first besieged, obtained truce for a day, and then shipping themselves, left their ancient seat and passed over into the Island Chius, and thence (for that the Chians refused to sell them the Islands Oenusa, lest they should thither carry the Traffick) to Cyrnus, where twenty years before, they had built a Citie called Alalia. Here playing the Pirates, they were after five years defeated in a Sea-fight by the Lyrrhenians and Carthaginians, and then those that remained passed over to Rhegium in Italy, where they built a Citie named Hyeia, in the Territories of Oenotria. The Teians also, after their example departed into Thrace; where they built up a Citie called Abdera, the foundations of it being formerly laid by one Iemsius a Clazomenian, whom the Thracians thence expelled. The rest of the Ionians stood it out against Harpagus, who yet utterly subdued and forced them to undergo the yoke the second time, having refused to follow the counsel of Bias the Prienean, (one of the seven wise-men of Greece), who advised them to shun servitude by going to Sardinia, and there planting themselves in one great and common Citie; as they had formerly rejected the advice of Thales the Milesian (mother of that numbe) to set up one common Court at Tous in the middle of Ionis. After the Conquest of the Ionians, Harpagus subdued the Carians, Caunians, and Lycians, and brought all the lower Asia under the Dominion and Sovereignty of Cyrus, who in the mean while not idle, did as much by the upper Provinces; leaving nothing in his way, but clearing all before him.

The Ionians subdued.

And the Affyrans or Babylonians.

42. Having Conquered the rest of the Continent he went against the Affyrans, who, being aware of him, had furnished themselves in Babylon for a long siege. Coming to the River Gyndes (which rising in the Mantienean Mountains, runneth through the Countrey of the Dardaneans, and emptieth it self in Tigris) he could find no ford to passe it, and a certain white Horse, sacred to the Sun, boldly taking the water, was overwhelmed in the Floods. Here it being exceeding angry, he threatened to reduce it to such a condition, as it should not be knee-deep, and accordingly setting all his Army on work, derived it into 260 Rivolets, in which employment he spent all that Summer. The Spring following he marched for Babylon, the King whereof Labinitus opposed him; but, being defeated, retreated into the Citie, to which he then laid close siege. In vain for a long time did he attempt the taking of it. At length he divided his Army, and leaving the two stronger parts of it, the one at that side of the Town where the River entered, the other there where it came out; with the third he retired into the adjoining Fens, and digging great dirches derived the River into them. Hereby he brought it to such an Ebb, that his Souldiers easily passing it, became Masters of the Citie, and he of the Babylonian or Assyrian Empire. This is the sum of what Herodotus hath written concerning the prosperous fortune of Cyrus.

The sum of
ropædia*.

43. Xenophon, contrary to the former story, will have Cambyſes his father no obscure man; but King of Media: not a word from him of his Grand-father's dream, or expoling of the Infant. When he was twelve years old, he was sent for by Aſtyages into Media, where having tarried till almost a man, and being admired for understanding and abilities far above his age; he returned to his father, and entered into the * College of youth, where Aſtyages dying, Cyaxares his son succeeded him, at what time the King of Assyria having subdued all the Syrians, Arabians, Hyrceanians, and had now fallen upon the Bactrians, promised himself the absolute Empire of the East; if he could but bring under the Medes and Persians. He sent therefore to all his Neighbours; to Cræſus King of Lydia, the King of Cappadocia, to both the Phrygians, Cassians, Paphlagonians, Cilicians, and Indians, accusing these two Nations of ambitious designs to enslave them all, and procured them to joyn with him in an offensive and defensive league against them. Cyaxares hearing this, desired of Cambyſes his Brother-in-law to send down Cyrus to him with an Army; Cyrus being accordingly chosen General by the people, first subdued the Armenians, who because of this combination of the Princes, had denied to pay their accustomed tribute to Cyaxares, and then persuaded his Uncle to invade the Assyrians, to keep the War from his own doors.

* Loge de institutione Persarum, Xenoph. Cyropæd. l. I. ad initium.

44. Making then an inroad into Assyria the King thereof, Cræſus of Lydia, and divers other Confederates came against them, but in the first engagement were worsted, and beaten back into their Camp, and amongst others the Assyrian himself (Neriglissor, if any) was slain. The night following all brake out of the Fortifications and fled; whereupon Cyrus prevailing with his Uncle to suffer him to pursue them, with as many of the Medes as would follow him of their own accord, in his way entered into confederacy with the Hyrceanians through the conduct of whom he overtook, and again defeated them: they also slew the Kings of Cappadocia and Arabia. After this, he invaded the Territories of the Babylonians, went up to the Citie it self, and challenged the King to a single Combat, who refusing it, he, after some few skirmishes thereabout, returned to Cyaxares, upon the Borders of Media, to deliberate about carrying on the War: He found him greatly discontented at his success (out of apprehension that he had robbed him of all the glory) and much averse to the War; but at length he appeased him, and so wrought underhand upon the Officers of the Army, that they unanimously voted the War to be carried on. Some time being necessary then for preparation, he chose out a convenient place for the Army's Quarters; and not long after understood by certain Fugitives and Prisoners that the King of Assyria was gone towards Lydia with much Treasure.

45. Cyrus, supposing his design to be for raising men, prepared for the main chance by horning his Persians, inventing new and more convenient Charriots, and, to get intelligence of the Enemy's purposes, sent one Araſpes into Lydia, who, under colour of a revolt, should insinuate himself into their Counsels. This device taking, he disposed of his affairs according as he saw behoofesfull, modelled his Army, and marched against the Confederates, whom without any great difficulty he overthrew, all but the Egyptians. They put him to sore trouble, and endangered his life; but having fallen in upon their Rear, and thereby diverted the Front, he so overpowered them both behind and before, as glad they were to deliver up their Arms, and upon promise of better entertainment, willing to change Masters and serve him. Cræſus now, who commanded in Chief, fled again to Sardis, whether Cyrus pursued him, and getting the Castle into his hands, by the help of a Persian, who had been slave to an Officer in it, got possession both of the Citie and its King. He, coming to Cyrus, acquitted the Oracle of Delphos from from all blame, and took the fault upon himself, in that he, overweening of his own condition, had fooled himself continually in a fond opinion of happiness. After this the Carians falling into two factions, both sent unto him: and he dispatched to them Adusias with some Forces, who overpowering both the one and the other, compounded their differences.

46. Then sent he Hystaspes into Phrygia, who subdued the Country, and took the King prisoner; at what time the Greeks of Asia submitted themselves, procuring by gifts, that they should not be constrained to receive any Garrison, but onely pay Tribute, and serve in the Wars. Afterward, in his march to Babylon, he brought under the greater Phrygia, subdued the Cappadocians and Arabians. He sate down before that City with a vast Army, the walls whereof after he had viewed, he concluded there was no storming of it, and resolved the best way was to pine them out. Understanding then, that they were provided within for a whole year, he divided his Army into twelve parts, assigning to each a moneth to lye in Leaguer, at which the besieged scoffed as utterly out of danger. But Cyrus taking notice how the River ran through the City, caused deep ditches to be made, which by dreining, rendered it fordable, and so taking advantage of a solemn Feast, entered by night, and surprized them all in their cups. The King was slain by Gobryas and Gadatas, who both, being formerly injured by him, had revolted to Cyrus. The Inhabitants, commanded upon pain of death to deliver up their Arms, instantly obeyed. And thus the Babylonian Empire being quite overthrown, Cyrus assumed to himselfe Royall Majesty, serling his Court with great wisdom, wherein Xenophon, in his most exquisite History, maketh him to have excelled, in all things, to admiration.

47. But Ctesias will have Astyages (whom he calleth Astyigas) nothing akin to Cyrus; tells us how he fled to Ecbatane, where he was hid by his Daughter Amytis, and her Husband Spitama: and how Cyrus coming upon them, put them both to the Rack, to make them confesse where he was, with their children Spitaces and Magabemes. Astyigas, rather than they should be tortured, discovered himself, and was first bound with fetters, but afterwards honoured as a Father by Cyrus, who at length married Amytis, having killed Spitama, because he had denied he knew where he was. After the marriage, the Bactrians gave up themselves to Cyrus and Amytis, though formerly they made great and effectually resistance. He relateth also how Cyrus made War upon the Saca, whose King Amorges he took prisoner; but Speretbra the Queen gathered an Army of 300000 Men, and 200000 Women, and therewith overthrowing Cyrus, took him with other prisoners, and thereby redeemed her Husband. With the help then of Amorges he made War upon Crasus, and besieged Sardis, which City he took by a stratageme taught him by Oebares; making images of the Persians, and placing them upon the Walls, at which the defendants were affrighted. But, before this, Crasus deluded by a Spectrum, gave out his Son, an Hostage to Cyrus, and delaying to perform what he had promised, procured his death, which the Mother beholding from the wall, tumbled her self down headlong, and yet was not killed; but, the City being taken, fled to Apollo's Temple and died there.

48. Crasus being bound in the Temple, by an art he had of deceiving the fight, three times was loosed, though the place was secured, and committed to the care of Oebares; for which, they that were bound with him lost their heads. Then was he brought into the Palace and more strongly fetter'd, but was loosed again by Thunder and Lightning. Hereat Cyrus his anger abated, and giving him his liberty, he used him ever after with great respect, and bestowed on him a great City called Barene, near to Ecbatane. After this, Cyrus sent Petisacas his Eunuch to fetch Astyigas from the Barcanians, both he and his wife having a great desire to see him: But Petisacas through the instigation of Oebares left him in a desert place, where he was famished to death. The treachery was revealed by dreams, and Petisacas was given up into the hands of Amytis, who plucked out his eyes, his skin over his eares, and

and then crucified him : Oebares fearing the like punishment , though Cyrus promised him indemnity, killed himself. As for the body of Astyias it was sumptuously buried, having been guarded by Lyons in the Wilderness till Petisacas fetched it away. These improbable things are related by Ctesias.

What Berosus and Abydenus wrote of him. 49. Berosus the Chaldean left recorded that, in the 17th year of Nabonidus, Cyrus, having subdued all Asia, with a great Army, turned against Babylon. That Nabonidus meeting and engaging with him in battell, was overthrown, and betook himself into a Town of the Borsippians. Cyrus besieging Babylon, and considering it was not to be taken in haste, returned to Borsippus, where Nabonidus not expecting a storm, yielded himself; and Cyrus using him kindly sent him from Babylon into Caramania, where he allotted him an habitation. Abydenus (q) further added, that Cyrus bestowed upon Nabonidus, now above 80 years old, the Government of Caramania. This is the summe of what the most antient Historians delivered concerning Cyrus his attainment of the Empire of the East; which hapned about the year of the World 3465, the first of the 60th Olympiad, 538 years before the Era of Christ.

SECT. I. God commanded him to leave his Father's house, and come into the Land which he should shew him; promising to make of him a great Nation, to bless him, and in him all the Families of the Earth. He, obeying his command, drew on his Father also with him, and so (together with Lot, the Son of Haran, and Sarah Abram's wife) they came from Ur of the Chaldeans to Charran and dwelt there. Dwelling there seemeth to intimate a longer stay than of one year; so that some probably think 5 years to have been there spent. For Terah, now very old, might detain them by his weaknesse; they being unwilling to leave him, till they saw him either recovered or dead: But after his death, mindfull of God's command, they left Charran, and came into the Land of Canaan. This journey from Ur to Charran, was the beginning of the 40 years of his, and his posteritie's, sojourning in a strange Land; the promise also made to him being so many years before the promulgation of the Law in Mount Sinai, as the Apostle Paul hath observed.

4. The first place of Canaan in which Abram made any stay, was Sichem; where God again appeared to him, and renewed his Promise; another of giving that Land to his Seed being added to it; and in this place he built the first Altar to the Lord. Thence he removed towards the hilly Country, and the Eastern tract of Luz, (afterwards called Bethel) where he built another Altar; and so proceeded into the Southern Coasts, whence a Famine drove him into Egypt. There he sojourned, and taught the Egyptians Astrology, which Josephus saith, they were ignorant of, till he communicated to them the knowledge of it, and of Arithmetick. His wife being beautifull; for fear of his life, he counterfeited himself her Brother, so that Pharaoh began to cast his affections on her, till, plagued by God, he was constrained to dismiss them both in peace. Out of Egypt then he returned to that place, between Hai and Bethel, where he built the second Altar: Now was he and Lot grown so rich, that no longer could they conveniently live together. Lot being departed to the Plains of Sodom, God again renewed his promise to Abram, which he more largely explained, both as to the giving of the Land, and the propagation of his Posterity. After this, as he was commanded, he went and viewed the Land; then pitch't his Tents in the Plain of Mamre near Hebron, where he built another Altar to the Lord.

5. At this time 4 Kings about the River Euphrates, viz. Amraphel King of Shinar or Babylonia, Arioch King of Ellasar, (thought to be Arabia, because of a City upon the borders of that Country, called Ellas) Chedorlamer King of Elam (afterwards Persia) and Tidal King of Nations (thought to be many petty Kingdoms, adjoining to Phoenicia and Palastine) came and fought against the 5 Kings of the Pentapolis; viz. Bera of Sodom, Birha of Gomorrab, Shinab King of Admah, Shemeber of Zebajim, and the King of Bela (afterwards called Zoar); all who, had 12 years served Chedorlamer; and in the 1th rebelled. They overthrew these five petty Princes, led away much pillage, and many Captives, amongst which was Lot, who then sojourned in Sodom. Abram hearing this, armed 318 servants; and, pursuing them, recovered Lot, and all the prey, which he restored to the owners. In his return, Melchisedech (whom some improbably make Sem) King of Salem (or Jerusalem), Priest of the most high God, brought forth Bread and Wine, and blessed him; to whom he gave the Tithes of all. In this storie Abram is first called an Hebrew by Moses (And there came one which had escaped and told Abram the Hebrew) which word in Scripture, is not found applied to any other before him.

the Hebrew language was not appropriate to Heber as a reward of his piety, because those that descended of him used it not alwayes; and to others, besides his posterity, it appeareth to have been natural. They instance that Laban spake Syriack, and the Canaanites and Philistins the Hebrew naturally; as the names of their men, places, rivers, &c. do shew. Therefore they judge it most probable that Abram speaking the Chaldean language before (which onely differeth in dialect from the Hebrew) got both the name and language, after his arrival in the Land of Canaan. The Heathen (f) Writers thought them to have been called Hebrews from Abraham, as corrupted from Abraheans, out of ignorance of the language. Augustine also once inclined to this opinion, which he afterwards renounced.

7. Abram, after his victory over the Kings, received a more large promise from God, who engaged to become to him a shield, and a sufficient reward; and (for that it troubled him to go childlesse) to give him issue, from which should proceed an innumerable posterity, that, inhabiting a strange Land four hundred years, was to return and possesse this of Canaan, when the iniquity of the Amorites would be full, in the fourth Generation. This League made betwixt God and Abram was confirmed by Sacrifice; yet, Sarai, seeing her self barren, perswaded her husband to go in unto Hagar her handmaid, of which he had a son born to him, and named Ismael, in the eleventh year after his coming into Canaan, the 86 of his Age and of the World, the 2094. In the 12th year after, God made another Covenant with him concerning the seed of Isaack, who was to be born the year following, and Circumcision was instituted as a seal thereof. Now, whereas his name before was Abram, or an High-father, it was changed into Abraham, or Father of a great multitude. And Sarai, which signifieth My Princeesse, or Lady, (as of one family) was altered into Sarah, or a Princeesse absolute; as of many Nations. Not long after, God made known to Abraham his purpose to destroy Sodom, and the other Cities for their abominable wickednesse. He interceded hard for them; but there being not so many as five righteous persons in Sodom, God having taken care for Lot and his family, rained fire and brimstone down upon the Cities, which together with the Plain were utterly destroyed; onely Bela was spared for Lot's sake, who fled thither. Of the rest the Dead Sea (into which the ground was converted) remaineth a lasting Monument to this day. In this Sea (or Lake) no living Creature is bred, having nothing but a Sulphureous matter thence taken in great quantities. It is described to be 72 miles in length, and 19 in breadth. Nigh to it fair and pleasant Apples grow, which being touched, turn into a Sulphureous vapour: and a tradition remained amongst the Heathen of these Cities being destroyed * with Thunder and Lightning from Heaven. Lot's wife, after she had got out of Sodom, looked back, and was turned into a Pillar of Salt. His two daughters, thinking all mankind to have perished, made their father drunk and lay with him; from which incestuous copulation came Moab and Ammon, fathers of the Moabites and Ammonites, two great and powerfull Nations.

He, out of obedience, went about to do it; but God accepting his will for a performance, renewed his promise to him. Sarah died aged 127 years, and after her death Abraham married another wife, called Keturah, by which he had other six sons. To those he gave gifts, and before his death sent them away from Isaack, the Heir of the promise. Chap. 23.
- Isaac* married. 9. When Isaack was forty years old, his father * procured him to wife, Rebecca the daughter of Bethuel, who was son to Nachor, the brother of Abraham. She (married at fourteen years of Age, according to the tradition of the Jews) was barren twenty years; but then her husband beseeching God for her, she brought * forth twins (Esau and Jacob) which struggled in her womb; the elder being, as God foretold, to serve the younger. Fifteen years after Abraham died, being 175 years old, having sojourned in the Land of Canaan a hundred years; 22 after the death of Sem, four before that of Heber; in the dayes of Inachus King of the Argives, 1821 years before the Era of Christ, in the 2183 year of the World. Of Abraham (besides Artapanus and Charan before mentioned) * Berosus the Caldean had some knowledge, though he named him not. Hecataeus not onely made mention of him by the way, but wrote an History of him. Nicolaus Damascus in the fourth book of his Histories, related that Abraham, a certain stranger, reigned at Damascus; having come from a Countrey about Babylon, said to be that of the Chaldeans. That he departed thence with his people into the Land of Canaan, afterwards called Judea, where his posterity grew very numerous; concerning which he should speak in another place. In Josephus his time the name of Abraham was famous at Damascus; where was shewn a certain Village, called Abraham's dwelling. * Apud Joseph Antiq. lib. 1. cap. 7.
- Ismael* dieth. 10. After the death of Abraham, God blessed Isaack, and made the same Covenant with him. In a time of Famine, he also sojourned in Gerar, where dissembling concerning Rebecca his wife, the same thing happened to them as formerly to Abraham and Sarah, from another Abimelech, which name was common to all the Kings of the Philistines. Some years after, Ismael died, aged 137 years, 48 after his father, in the year of the World 2231. Gen. 26.
- His posterity. From his eldest son Nebaiorh, descended the Nabatheans, who (g) inhabited part of Arabia, from the River Euphrates to the Red-sea, called Arabia Petraea, from Petra the Metropolis of the Countrey; which, wanting fruits, abounded in Sheep and Cattel. (h) Diodorus describeth it to have lyen like a Wildernesse untilld, as without inhabitants; without Rivers or Fountains. It was unlawfull with them to sow or plant, to drink wine or build houses, being extraordinary desirous of liberty, and judging these things but temptations, to such as were stronger, to inthrall them. Some of them kept Camels, others Sheep; some used to convey Spices, brought out of Arabia the Happy, to the Sea. When they were invaded by an Enemy, they betook themselves into the Wildernesse, which being vast, and without water, afforded them sufficient protection. Another son of Ismael, named Kedar, gave name to a place of Arabia the Desarts, often mentioned in Scripture. It is thought that, though the Chasaeans, Madianites, and Ismaelites were of several Originals; yet they dwelt promiscuously together, and grew up into one Nation of the Saracens. (g) Strabo lib. 16. p. 779. C. (h) Lib. 19. p. 722. A.
11. Fifteen years after this, Isaack being 138 years old and blind, sent his eldest son Esau to Hunt for Venison, that he might eat and blesse him before his death. But Jacob, by his mother's help, supplanted him, and got the blessing, having formerly bought his birthright for portage. Hereat Esau enraged determined to kill him after his fathers death; which Rebecca knowing, sent him into Mesopotamia to her brother Laban, that he might thence also take a wife out of her own kindred, and not make his choice amongst the Hittites, of which Esau had married two wives. In his journey, God appeared to him in a dream and blessed him; for which cause he changed the name of the place from Luz into Bethel. Coming to Laban, after a moneths time, Chap. 28. 29. 30.

time, he Covenanted to serve him seven years for his youngest daughter Rachel; which being ended, Leah, the eldest was given to him in her stead, and presently after Rachel; for which he agreed to serve him other seven years. Rachel, most beloved, continued barren, and Leah because neglected, obtained favour of God to be fruitfull, which raised such emulation betwixt them, as Rachel first, and then Leah, gave her maid to his bed, accounting the Children begotten on them as their own. Within seven years he had by Leah seven sons, viz. Reuben, Simeon, Levi, Judah, Issachar, Zabulon, and a daughter named Dinah; by Bilhah, Rachel's maid, two sons, Dan, and Naph-tali; by Zilpah, Leah's maid, also two sons, Gad and Asher. Lastly, by Rachel her self one son, named Joseph, and born the fourteen year of his service ending. Six years longer he served Laban for wifes (being to have the Catrel of such and such a colour) which his hard master changed ten times; but could not withstand the providence of God in his growing rich.

12. Having served his father-in-law and Uncle twenty years, and observing what envy he had contracted from him and his sons, he stole away with all he had, and proceeded three dayes on his journey, ere his departure was known. Then Laban with his friends pursuing, overtook him after seven dayes in Mount Gilead, which from the event of this meeting had its name. After several expostulations, they made a Covenant (Laban being warned by God not to hurt him) and, in Testimony thereof, laid together an heap of stones, which Jacob called Galead; but Laban, in his Syrian tongue, Jegar-Sahadutha. Jacob then, continued his journey towards Canaan, wrestling with God's Angel in his way; from which he received a blessing; and the surname of Israel. His brother Esau also met him, and lovingly received him contrary to his fears. The first place he staid at was Succoth, so called because there he built an House, and made Booths for his Catrel. Thence he passed over Jordan, and came to Sichem, where he bought of Hamor, the father of Sichem, a Field, for a hundred Lambs, or so many pieces of money. How long he continued in either of these places is not expressed. Demetrius * and Alexander Polyhistor wrote that he abode ten years in Socot, saying nothing of Sichem; perhaps because he made little stay there. Indeed Dinah seemeth to have been ravished not long after their first coming thither; Hamor speaking to his Citizens concerning them, as persons lately come; and her curiosity to see the women of that Countrey, probably may be thought to have proceeded, from the strangeness of it. At the end of these ten years she was ravished, then sixteen years old; being born a little before Joseph, and perhaps the same year. To be revenged upon Sichem, who committed the rape, her two brothers Simeon and Levi slew him, and put the whole Citie to the sword, coming upon them when they were yet sore by Circumcision, which he had procured them to admit of, that he might obtain the maid for his wife.

13. Jacob much troubled hereat, was commanded by God to go to Bethel, having buried all the strange gods and the earrings of his family under the Oake in Sichem. At Bethel he erected an Altar to the Lord, and here Deborah the Nurse of Rebecca died. Thence he removed to Ephrath, being 107 years old, and when they had almost reached the place, Rachel died in Travel of Benjamin, having (as Demetrius and Alexander wrote) lived with her husband 23 years. Eleven years after Jacob's return into Canaan, when he was now 109 years old, Joseph being hated of his brethren, because he had brought to their father their evil report, and for his dreams (which presaged his preheminance over them) they sold him to the Ismaelites, who carried him down into Egypt, where Potiphar Captain of the Kings Guard bought him, being now seventeen years old. Ten years he lived with him: till refusing to satisfy the wanton desires of his Mistressse, he was falsely accused by her of her own fault, and cast into prison. The year after, he interpreted the Dreams of the chief Butler and Baker of Pharoh, both which were in prison with him; and accordingly the Baker was hanged, but the Butler restored, who yet forgot Joseph.

Isaac dieth.

Edom.

14. At this time his Grand-father Isaac died, aged 180 years, in the 2288 year of the World. He was buried in Hebron, by his two Sons Esaú and Jacob; the former having (as some think they have ground in charity to believe) reconciled himselfe to his Brother, and joyned himselfe to the Church; not being estranged from the Grace of God, but onely from the speciall and particular Covenant, as to the promised Seed; which they have the same reason to think concerning Ismael: The Funerall past, and the Goods divided betwixt them, being both exceeding rich, and therefore requiring large room; Esaú departed to his former possession of Mount Seir; Providence so ordaining it, that when the Israelites should afterwards come to inherit Canaan, his posterity might neither be destroyed, nor displaced. He was otherwise called Edom, and from him Idumæa took it's name, which seemeth from Strabo to have also included the Country of the Nabateans. And likely enough it is, that he who married the Sister of Nebaioth, might joyn himself to them and preside over them. This is the famous Heroe, from whom not onely Idumæa, but also the adjoining Erythraean, Edomean, or Red Sea, (all signifying the same thing) was so called; being known to the Greeks, by the name of Erythrae, the same with Edom.

Joseph advanced.

15. But two years after Joseph had interpreted the Dreams of the servants of Pharaoh, he was called up out of prison, to explain the meaning of one, which the King himself had dreamed. This, betokening 7 years of great plenty to come, and after them as many of famine; and it being necessary, as he hinted to Pharaoh, to chuse out some wise Man, who being set over the Land, should gather and preserve the fruits of the Earth, against the time of want; Pharaoh made choice of him, being about 30 years old, for this purpose: he appointed him next to himself, and gave him in marriage Asenath the Daughter of Potipherah, Priest of On (or Heliopolis, where Strabo writeth, that the Priests of old time had their habitation) on which he begat Ephraim and * Manasses. According to his prædiction, 7 most plentiful years ensued, wherein he gathered into store-houses the Corn that abounded; and after them came 7 other of famine, which prevailed sore both in Egypt and the neighbouring Countries of Canaan and Arabia. Jacob amongst others, wanting provisions, in the 2d year of the famine, sent his Sons down into Egypt to buy Corn. Joseph knowing them, though undiscovered, accused them for coming as Spies, cast them into prison, and dismissed them not, till Simeon (the eldest of those which conspired against his life) was bound, and left as an Hostage, for their bringing down of Benjamin; that so their story might be confirmed, of their being one Man's Sons, and that their youngest Brother was left behind. The next year, being pressed with famine, they returned and Benjamin with them, whom their Father was constrained to let go. Now, after some further terrifying of them, he made himself known, and sent for his Father down into Egypt. Jacob understanding of his Son's life and promotion (whom he had given over of a long time, for dead) gladly went down, and with him 66 Souls, besides his Sons Wives; in the 3d year of the famine, of the World the 2298th, aged 130 years.

16. By Pharaoh's consent, Joseph placed them in the Land of Goshen, and there nourished them during the famine. He sold to the Egyptians the Corn formerly treasured up, and therewith purchased for the King all their Money, Goods, and Lands, except the Lands of the Priests, which were not alienated. The grounds he afterwards granted to the former owners, paying the fifth part of the profit to Pharaoh's use. After Jacob had lived in Egypt 17 years, he adopted the two eldest Sons of Joseph; viz. Manasses and Ephraim, of whom the younger he preferred before the elder: He called his Sons together, blessed them, and told them apart what should befall them in their posterity. From Rouben his first born he took the prebeminence, because he had defiled his bed, and gave it to Judah. He prophesied of Christ's coming, commanded them to bury him in the Cave of Machpelah, in the Land of Canaan, with his Ancestors, and then died at the age of 147 years, in the year of the World 2315. Joseph caused his servants the the Physicians to embalm Israel, and a mourning of 70 dayes (or 72), was observed for him, which number in that Country was onely proper to Kings; Then, obtaining leave of Pharaoh, he and his Brethren, with a great company of Courtiers, carried him into the Land of Canaan, and buried him there, according to his will, where they also mourned for him 7 dayes.

17. Being returned into Aegypt, Joseph forgave his Brethren the fault they formerly had committed against him (which now they feared he would revenge, after their Father's death,) and as long as he lived, he nourished them and their children. This space of time was 54 years after his Father's death, at the end whereof, having exhorted them to Unity and Concord, foretelling them their departure out of Aegypt, and commanding them thence to carry his Bones, he dyed at the age of 110 years, when he had governed Aegypt; under severall Kings, the space of 80. Trogus Pompeius (as appeareth out of Justin * his Epitomizer) wrote many things concerning him, partly taken out of the Sacred History, partly mixed with such Fables as the Heathen were not wanting to invent concerning the Jews. Abram, Moses, and Israel, are made by him Kings of Damascus, which City took it's name from their Predecessor. Israel had ten Sons, to whom he committed the Kingdom, and commanded them to call themselves Jews from Judah, who died before the division, and whose portion was divided amongst them all. The youngest of the 10 Sons was Joseph, whose excellent wit his Brothers fearing, they sold him to some Marchants that carried him down into Aegypt. Here learning the Magick Arts, he became very dear to the King, having skill in working Wonders, and interpretation of Dreams: moreover, nothing either Divine or Humane was beyond his reach; insomuch, that he foretold the barrenness of the ground severall years before it hapned, and all Aegypt had perished with famine, but that the King, by his advice, caused Corn to be treasured up many years: finally, such was his knowledge, that his answers seemed rather the Oracles of a God, then the replies of a Man. Then followeth that Moses was his Son, who, being both wise and beautiful, became a leader to such Aegyptians as were infected with scab and itch, and so returned to Damascus, the Country of his Ancestors. Which lyes (with others hereafter to be mentioned) are to be attributed to the malice of the Aegyptians. With the life of Joseph endeth the first Book of Moses his history, called by the Greeks, Genesis, which containeth the account of 2269 years of the World. The next to it in order of time, the Book of Job is thought to be; of which Moses also is reputed Author, by the common consent and opinion of the Hebrews.

18. After the death of Joseph, and all that generation, the Children of Israel increased abundantly, and grew exceeding mighty; so that the Land was filled with their numbers. But a certain King arising, which knew not Joseph; to keep them down, he pressed them with sore Labour; and lest they should increase, gave order to the Midwives to drowne all the Male Children in the River. At this time (58 years after the death of Joseph, and 41 after that of Levi) Amram, the Son of Caath, and Grand-son of Levi, by Jochabed the Daughter of Levi (so called by an Hebraism, and not Caath's own Sister as some have thought) was made Father of a Son, whom for his beauty they hid 3 moneths, not fearing the Kings command, and when he could no longer be concealed, put him in an Ark of Bul-rushes, daubed within and without with Pitch, and laid him on the brink of the River. Hither the King's Daughter (by Josephus called Thermutis) coming down to wash her self, found the Babe; and moved with compassion, sent for a Nurse, which was Jochabed her self, through the procurement of Miriam her Daughter, which had watched what would become of the Child, and unknown, had offered her selfe for a messenger. Being nursed up, she educated him as her own Son, and called him Moses, because she had take him out of the water. Moy in the Aegyptian tongue, as Josephus * saith, signifying Water, and Ises taken out, though Mosche in the Hebrew is no compounded word, signifying drawn out, delivered, or rather a deliverer; not without

19. But Moses being grown up, by Faith refused to be called the Son of Pharaoh's Daughter, and despised the pleasure of his Court; having, according to Josephus his history, thrown down his Crown, sett upon his head when a Child, and trampled it under his feet; for which, as an ill omen, the Priest (who had foretold, that his Nativity would prove disastrous to the Egyptians) would have had him slain; but he was spared through the affection of Thermutis. Being forty years old, he visited his Brethren the Israelites; and looking upon their burdens, when he saw an Egyptian smiting one of them, he killed him, and hid his bodie in the sand. But this coming to Pharaoh's ear, he was forced to flye for his life, into the Land of Midian, where he kept the Sheep of Jethro, or Hebab, Priest of that Country, who gave him Zipporah his Daughter to wife. Forty years he continued with him, till the burthens of the Children of Israel were grown so intolerable, after above 80 years continuance, that God, being moved with their cries, called to him out of a burning Bush, as he was feeding Sheep, to send him on a message to Pharaoh, about their dismissal. He laboured by all means to make excuse; but at length, confirmed by promise of Divine assistance by Miracles, and the company of his Brother Aaron, (3 years elder); he undertook the employment.

Sent to Pharaoh.

20. This message was ill resented by Pharaoh, and greater burthens imposed on the people; no Straw being now allowed them, for the making of Brick, in which servile worke they were employed. Many signs and wonders were wrought by Moses, in the King's presence, which little availed; Jannes and Jambres, Magicians, doing the same with their Enchantments. Ten Plagues also by the Ministry of Moses, God inflicted upon the Land. 1. The waters were turned into blood. 2. Frogs swarmed in the Land. 3. Lice. 4. Flies and other Insects. 5. A Murrain followed amongst the Cattell. 6. Ulcers in Man and Beast. 7. Thunder and Rain mingled with Fire, and Hail, that destroyed the Corn with the Trees of the field. 8. Locusts covered the face of the Earth, and consumed the fruits thereof. 9. Ensued Darknesse throughout the Land Egypt, such as no Egyptian could stir out of his house, yet the Israelites had light in their dwellings. 10. Last of all, the First-born were slain, from Pharaoh that sat upon the Throne, to the First-born of the Captive in the Dungeon, and the first-born of Cattell.

The Israelites depart.

21. The Nine former Plagues Pharaoh's heart was so hardened as to withstand; but the Tenth forced him to let the people go. Upon the death of the First-born, he and his Subjects thrust them out with haste, out of the Land, and forgot the Jewells of silver and Jewells of gold, which they had lent them. For the Israelites were commanded by God, to borrow these things; and, the night before their departure, to kill a Lamb; with the blood of which they were to sprinkle the lintels of their doors, that the Angel appointed to do this execution upon the First-born, might passe by their houses, at the sight thereof. And, in memoriall of the thing, this they were to do every yeer on the tenth day of that moneth (thenceforth commanded to begin the year, being called Abib) eating a Lamb in a travelling posture, with their loyns girt, and staves in their hands. Thus left they Egypt, 430 years after the first promise made to Abraham, and his leaving Ur of the Chaldeans, 400 after the birth of Isaac, 210 after Jacob's descent into Egypt, in the 2508th year of the World. This their departure is also attested by Heathen Writers; but related to have been upon such grounds, as the Egyptians themselves invented; who, as it seemeth, took occasion from the Plague of Ulcers, which they suffered in their own persons, to feign, that because of Leprosie they were forced out of the Land; as will largely appear in the History of Egypt.

SECT. II.

From the departure of the Israelites out of Egypt, to the death of Solomon, and the Rent of the Kingdom.

The number of the Israelites at their departure.

1. THe number of the Children of Israel may be esteemed by what is recorded concerning their men of War, of the Age of twenty years and upwards. Of these went out about 600000, besides Women and Children; so that if those of that Age be reckoned as two parts of five, of the whole multitude, (which is the usual account amongst all Nations, to reckon men for War, as 40 to 100. in respect of the whole body) then the totall number of all, both old and young, amounted to about 1500000. To these must be added a mixed multitude; which, having taken up their religion, went out with them, and is thought by some to have consisted of as many more; so that the whole sum of all together, at this rate, would arise to 3000000. As for the number of the Israelites, it need not seem incredible, that from about 70 persons in the space of 210 years, so many should proceed. For if but one man, in the thirtieth year of his Age should begin to be a father, and had but in all ten Children, who also with their posterity should beget at the same Age, that one man, before 200 years, would have descended from him, of the sixth Generation 1000000. of the fifth 100000. of the fourth 10000. of great Grand-Children 1000. of Grand-Children 100. and of Children 10. But that the Israelites began to be fathers before the Age of thirty is more then probable; nature * sometimes not requiring half that time, and there is ground sufficient to think that they often exceeded the number of ten Children. The Scripture relateth Abdon to have had forty sons, Abizara thirty, and as many daughters, Gideon seventy sons, and Abah as many. Egyptus, Danaus, Priamus, and Darius, are reported to have had fifty Children; Artaxerxes, Justin relateth to have had 115. and Hierotimus 600. These things (to add no more) prove the great increase of the Israelites to have been possible in the course of Nature, although not without an especial providence.

2. Moses had gathered the people together, as Josephus writeth, about Rameses the chief Citie of Goshen, that they might be in a readinesse, and thence they came to Succoth where was their second sturion. Here Moses propounded the command of God concerning the annual observation of the Passover, and the Consecration of the first born. A ready way hence to the Land of Canaan would have been through that of the Philistins; but because the Israelites were born in slavery, and therefore had but low and poor spirits; to exercise them, to stir them up, and lest, for want of experience, they should be so terrified as to return, God lead them another and longer way. From Succoth therefore they came to Etham in the end of the Desert, in two dayes; whither God conducted them by a Pillar of a Cloud by day, and Pillar of fire by night, that never forsook them, till they came to the Borders of the promised Land. From Etham they journeyed to Pihahiroth, and thence to the Red-sea. Hither Pharoh pursued them with all his Forces, repenting he had let them go. They were there exceedingly struck with terror, and murmured against Moses, for bringing them out of Egypt. In this extremity God divided the waters of the Red-sea, which being as a Wall on both sides to them, they passed over on dry ground. The Egyptians essayed also to pursue them in this place; but the Pillar then removed from before them, and placed it self between them, giving light to the Israelites, but causing great darknesse to their Enemies. Hereupon ensued great consternation, and a pännick fear amongst the Egyptians, which causing great disturbance, the Lord also fought against them, and they fled. But then the waters returned to their place and overwhelmed them all, so that neither Pharoh, nor any one of his men escaped. This place of the Red-sea being

3. From the Red-Sea they journeyed three dayes through the Wildernesse of Etham; (which, as it seemeth, stretcheth forth it self to both the sides of the Sea) where they found no water. Thence they came to Marah, where they found water, but bitter, and thence the place had its name; which bitterness was removed by the casting in of a certain Tree which God shewed to Moses. From Marah they came to their fifth station at Elim, where were twelve Fountains of water, and seventy Palm-Trees, and thence to the Red-Sea; which name seemeth to be applied to some Bay or Creek thereof. From the Sea they came into the desert of Sin, where they pitched their Tents on the fifteenth day of the second moneth after their departure. Here murmuring for flesh, Quails were rained down upon the Camp at evening, and in the morning was there found Manna, which continued every morning to fall, all the forty years they abode in the Wildernesse. This Wildernesse of Sin being very large, and reaching as far as Mount Sinai, they had several stations in it. The ninth was at Diphka, the tenth at Alush, the eleventh at Rephidim, where the people again murmuring for water, the Rock being struck by Moses gushed out into streams. Whil'st they here continued, the Amalekites (descended from Amalek, who was the son of Eliphaz, and Grand son of Esau) fell in upon their rear, and made slaughter of the weaker sort. Moses against them sent Joshua the son of Nun, he himself in the mean time praying to God in the Mount. And as long as his hands were lifted up the Israelites overcame, but when he let them down the Amalekites prevailed; so that Aaron his brother, and Hur his sister Miriam's husband, bore them up till the going down of the Sun.

Exod. 17.

The Decalogue.

4. In the third moneth they removed, and took up their station in the desert of Sinai, over against the Mountain Horeb (which 'tis thought was some part of Sinai) and here they continued almost a year; to the 20th day of the second moneth of the next year. Upon this Mountain, God gave the Law of the ten Commandments in a terrible manner, on the 50th day after their coming out of Egypt, as * some of the Ancients apprehended. The day after, several other Laws were promulgated, as it were Commentaries upon the Decalogue, both Judicial and Ceremonial. Then Moses having Offered Sacrifice, read the book of the Law to the people, and made a Covenant betwixt God and them, and went up into the Mount where he remained forty dayes: six in the lower and cloudy, and 34 in the highest and fiery part. In this space of time he received advice concerning the structure of the Tabernacle, the Ornaments and Consecration of Priests, &c. From this familiar Converse of God with Moses, the Heathen Law-givers took occasion to feign such a privilege to themselves. As amongst the Getes, Zamolxis gave out he received two Laws from Vesta. Zathraustes amongst the Arimaspians from a good Dæmon. Mneves, amongst the Egyptians, from Mercury, Minos the Cretian, from Jupiter. Lycurgus the Lacedæmonian from Apollo, and Numa the Roman from the Goddess Egeria. To this number * Diodorus, out of Ethnick ignorance, addeth Moses himself, writing that he counterfeited conference with the god Jaus.

The molten Calf.

5. But the people missing Moses so long a time, and not knowing what was become of him, raised a tumult, and caused Aaron to make them a god that might go before them. The Hebrews have a Tradition that Hur, opposing this, was slain; but Aaron, overcome with their furious importunity, made them a molten Calf of Gold, after the fashion of the Egyptians, who worshipped two Heifers, Apis and Mnevis, which they accounted gods. Forty dayes, and as many nights being ended, God gave Moses two Tables of stone, wherein was written the Decalogue by his own finger, and sent him down, telling him wherein his people were employed. Moses something ap-appealing Gods wrath came down from the Mount ; but seeing them dance before the Calf , in a great rage cast the Tables out of his hands and brake them. He put the Calf into the fire, and grinding it to powder threw it into the Brook, and made them to drink of the water : then commanded the Levites to take every man his sword, and slay his Neighbour ; so that of the people fell that day about 3000 men. After this, going up into the Mount the second time , he interceded for the people , and at his return , removed the Tabernacle, or Tent, wherein he used to speak with God , out of the Camp, in token of the Lords displeasure. He hewed two new Tables of stone like to the former , and having given order for the making of an Ark of Wood, and all things about the Tabernacle, according to the pattern shewed him in the Mount , he went up the third time, and continued there forty dayes and as many nights without eating any thing, as before. In this time God wrote anew the ten Commandments ; and, being pacified, renewed the league conditionally, and proposed other Laws to the people. When Moses returned his face shone , so that he put thereon a vail when he spake to the multitude, to which he declared Gods commands, urged the observtion of the Sabbath, and the offering for making of the Tabernacle ; in the work whereof, the latter part of this year was spent by Bezaleel, and his Companions.

The Tabernacle reared.

6. On the first day of the first moneth of the second year, was the Tabernacle reared, and in this moneth were these things done which are spoken of in the third book of Moses, cilled Leviticus. On the fourteenth day was the passeover celebrated in the Wildernesse of Sinai. On the first of the second moneth God commanded Moses to number all the Isra-Elites, except the Tribe of Levi, from twenty years old to sixty ; the number of whom amounted to 603550. just so many as had been found seven moneths before, when the contribution was to be made for the Tabernacle. On the 20th of the same moneth, the Cloud which rested on the Tabernacle removed, and they following it in four Armies came from the Wildernesse of Sinai to that of Paran, where they stayed 23 dayes in their 12th Mansion of Kibroth-Hattaavah. Here the people, weary of their Heavenly bread, lusted after the flesh of Egypt, and were punished with a sudden fire, which devoured many, and was at length quenched by the prayer of Moses. Here also Moses complaining to God of the great burthen which lay upon him ; the Sanhedrim of the seventy Elders was instituted. In this place, moreover, God gave the people Quails for a whole moneth on which they surfeited, so that a plague arose whilst the flesh was yet betwixt their teeth, and many perished. Hence the place had its name of Kibroth-Hattaavah, or the Sepulchers of concupiscence.

The Sanhedrim.

Miriam struck with Leprosie.

7. From Kibroth-Hattaavah they removed to Hazereth, where Aaron and Miriam spake against Moses about his wife ; Miriam for that, was struck with Leprosie, and cast out of the Camp ; till Aaron, confessing their fault, and interceding to Moses for her, he prayed to God, and she was healed. She being after seven dayes received again into the Camp, they removed, and came to Richma, near unto Cadesh-barnea, in the same desert of Paran. In the fifth moneth of the second year, and the time of Vintage, Caleb the son of Jephunne, Joshua the son of Nun, and ten other principal men were hence sent to spy the Land of Canaan. After forty dayes they returned, bringing with them of the fruit of the Land. Caleb and Joshuah encouraged the people, but the rest utterly disheartned them, causing them to despair ever to possesse it, because of the strength of the walled Towns and the Gyants which there lived. This raised such a mutiny, that they not onely murmured against Moses, but spake of making them a Ciprain, and of returning into Egypt, threatening to stone Caleb and Joshua, who laboured to the contrary. This so highly provoked the Lord, that he threatened suddenly to destroy them, and being prevailed with by Moses to mitigate his wrath, denounced that none of twenty years and upwards should ever enter into the promised Land, but wander up and down till their Carkeises fell in the Wildernesse ; except Caleb and Joshua. And this sentence was presently executed upon the ten, which had caused the sedition.

The Spies search the Land.

The Israelites
to turn back.

8. When they had therefore now arrived at the borders of the promised Land, they were commanded to turn back again into the Wilderness towards the Red Sea. But to make some amends, as they thought, for their late fear and cowardise, they arose in the morning; and, against the expresse command of Moses, went up into the Mountain to fight, where the Amalekites and Canaanites that there inhabited, smote and discomfited them even unto Hormah. At their return they wept before the Lord, but were not heard; and upon this occasion, and the death of those that fell daily in the Desert, Moses, as it's thought, composed the 90 Psalm, wherein complaining of Humane frailty, and shortnesse of life, he signifieth that Man's age was reduced to 70 or 80 years; and so now the third time was it, as it were, cut shorter by the halfe; the two former having been immediatly after the Flood; and again, in the time of Phaleg, at the division of the Earth.

9. Thenceforth, from their departure from Cades-Barnea, are numbred 17 more stations in the Wilderness of Paran, wherein they spent 38 years, wandring about, till all the rebellious ones were consumed. The things which hapned in those years, cannot certainly be fixed upon any particular one, Moses herein being silent. Yet it is thought, that the History of the Man that gathered sticks on the Sabbath day, and for it was stoned; of the rebellion of Corah and his Companions, of Aaron's Rod that budded, &c. are to be referred to the latter part of the second year; none of the forty, except the two former and the last of all, being taken notice of by Moses, who recordeth onely the 17 mansions which were taken up, during the 37 years that passed between. The 17th and the last of these (being the 32nd mansion reckoned from the beginning) was at Ezion-gaber, upon the Red Sea in the Country of the Edomites, whence they came to Cades, where they took up their 33 mansion. Hierome and others, account this Cades the same with Cades-barnea the 15th station, making the Israelites to have after so many windings and turnings, in so many years, returned to the same place. But, others finding Cades-barnea in the Southern confines of Canaan, will have this Cades or Kadesh, a place different from it, and near to Ezion-gaber upon the Red Sea, (whence they immediately passed to it) in the Desert of Zin. Whilst they remained in Cades, Miriam died at the age of 126 years, and was there buried. After this the people murmured, because the water which had hitherto followed them from the Rock Rephidim, here failed, being, as some think, swallowed up of the Red Sea. Hereupon Moses and Aaron were commanded onely to speak to a Rock in that place, to give out water; but Moses, wearied with the untowardnesse of the multitude, uttered some words of impatience and diffidence, and struck the Rock twice, so that the water gushed out in great abundance. Because they did not sanctifie God in the eyes of the people, he was angry with them, and excluded them both from entering into the Land of promise.

10. Moses afterwards sent to the King of Edom, desiring leave to passe quietly through his Country; but, he opposing, he led the people by the borders from Kadesh unto Mount Hor, where Aaron died, some 4 moneths after his Sister Miriam, at the age of 123; in the 40 year of their wandring in the Wilderness; and Eleazer his Son succeeded him in the Office of High-Priest. In the 6th moneth of the 40 year, the King of Arad, who inhabited the southern parts of Canaan, came out against them and took many prisoners; whereupon, they vowed, if God would deliver his Country into their hands, to destroy his Cities. Hereunto God assenting, they went up, and prospering, gave to the Country the name of Hormah, which is the same with Anathema, or Cursed. Then journeyed they from mount Hor, to compass about the Land of Edom (against which God had charged them not to fight, because of their Ancestors) and came to the 35th mansion of Tsalmona, which signifieth an image. For here the people murmuring against the Lord and Moses, because of the tediousnesse of the journey, and loathing Manna, were bitten by fiery Serpents sent by God (the Greeks call them Dypsades, and Ælian maketh them chiefly to breed in Arabia); so that many perished without without remedie. At length, Moses by God's appointment erected on a pole a brazen Serpent, upon which as many as looked, were presently made whole.

SECT. 2.

11. From Tsalmona they came to Punon, thence to Obooth, and so to Jic-Abarim, on the borders of Moab, in the Desert thereof, towards the Sun-rising. Here runneth the Brook Zared, towards which, when they passed, God commanded them not to make War upon the Moabites, who had formerly beaten hence Giants called Emmim, as their Bretheren the Ammonites had also oured others, known by the name of Zmzumim. Thirty eight years after their removall from Kades-barnea, the Israelites passed Zared, all the carkeises of the rebellious being in this space fallen in the Wildernesse, and came to their 39th Mansion of Dikon-Gad. Thence they travelled to Almon-Diblahaim, still in the Desert of Moab, and being to touch upon the borders of the Ammonites, God forbade them to molest these also, because descended of just Lot. He commanded them to passe over the River Arnon; which having done, they removed to their 41st Mansion, in the Mountain of Abarim, over against Nebo.

Chap. 33, & 34.

Sihon King of Heshbon.

12. Out of the Wildernesse of Kedemoth, Moses sent to Sihon, the Amorite, King of Heshbon, to desire leave peaceably to passe through his Borders; but he refused, and opposed them at Jabaz, where he was discomfited and slain. The Israelites thus became Masters of his Cities and Country, which (as Josephus writeth) lay like an Island between three Rivers; Arnon on the South, Jabock on the North, (which falling into Jordan, loseth it's name) and Jordan it self on the West; being on the East, bounded with the Mountains of Arabia. As they proceeded by the way of Basan, Og King thereof, who remained of the Giants called Raphidim, opposing them, was also slain, and his Country wholly subdued, with the destruction of it's Inhabitants; and in like manner all Argob (afterwards called Trachonitis) wherein were Sixty Cities. After these Victories, they removed from the Mountains of Abarim, and came to their 42^d and last Mansion (taken up by Moses) near Jordan, lying from Jesimoth unto Shittim or Abel-Shittim, in the plains of Moab, which was so called, because the Moabites formerly possessed them, till driven beyond Arnon by the Amorites. Here they continued till they were led thence by Joshua, to passe over Jordan.

13. When Balack King of Moab had heard all that the Israelites did to the Amorites; lest under pretence of passage, they might also seize upon his Kingdom, he consulted with the Midianites, and sent into Mesopotamia for Balaam the Son of Beor, the Soothsayer, to come and curse them; intending afterwards, to fall upon them. Balaam, having the pleasure of God revealed to him, at first feared to come: and though he came at the second message, and laboured all he could to curse them; yet was he over-ruled, and his curse turned into a blessing. But although he had no power to curse, yet he advised the King to that which tended especially to their destruction; To send some of the most beautifull Women into the Camp, to draw them both to Carnall and Spirituall Fornication; the later of which was committed with Baal-peor, the Idoll of the Moabites. God being angry hereat, commanded the principall of the Idolaters to be hanged up before the Sun, and Moses gave order to the Judges, to slay every one his men: A Plague also brake out amongst them, whereby in one day fell 23000 Men; to which those that were hanged and fell by the Sword, being added, advance the number to 24000. Phineas the Son of Eliazar the Priest executing judgment upon Zimri an Israelite, and Cozbi a Midianitish Woman, in the act of Fornication; the Wrath of God was thereby appeased, and the Plague staid.

14. A little after, God commanded Moses the third time to number the people. In this space of 40 years all the Men of War were perished, except Caleb and Joshua, which amounted to the number of 602000. Yet was there by this time such a supply of young ones grown up, that they almost equallized the number of their Fathers; there being found 601730, from 20 years old

SECT. 2. and upwards, besides 23000 Levites, reckoned from a moneth old. After this, Moses, by Gods command, sent Phineas with 12000 Men against the Midianites, who had conspired with the Moabites against them. He destroyed them, and amongst them Balaam the Soothsayer, who, as it appeareth, was not yet returned. The Women they brought away Captives; whereof the Married-ones they slew, and kept the Virgins for themselves. Now were the Lands of Sihon King of the Ammorites, and Og King of Bashan, divided amongst the Reubenites, Gadites, and the half Tribe of Manasses, on this condition, that they should accompany their bretheren over the River Jordan, and assist them in the conquest of the Land of Canaan, so long as need should require.

15. The time now drew near, that Moses must dye, being not to passe over into the Land of Canaan. Therefore in the 11th moneth of the 40th year, he made a repetition of the Law to the people, related God's benefits bestowed on them, and exhorted them to obedience. The Law he wrote in a Book, and commanded it to be read every 7th year, at the Feast of Tabernacles. He also, at the command of God, wrote a Song concerning the future Idolatry, and afflictions of the Israelites. Joshua being then ordained Captain of the people in his stead, he ascended from the plains of Moab to Mount Nebo, part of the Mountains of Abarim, and whose top is called Phasga or Pisgab, looking towards Jericho. There God having shewn him the Land of Canaan, from the one side to the other, he died some 5 months after Aaron, being 120 years old (the third part of which time saving one moneth, he spent, as * Josephus writeth, in Government) in the 40 year ending, after he had brought the Israelites out of Egypt, the year of the World 2548. God buried him in the Valley of Moub over against Beith-Peor, and no Man knoweth of his Sepulcher to this day. Concerning his body, a contest hapned between Michael the Arch-Angel and the Devill; the reason of which is thought to be, because Satan would have had the place thereof known, that the people might be drawn to Idolatry out of reverence to so great a person. The Israelites mourned for him 30 dayes, and with his life endeth the Pentateuch, or his five Books. The Book of Joshua followeth, taking it's beginning from the 41th of the departure out of Egypt, and the 2549th year of the World.

16. Whilst the Israelites were still mourning for Moses, the two Spies were sent over Jordan, (as some think) to search the Land. The next morning after their return, the whole Host removed from Shutim, and came to Jordan, where they lodged that night, and the next day passed over the River. As soon as the feet of the Priests which bare the Ark touched the water, it fell off on both sides and made a way; so that they went over on dry ground, the floods not returning to their place, so long as the Ark remained in the chinnel. On the 10th day of the first moneth Nisan, they arrived in the Land of Canaan, and took up their first Mansion at Gilgal, not far from Jericho. Here, (it's thought the next day) God commanded that all the Males should be circumcised, this Sacrament being omitted ever since they left Mount Sinai; because they were in constant expectation of travell: upon which account neither had they kept the Passeeover since that time. Three dayes they rested, and on the fourth they did eat the Passeeover, and the day following unleavened bread of the Corn of the Land, at which time Manna ceased, after it had continued 40 years.

The first place they fell upon with War, was the City of Jericho, which having compassed with the Ark seven dayes, on the seventh the walls fell down of their own accord, the City was taken, and all therein put to the sword, except the Family of Rahab (she, having harboured the Spies, had security promised from them) whom Salmon of the Tribe of Judah married, to whom she bare Boaz. All the goods found therein were also accursed, nothing thereof to be made prey; which Law Achan transgressing, caused Israel to be discomfired at Ai, and for that was first stoned, and then burnt, with all that belonged to him. successes, combined against him; but the Gibeonites, fearing the worst, counterfeited a Message to him as from a far Countrey, and procured safety to themselves and posterity; yet such, as slavery was joyned therewith. Adonisedek King of Jerusalem, and the Kings of Hebron, Jarmuth, Lachish, and Deber, enraged hereat, conspired against them and fell upon their Citie; to the relief whereof Joshua being called, raised the siege, and prosecuting his victory against the Kings, at his command the Sun stood still over Gibeon, and the Moon in the Valley of Ajalon. Upon which strange miraculous accident this is observed, that Ajalon being scarce a German mile Westward of Gibeon, the Moon, as 'tis probable, was then decreasing, or in the wane, and, these two Luminaries standing still and moving together, the Astronomical account was thereby nothing at all disturbed.

Joshua vanquisheth the Kings.

18. Joshua drove the five Kings to that streight that they hid themselves in a Cave at Makkedah, where after he had utterly vanquished and destroyed their Armies, he took them, and killing them, hanged their Carcasses on five Trees till Sun-set: then cast them into the Cave and laid a great heap of stones thereon. After their death he warred with many other petty Kings, as with the King of Libnah, Lachish, Gezer, Eglon, Hebron, and the rest: there was not one Citie that made peace with Israel save the Hivites, the inhabitants of Gibeon; all others they took in battel, and utterly destroyed, except such as it pleased God to reserve, for a lash and scourge, wherewith to reduce them in times of Rebellion and for their exercise to be as Thorns in their eyes, and Goads in their sides. The Canaanites being thus deprived of their ancient habitation by Joshua and the Israelites; Many of them, as is conjectured, removing to the Mediterranean-Sea, (where they were known afterwards by the name of Phœnicians) continued not all there, but spread themselves abroad, and sent Colonies far and wide into many places of Europe, Asia, and Africk, concerning which that excellent book of Bochartus, called Canaan, is to be consulted. That is remarkable, which * Procopius mentioneth concerning Pillars erected in the Province of Africk, called Tingitana, with a Phœnician-inscription to this purpose: We are they who fled from the face of Joshua the Robber, the son of Nane. How long this War continued till the division of the Land, is not expressed in Scripture; yet is thence to be gathered. For Caleb being forty years old when with others he was sent by Moses to search the Land, was at the time of the Division, as he saith, 45 years older. Now the Spies were sent out in the fifth moneth of the second year, after their departure out of Egypt, or sooner; so that from that time to the entrance into Canaan, followed almost 39 years; (the Israelites being forty years in the Wilderness) which being deducted out of the said forty five, six years and some few remain; during which the War in Canaan must have continued.

The Clerouchia or division of the Land.

19. The Clerouchia then, or division of the Land, fell out in the beginning of the seventh year from their entrance into Canaan, and in the year of the World 2555 also beginning. It continued about one year, as some gather from the story. First of all, an inheritance was given to two Tribes and an half, viz. the Tribes of Judah, Ephraim, and the other half Tribe of Manasses. Then met the Israelites together in Shiloh, because seven other Tribes yet remained undisposed of. Therefore certain men were sent from that place to bring a Survey of all the Land, which could not be done in a few dayes; and then after their return the division was perfected; for all which no lesse then the space of a year seemeth necessary. So, there are from the beginning of the World to the end of this Division, 2555 years, containing just so many weeks of years as there are natural dayes in a year, viz. 365. Or if we make a great year consisting of so many years as the solar year consisteth of dayes; then have we six (or seven) such great years. It is further observable, that from the beginning of the World, to the entrance of the Israelites into Canaan may be reckoned so many Jubilies of years (viz. 52.) as are dayes in the seventh part of a Solar year, one onely excepted. The War having endured six years, they rested on the seventh, wherein the Division was made, as in the Sabarical year.

The rise of Sabbatical years and Ju-bilies.

20. The rise therefore, and beginning of the Sabbatical year, and of Jubilies, some chuse rather to fetch from the first entrance into Canaan, then from the division of the Land. For though they began not to sow the Land on this side Jordan till after the division; yet before this, had they taken possession of the Countrey lying beyond the River, which was divided betwixt the two Tribes and the half; whereof, though it must be granted that those which were fit for War, accompanied their brethren over Jordan, according to the charge laid upon them by Moses, yet is it to be supposed that those which staid behind were nourished by the fruits of that soyl. For Manna had already ceased, and the Corn which the other reaped of the Enemies sowing being but gotten by degrees, according as they Conquered the Countrey, could scarce maintain them without sending for supplies to those that staid beyond the River. When they had ended the division, the Children of Israel give for an inheritance to Joshua that which he asked, even Limneth Serab in Mount Ephraim, where he built a Citie, and dwelt therein. The Tabernacle of the Congregation was set up at Shiloh by the whole Assembly. As for the Levites they had no inheritance assigned them, but (the Lord being their inheritance) they were to live of Tithes & Offerings. Onely 48 Cities on both sides of Jordan were set apart for them to dwell in, which were also to be Cities of refuge, whither those that were guilty of casual homicide might fly from the avenger of blood, and there remain in security till the death of the High-Priest. Joshua being very old at the division, is by the Jews said to have lived, past the first Sabbatical year, but to have died before the next arrived. Some give to his government twenty years, and some above; but others think he died, not long after the division. There is no certainty thereof from Scripture; but that he lived a hundred and ten years is expressly recorded.

Joshua dieth.

fall to idola-

21. After Joshua and that generation were dead, which had seen the wonders of the Lord, another arose after them that knew not the Lord, nor the works he had done; so that the Children of Israel followed other gods, serving Baal and Asharoth. For this cause the anger of the Lord was hot against Israel, and he delivered them into the hands of spoilers which spoiled them. He sold them into the hands of their Enemies round about, insomuch that they could not stand before them; but whithersoever they went out, the hand of the Lord was against them for evil, as he had said and sworn. Nevertheless he raised them up Judges to deliver them out of the hands of those that spoiled them; and yet they would not hearken to their Judges, but went a whoring after other gods, and bowed themselves unto them. Hereupon the Lord resolved not to drive out thenceforth any Nations before them, which Joshua left when he died, that by them he might prove Israel whether they would keep his way and to teach them War. There were left five Lords of the Philistines with all the Canaanites, the Sidonians and Hivites that dwelt in Mount Lebanon, from Mount Baal Hermon, unto the entering of Hamarh. The Children of Israel dwelt amongst the Canaanites, Hittites, Ammorites, Perizzites, Hivites, and Jobusites: they took their daughters to be their wives, gave their daughters to their sons, and served their gods.

Chap. 3.

Cush is oppressed
by them.

22. For this, the anger of the Lord was hot against Israel, and he sold them to the hand of Cushan-rishaim King of Mesopotamia. How long this was after the division, the Scripture expresseth not. We read that he oppressed them eight years, but some think it should be read in the eighth year, viz. after the division, or eighth years, because this servitude ended in the eight. But that it began not immediately after the division, neither after the death of Joshua, seemeth evident; because the Israelites served the Lord as long as that Generation lasted, which had seen his wonders; which cannot be conceived extinct at the same time with him. Others think a longer time then seven years to have passed betwixt the division and this oppression, assigning fourteen years to the government of Joshua after the division, then ten more to the government of the Elders after his death, who might very well live longer then so; none that were twenty years old when they came out of Egypt having entred Canaan except Joshua and Caleb. After that, as many years they attribute to an Anarchy, in the sixth year of which they will have the Civil War to have broken out betwixt Benjamin and the rest of the Tribes, wherein all the Benjaminites except 600 were slain. Four years after this War, and at the end of the 10th. Cushan the King of Mesopotamia afflicted Israel for its idolatry eight years. But concerning this there is no certainty.

Eglon oppresseth them.

Delivered by Ehud.

23. At the end of the eight years, God stirred up for a deliverer, Othniel of the Tribe of Judah, Nephew to Caleb by his younger brother Kenaz, and his son-in-law. Into his hands the Lord delivered Cushan, and the Land had rest fourty years. After his death (which is set to the end of these fourty years) Israel turned again to idolatry, and the Lord delivered them up to Eglon, King of Moab for eighteen years. At the end of this term he stirred up Ehud a left-handed man of the Tribe of Benjamin, who under colour of a message stabbed Eglon into the belly, and gathering the Israelites together on Mount Ephraim, slew 10000 of the Moabites, all men of War. After this, the Land is said to have rested 80 years, the words being taken literally; but then some think none of the years of the Tyrants, or Oppressors, are to be counted severally, and by themselves, but to be included herein as other years after mentioned; else the account will swell much larger then the whole number of years, which the Scripture seemeth to allow of. If we take in all the years ascribed to the Tyrants, then they will have it an Enallage (frequent in all Languages) and instead of 80. Ehud governed, or the Land rested under him onely eight years; but others think they have as much reason to take them literally.

Judg. Chap. 3.

Shamgar judgeth Israel.

Jabin oppresseth them.

And the Philistins.

Deborah and Barach deliver them.

24. After Ehud, Shamgar the son of Aneth judged Israel, but no mention is made of any time. It followeth, when Ehud was dead the Children of Israel did evil again in the sight of the Lord, and he sold them into the hand of Jabin, King of Canaan, whose General was Sisera, and who had 900 Chariots of iron: he mightily oppressed them twenty years. It is most probable that in this time the Government of Shamgar was included, (he slew with an Oxe-goad 600 of the Philistins, who at this time might also afflict Israel): or else it being but short might fall betwixt Ehud's death, and the oppression of Jabin; there being probability enough that some time passed after his death, before the Israelites so highly provoked the Lord as to be given up into Jabins hands. At the end of these twenty years Deborah, the wife of Lapidoth (judging Israel at this time in Mount Ephraim) moved by God sent for Barak, the son of Abinoam from Kadesh-Naphtali, and made him Captain. He, with 10000 men of Zebulon and Naphtali, overthrew Sisera, who flying on his feet to the Tent of Heber the Kenite (descended of Jethro, father-in-law to Moses) Jael his wife killed him by a Nail driven into his Temples as he lay asleep. So the Land rested under Deborah fourty years as we read it, * another interpreting it in the 40th year, viz. after the rest restored to it by Ehud.

Gideon delivereth them.

25. This time expired, and the Israelites relapsing to idolatry, God gave them up into the hands of the Midianites, and other people of the East, which afflicted them seven years, destroying their Corn, driving away their Cattel, and making havock of all things. This made them cry to the Lord, who first reproved them by a Prophet; and afterwards, by an Angel stirred up Gideon, the son of Joash, of the Tribe of Manasses, to deliver them. He having pulled down the Altar of Baal, and burnt his grove, out of 23000 men chose 300. with which number marching against the Midianites, he so affrighted them by a stratagem of Lamps and Pitchers, that he routed their whole Army. The Ephraimites took Oreb and Zeeb: Gideon following the Chace beyond Jordan wholly discomfired them, and took, and slew two Kings of the Midianites; Zeba and Zalmanna. After so great a victory the Israelites offered him the Kingdom; but he refused it, and asked onely the earrings of the prey, wherewith he made an Ephod which afterwards gave occasion to idolatry (all Israel going a whoring after it) and became a snare to him and his

26. Though Gideon refused the Sovereignty, yet Abimelech his base Son thinking such a thing was not to be neglected, dealt with the Sichemites, of whose City his Mother was native, to make him King: and by their help he seized on the Kingdom, having slain his Seventy Brethren upon one stone; Jotham the youngest onely escaping. The Israelites, after Gideon's death, had again turned after Idols, and therefore God not onely subjected them to the Dominion of this most wicked of all parricides, but to intestine dissensions, by reason of him. For after he had tyrannized three years, Gaal with the Sichemites conspired against him, which having timely discovered, he destroyed them and their City (sowing it with Salt) and burnt the house of their god Berith, with a thousand Men and Women which had fled to it. Then went he against Thebez, and took it, the Inhabitants whereof retired for defence into a strong Tower. Here, as he was about to set fire to the door, a Woman cast down a piece of a Mill-stone upon his head, and so brake his skull, that he caused his Armour-bearer to kill him, lest it should be said, that he died by the hands of a Woman. After his death, Tolah, the Son of Puah, the Son of Dodo, a Man of Issachar, that dwelt at Samir in Mount Ephraim, arose to defend Israel, and judged it 23 years. After him Jair a Gileadite 22 years, thought to be descended of that Jair, who took the Towns of Argob, and called them after himself Hanoth-Jair; as his thirty Sons in like manner, after that example, named so many Cities, which they possessed in the Land of Gilead.

Chap. 10.

27. Jair being dead, the Israelites returned to their evil courses, serving Balaam, Ashmaroth, the gods of the Moabites, Ammonites, and the Philistines; for which God sold them into the hands of the Philistines and Ammonites. It is written, And that year they oppressed the Children of Israel, 18 years all that were on the other side Jordan, in the Land of the Amorites, which is in Gilead. Moreover, the Ammonites passed over Jordan, to fight also against Judah and Benjamin, and the house of Ephraim; so that all Israel was sore distressed. Some will have this oppression but to begin at the death of Jair; others think, they had oppressed Israel 18 years before, and now passed over the River, to afflict the other Tribes. The Israelites cried to God, and being reprov'd, put away their Idolls: hereupon, the Ammonites being got together in Gilead, and the Israelites assembled in Mizpah in the same Country, Jephthah the Son of Gilead, begotten on an Harlot, was sent for by the Gileadites and made Captain, being a mighty Man of valour: He first sent to expostulate with the King of Ammon, and to demand the cause of the War. He answered, it was because Israel took away his Land, when they came out of Egypt, from Arnon unto Jabbock, and unto Jordan; of which he required restitution. Jephthah replied, that in their journey from Egypt, they sent to the Kings of Edom and Moab, to desire passage through their Coasts; but this being denied, they turned aside through the Wilderness, and compassed about the Lands of Edom and Moab, not coming within the borders of Moab, and so at length came and pitched on the other side of Arnon, which was the limit of Moab's Coasts; Then, that Sihon King of the Ammonites denying them passage, and fighting against them, the Lord God of Israel delivered him into their hands: and they possessed the Land of the Amorites from Arnon unto Jabbock, and from the Wilderness unto Jordan.

28. Seeing the God of Israel had dispossessed the Amorites, he demanded a reason, why he should possess that Country; and whether he was any thing better than Balack the Son of Zippor, King of Moab, who never strove nor fought against Israel. Lastly, he asked him, why he recovered not the Land all the 300 years which the Children of Israel had enjoyed it, and appealed to God for righteous judgement betwixt them. These 300 years, if they be reckoned exactly; theyears of the oppressions, and of the Judges, must all along be counted in length, without including the one in the other; but if this be done, still many more than 300 will be found, and 100 years more will arise in the account of time, from the coming out of Aegypt to the building of the Temple, than the Scripture in another place alloweth of. Some say, if so many years really passed, betwixt the last year of Moses, save one, and this time of Jephthah, as those successions do make; 400 years was rather to have been mentioned, seeing the number exceeded that of 300; and therefore accounting the other way short of 300, they allegde, that it is usuall, when a full or round number is chosen, rather to make use of that which most favoureth their cause; and therefore Jephthah meant by 300, about, or almost so many. On the contrary, others believe, that the Scripture doth not suffer them to omit the years of Servitude, and contain them under those of the Judges, which they suppose clearly appeareth out of those words before mentioned, which in generall describe the condition of the Israelites, as successively guilty of Idolatry, then punished, and delivered; after which, falling into an Anarchy at the death of their deliverer, they again relapsed into the same sin. They will have also the particular accounts of these things in Scripture, by their order and distinction, to hold out no lesse unto us.

Ammonites.

29. But the King of the Ammonites not hearkening to Jephthah, was overthrown with a very great slaughter. Jephthah at his going forth, vowed, if the Lord would deliver the enemy into his hands, that whatsoever came first out of his house to meet him at his return, should surely be the Lord's, and he would offer it for a burnt offering. It happened that his only Daughter came out to meet him with timbrels and dances; and after she had bewailed her Virginity, he is said to have done to her according to his vow. Some observe that for And in the place may be read Or, as if, he would offer the thing, if it were to be offered, or, however to consecrate it to the Lord. And their opinion seemeth most probable, who hold she was not offered up as a burnt-offering, but consecrated to God by perpetuall virginity and austerity of life, being altogether separated from Humane society, except four dayes in a year, for a little refreshment; it being said, that he executed his Vow upon her, for that he did not redeem her with money, according to the Law mentioned in * Exodus but left her consecrated to God in an unmarried state, lest she should seem to be another's and not the Lord's. Jephthah, after this, warred against the Ephraimites, who spake against, and threatened him and his house. He cut off 42000 Men, all being slain in their passage over Jordan, that could not pronounce Shibboleth. Having judged Israel six years he died, and was buried in Gilead.

30. After Jephthah arose Ibsan of Bethlehem, and judged Israel seven years, then Elon a Zebulonite 10, and Abdon the Son of Hillel a Pirathonite, after him eight years. Now the Philistines again vexed Israel 40 years. Seeing neither of these three are said to have delivered the Land, some think those 40 years, to have included some of their Government. There are that fetch the beginning of them from the 4th year of Ibsan, and end them at the death of Sampson, whom they will have the immediate Successor of Abdon. Of those that are for the lengthning out of the time, some think they are to be reckoned from the death of Abdon, and end at the beginning of Samson's Government, which others again infer, by good arguments, to be included in them, or else 20 of them must fall in with the time of Eli; the Seventy Interpreters accordingly, giving to Eli not 40 years as the Hebrew Copies, but onely 20. Still there are not wanting, who think Eli to have succeeded Abdon, and Sampson's 20 years (who was yet unborn) to have been included in his 40. They fetch the rise of the 40 years of the oppression from 17 years before the beginning of Eli, and end them so many after his death. Sampson was a Nazarite from his Mothers womb, no Razor coming on his head, and keeping himself from wine and strong drink all his time. Hence, as his admirable strength is said to have layn in his hair, so others have ascribed it to his abstinency, as if it had not proceeded from the especial

SECT. 2. Providence and Power of God. He was the Hercules of the Israelites, really performing such things as the Greeks would scarce attribute to their's, on whom yet they heaped those things that were done by many. He afflicted the Philistins much in his life, but much more at his death, by throwing down the house of Dagon upon the chief of them, being therein assembled to make themselves sport with so great an Adversary, whom having got into their power, they had deprived of his sight.

Eli.

31. Had Eli preceeded Sampson, he would have been reckoned amongst his predecessors; according to generall apprehension. The High-Priesthood which hitherto had continued in the Family of Eliazar for five Generations, (viz. in himself, Phineas, Abisna, Bukki, and Uzzi, according to Josephus) was in Eli translated to that of Ithamar another of Aaron's Sons. The Sons of Eli being very leud, grievously abused their power, and he used not his authority in correcting them, whereby he so far incurred God's displeasure, that he threatened to destroy his house, as it came to passe. The Israelite, towards the end of his 40 years, fought with the Philistins; but were worsted, and lost 4000 Men. To better their successe, they then sent for the Ark of God from Shiloh, promising to themselves victory in it's presence; but of the next Battell the issue was the same. Hophni and Phineas the Sons of Eli were slain, and the Ark taken. This news being brought to Eli, upon mention of the captivity of the Ark, he fell backward from a seat, and being 98 years old his neck brake. The Philistins placed the Ark in the house of their god Dagon, which Idol fell down twice before it; and the multitude was so plagued with the Hæmorrhoids, that they were glad to return it back with presents.

32. To Eli succeeded Samuel, both a Levite and a Prophet, to whose Government, from the division of the Land, passed 450 years, according to St. Paul, as the text of (a) Luke now hath it. But to this place another in the first Book of the (b) Kings, expressly seemeth to contradict, which maketh the foundation of the Temple to be laid in the 480th year after the Israelites departure out of Egypt. This later number exceedeth the other but by 30. although in it must be comprehended, besides what is in the former, the 40 years of their stay in the Wilderness, the six years which passed before the division, the time of Samuel's Government, the reigns of Saul and David, with the three years of Solomon; that passed before the building of the Temple; all which make up the number of 129; so that the literall senses of these two cannot stand together: Some go about to reconcile them by drawing down the beginning of the 480 years, lower than the Text will bear; and by removing that of the 450, higher than is convenient: to whom others joyn, in attempting the reconciliation both of those numbers, and clearing up the matter concerning the 300 years ascribed by Jephthah, to the possession of the Land of the Amorites before mentioned. But there are, who find a necessity of confessing a mistake, either in the one or other Copie of these places. These are divided in their opinions, one party thinking they have better reason to stick to the place of the Kings, which is not so liable to any corruption (through the great care of the Jews) as the Greek text, hath that, by reason of the similitude of words, might well be changed from * one to another, through the ignorance of transcribers. Another will have the 450 years to belong to the division of the Land, and not to the Judges: all which have been mistaken through the wrong reading of the words.

33. Others, both of ancient and modern times, are very confident, that, all considered, the fault must fall upon that place of the Kings, which giveth but 480 years, to all that time that passed from the departure out of Egypt to the founding of the Temple; and that, instead of 480, 580 was most anciently written. For when any one place disagreeeth with the whole series of History, clearly held out elsewhere, it is rather to be corrected in its number (which may easily be altered by a mistake of one word) than many places wrested to a compliance with it. Now all the times of the Anarchies, liberty, War, and servitude, of the Israelites laid together, without confusion of years (for

(for which there is no ground at all), clearly hold out a hundred years more than this place of the Kings; and so exactly from the several particulars make it up, that it seemeth to take away all doubt. From the departure out of Egypt to Moses his death, intervened forty years; thence to the beginning of Othniel 34. whereof 26 are given to the Government of Joshua and the Elders, and eight to the servitude under Cushan. Then Othniel governed forty years, the oppression of the Moabites followed for eighteen. Abud ruled 80. The Canaanites Tyrannized 20. Debirah and Barak governed 40. the Medianites oppressed the Israelites 7. thence Gideon judged Israel 40. Abimelech reigned 3. Tolah 23. Jair 22. and then the Ammonites oppressed Israel 18. all which numbers amount to 385 years. After this Jephthah judged Israel 6 years, Ibzan 7. Eion 10. Abdon 8. the Philistins vexed Israel 40. and Heli ruled 40. which make up the summe of 111 years. Then Samuel and Saul governed 40 years (as will be seen), David also 40. and Solomon 3. before the foundation of the Temple was laid, which make up 83 years. Now all these numbers laid together amount exactly to 579 years, to which if the fourth year of Solomon be added wherein the Temple was founded, there ariseth the full number of 580. They perceive therefore it was not without reason that so many of the Ancients dissented from that place of the Kings, which might also be lyable enough to the carelesnesse of Scribes. According to this account, Students in History and Chronology are to take notice that a hundred years are to be added to the more ordinary Era of the World.

overthrown.

34. In the dayes of Samuel, the Philistins grievously afflicted Israel, till such time as by his means, the people being turned to the Lord cast off their idols, and solemnly repented at Mizpah: Hereat God was pleased to spare them, and thundring upon the Philistins, when they were ready to joyn battle, discomfitted them utterly, & so terrified them that they forsook the Cities formerly seized on, leaving onely one Garrison in the Countrey; and no more afflicted the Children of Israel so long as Samuel had the chief power in his hands. When he grew old he made his sons Judges over the Land; who perverting Justice by bribery, the people thence gladly took occasion to desire a King, that in government they might be conformable to other Nations. Their most urgent reasons were, for that the Philistins yet kept an Hold in their Countrey, and Nabab the King of the Ammonites threatned them with War; at which they were so affrighted that neither trusting in God's providence (who hitherto had been their King, and avenger) nor to the Justice and prudence of Samuel, would they be satisfied, or put off without a King. God therefore gave unto them Saul the son of Kish of the Tribe of Benjamin.

Saul is King.

35. In the book of Samuel no certain years are either given to his own government, or to that of Saul, but it seemeth probable from Scripture that he governed about twenty years alone, from the death of Eli to the election of Saul. For it is said, that the Ark of God abode in Kiriath-jearim twenty years; and that, the time being long, all the house of Israel lamented before the Lord at Mizpah; which passages are joyned unto the serious exhortation of Samuel to move them to repentance. So then the end of twenty years, the exhortation, their repentance hereupon, and their moving for a King, with good reason seem to have been about the same time; so that 20. or 21 years and an half are to be given to his government, which began at Eli's death. Now Heli died when the Ark was taken; which staying seven moneths in the Land of the Philistins was then sent away and came to Bethshemesh, where the inhabitants losing 50610 of their number, for their curiosity of looking into it, sent Messengers to those of Kiriath-jearim to fetch It unto them, with whom it remained twenty years; and these years the Israelites counted long.

36. Saul was first by Samuel privately anointed, and afterwards publicly declared King at Mizpah. Not long after (a moneth it's thought) Jabesh-Gilead was besieged by Nabab, who refused to grant peace to the inhabitants upon any other terms than to put out all their right eyes, and lay this for a reproach upon Israel. They desired truce but for seven dayes; in which space, if no relief came they promised to come out to him. But Saul, hearing of their distresse, got together an Army of 300000 of Israel, and 30000 of Judah, with which he easily overthrew the Ammonites, and raised the siege. Hereupon, at the procurement of Samuel, the people again met at Gilgall, where the Kingdom was established, and confirmed unto Saul: at which time Samuel, upbraiding them with their unthankfulnesse to God, and him, terrified them with Thunder and rain in Wheat Harvett; and again comforted them in the mercy of God. Saul having reigned two years, the Philistins again afflicted the Land, with whom he had fore War all the dayes of his life. He fought against his Enemies round about; against Moab, the Children of Ammon, Edom, and the Kings of Zobah: he smore the Amalekites, and delivered his people out of the hands of them that spoyled them. Yet, his heart not being upright before the Lord, God choise him out a man after his own heart, and rejected him and his family. This man was David, the youngest son of Jesse, of Bethlehem-Judah, whom Samuel was sent to anoynt some years before his own death, and more before that of Saul. In this space, Saul persecuted him from place to place; yet such ardent affection was there betwixt Jonathan his son and David, that the love of a Kingdom it self, joyned with the deep displeasure of a father, was nothing able to interrupt it.

37. The Apostle Paul declareth; that, after God had destroyed seven Nations in the Land of Canaan, and divided their Land to them by Lot, he gave unto them Judges for the space of 150 years, untill Samuel the Prophet. And after ward, they desired a King, and God gave them Saul, the son of Kis, a man of the Tribe of Benjamin, by the space of fourty years. Some take the words as giving so many years to his reign alone; but by general consent the government of Samuel is to be included in them. Samuel seemeth to have died not long before Saul (two years it's supposed), at such time as David was provoked by the churlishnesse of Nabal; and is said to have judged Israel all the dayes of his life. Hence is it certain that Saul reigned not alone all those fourty years, and probable that Samuel having governed alone for one half of them, had still an hand in the publick affairs of the Nation. At length Saul was overthrown in battel by the Philistins, and lost his three sons, Jonathan, Abinadab, and Melchijasa. And he himself being sore wounded, after he could not prevail with his Armour-bearer to kill him, fell upon his own sword and died. His son Ishboeth, by the means of Abner Captain of his Host, succeeded him at the Age of fourty years; but the Tribe of Judah anointed David, King over them in Hebron, who had formerly been consecrated to this Office by Samuel: and he reigned over that Tribe alone, seven years and six moneths. Ishboeth is said to have reigned over Israel two years; which is to be interpreted, peaceably, and not disturbed by War; as his father is said to have reigned one year, viz. unmolested by the Philistins.

38. For, after these two years were expired, a long War insued betwixt David and him; his side growing weaker and weaker, as David's grew stronger and stronger: David to strengthen himself married Maacha, the daughter of Talmai, King of Geshur, on which he begat Absholom and Tamar. At length Abner conceiving a displeasure against Ishboeth, because he had reproved him for meddling with his father's Concubine, revolted to David, and laboured to transfer the Kingdom to him; but coming to visite him about this affair, he was treacherously slain by Joab, David's General, and Nephew by his sister Zeruiah. All being out of order now in Israel; Baanah and Rechab two Benjamites, the servants of Ishboeth, slew their Lord as he slept in his Chamber, and brought his head unto David. He rewarded them with death, and was by the Captains, and all the Elders of the Tribes, anointed the third time King at Hebron, over all Israel; which government he held 32 years. seat of his Kingdom; himself building and fortifying the City of Sion, and Joab repairing the rest. Then twice he overthrew the Philistines in Rephidim, who came up against him after they heard he was made King. The Ark of God he removed from Kiriath-Jearim, to the house of Obed Edom the Gittite, and thence after three months into Sion. He purposed to build God an house, but was forbidden (because a man of blood) that work, which was to be reserved for Solomon. For besides his Wars in his younger time; all the space, betwixt this and the birth of Solomon, seemeth employed in Wars; wherein he overcame the Philistines, Amalekites, Moabites, Ammonites, Idumeans, and Syrians. The Borders of his Empire he very much enlarged, not onely from Shibor of Egypt to the entering in of Hamath, but also as far as Euphrates, the utmost limits promised by God unto Abraham; and onely possessed by him, and his son and Successor Solomon.

SECT. 2.

David's adultery and murder.

39. Solomon was the second son begotten on Bathsheba, the wife of Uriah the Hittite; with which woman David first committed Adultery, and then for a cover added to it the Murder of her husband. After he had been reproved by Nathan the Prophet he repented, and wrote the 51 Psalm upon this occasion. Yet the Infant conceived in Adultery, died as soon as it was born; and, though Solomon was born the next year (at it's thought), yet this sin escaped not without a further punishment. For, within awhile, his eldest son Amnon ravished his half-sister Tamar, and for that was killed by Abshalom. Some years after, Abshalom by the advice and policy of Achitophel seized upon the Kingdom. David hereupon fled to God as his Rock of refuge, and composed the 3d. and the 55th Psalms: then opposing force to force, overthrew Abshalom in the Wood of Ephraim by Joab his General, who thrust the young man through with a Dart as he hung in an Oak, contrary to David's order, who had charged all the Captains to deal gently with him for his sake. This Rebellion was followed by a new sedition raised amongst the Israelites, by one Sheba upon this occasion; because they had not the chief hand above the Tribe of Judah, in bringing back the King to his house; but this was happily suppressed, after Joab had procured the inhabitants of Abel to cut off Sheba's head.

After these things, several battels ensued with the Philistines, in one of which (the last wherein he was present) David hardly escaped the hands of Ihbi-benob, one of the sons of the Gyant; being rescued by Abishai his Nephew, who slew the Philistin. Not (c) long after, tempted by Satan and his own ambition, he numbred the people: for which God being angry proposed to him three sorts of punishments, viz. Famine, Sword, or Pestilence; as to which, he chose rather to fall into the hands of God than of man. Then God sent a Plague, whereby perished in one day 70000 men; but, as the Angel was also about to destroy Jerusalem he was commanded to desist. David at length having arrived at seventy years of Age, was so decayed and spent by his many labours and troubles, that he could not receive any heat from Cloaths, and therefore a young maid, one Abisag, a Shunamite was chosen out, to lye in his bosom. Adoniah his son taking advantage at this infirmity, by the assistance of Joab the General, and Abiathar the Priest, seized upon the Kingdom. When he had notice thereof, according to the prediction of God, and his promise unto Bathsheba, he established Solomon in his Throne, and having given him a charge, died about six months after, when he had reigned over Judah alone in Hebron seven years and six months, and in Jerusalem over all Israel and Judah 33 years; in the year of the World (according to the vulgar way of reckoning without taking in the 100 years formerly mentioned in the History of the Judges) 2985.

41. David being dead and Solomon established in the Kingdom, Adoniah asked Abisag the Shunamite to wife, and for that was put to death, as affecting the Sovereignty. Abiathar was removed from the Priesthood, and Zadok, of the Posterity of Phinehas, placed in his room, as had been foretold by God, against the house of Eli, from which the Priesthood now returned;

SECT 2. ned; Joab for fear fled to the horns of the Altar, and there was slain by Benaiab, who was made Generall in his stead. Simei, who had cursed David when he fled from Absalon, was commanded to build him an house in Jerusalem, and not to stir thence beyond the Brook Kidron upon pain of death; which he after two years suffered, having broken the order. Solomon within a year after his Father's death, married the Daughter of Pharaoh; after which, offering 1000 burnt-offerings at Gibeon, where the Tabernacle then rested, God appeared to him in a dream, and offered him whatsoever he would ask. He asked onely wisdom to govern his people, and neither riches nor honour; with which God was so well pleased, that he made him to excell therein all meer men, and accumulated also the other upon him. Chap. 3.

42. Having all things in a readinesse for building an house to the Lord, (for which David his Father had made large provisions) Vaphres King of Egypt supplying him with 80000 Men, and Hiram King of Tyre with as many, besides an Architekt named Hypero (whose Mother was an Israelitish Woman, of the Tribe of Judah); he laid the foundation of the Temple in the 4th year of his reign, and the second day of the second moneth Zif. The Structure being in building 7 years, the work began (according to their computation, who by reckoning the years of the Judges, and the oppressions severally, add 100 years to the Era of the World) in the 3089th year from the Creation entering, was dedicated in the 3095th ending, and in the 587th year after the departure out of Egypt, also ending; from which if we substra^t those 40 they lived in the Wildernesse, then 547 years will be found to have passed from the Originall of Jubilies to the Dedication of the Temple, which make up eleven Jubilies, and eight years. So the service therein began in the eighth year of the twelfth Jubilie, or in the first year of the second week of the twelfth, which seemeth agreeable to the Ceremoniall Law, wherein most things consist in the number of 7, and are reckoned by Sabbaticall years and Jubilies. And if we divide 3095 by 7, we shall find the Temple dedicated in the first year of the 442^d week from the Creation, almost twelve intire Jubilies after the Service thereof had been first appointed on Mount Sinai. Solomon's Navy.

43. About the same time Solomon built a Navie at Ezion-gaber, on the shoar of the Red Sea, in the Land of Edom. This furnishing with his own Subjects and the Tyrians (then, by reason of the situation of their Countrey, the best Sailors in the World) sent to him by Hiram, he dispatched to Ophir, once in three yeers, for gold and other marchandise, whence they brought him 420 talents. The Countrey of Edom, David had formerly subdued, and thence Solomon his Son had the priviledge of building his Ships there. Eloth or Eloth, called by other Writers Elana and Elanum, was then a famous City, seated upon the Arabian Gulf, to part whereof, lying about it, it gave appellation. As Ezion-gaber was the Arcenall for building the Navie; so this City seemeth to have been the Emporium or Martown: and, as long as the Edomites continued under the obedience of the Kingdom of Judah, it is probable, that thence Marchandise was transported to Petra, the chief City of Arabia, and so to Jerusalem. But when the Edomites revolted (which happened after the death of Jehosaphat) the course was altered from Jerusalem to Rhincolura, a City in Phoenicia upon Egypt; and there continued long, till such time as the Ptolomie's with much ado^e, brought down the trade to Alexandria. To effect this, they made two Ports upon the borders, whereof the one bare the name of Berenice, and is mistaken by Josephus for Ezion-gaber, that lying at a great distance both from this and Eloth, which seemeth to be the same place, mentioned in (d) Strabo, by the name of * Albus Pagus. 1 Kings. 1.

* Αλευνὴ πόλις.

44. As this Navigation of the Tyrians gave a beginning to their Fame in that Art; so from it (as is probably conceived) came the name of the Red Sea, or that of Edom, first to be famous in other Countries. Their Traffick increasing, they might well send out Colonies into other parts; and hence, as Herodotus writeth, the Sea-coast of Arabia might be inhabited by them; but as for their coming from these parts to inhabit Phœnicia (which opinion seemeth to have taken it's originall, from the journey of the Israelites out of these Coasts) it is a meer Fable. Sailing out of the Arabian into the Persian Gulf, the name of Red Sea might upon this occasion be given by them to both (which is usually to be expounded of both in antient Writers) the word Edom, being changed into others of the same signification in severall Languages. As for Ophir, if we think this Country denominated from the Son of Sem, (or him from it) either immediately by his habitation therein, or rather mediately by the Tyrians imposing that name upon it, which properly belonged to a place in Arabia; then need wee not seek for it in America, and feign strange circuits to have been made, from the Red Sea round about Africk to sail thither; as those, who place it in that part of the World, are forced to do.

His buildings.

45. Solomon after the dedication of the Temple, fortified Jerusalem with a treble wall, and repaired Hazron, the antient Metropolis of the Canaanites; so did he Gaza of the Philistins: he built Bechoron, Gerar, and the Millo, or munition of Jerusalem. He also built Megiddo in Manasseh on this side Jordan, Balah in Dan, and Thadmor; which may be either Thamaron, in the Desart of Judea, mentioned by Ptolomy, or Palmyra, as Josephus thinketh, situate in the Desart of Syria, on the borders of his Dominions; which being many Ages after rebuilt by Adrian the Emperour, was named after him Adrianopolis. He built for himself in thirteen years time a Palace, and an house for his Wife the Daughter of Pharaoh. After this, he offered twenty Towns, bordering upon the Tribe of Asher, to Hiram King of Tyre, as a reward for the assistance he afforded him in his buildings; but he refusing them, he placed Colonies therein. And from his refusall the Country came to be called Cabul.

His incontinency and idolatry.

46. In the later part of his reign, he fell into great incontinency, and thence became accessory to abominable Idolatry. He loved many strange Women, as (together with the Daughter of Pharaoh) Women of the Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, Sidonians, and Hittites: of the Nations, wherewith the Children of Israel were forbidden to marry. He had 700 Wives, and 300 Concubines, which turned his heart after other gods, so that he went after Astartoth the goddess of the Sidonians, and Milcom the abomination of the Amorites; he built an high-place for Chemosh the abomination of Moab, in the hill before Jerusalem, for Molech the abomination of the Children of Ammon; and so did he for all his strange Wives, which burnt incense, and sacrificed to their gods. This provoked the God of Israel, who had twice appeared to him; insomuch, that for his horrible ingratitude, he determined evil concerning his Kingdom, to be fulfilled in his Son. Yet have we ground to judge well of his eternall condition, seeing he made a recantation of his former errors, and was used as a Pen-man of Scripture by the Holy Ghost. He dyed after he had reigned 40 years, being without parallel for Wisdom, Magnificence, and Humane Frailty. A.M. 3025.

His death.

SECT. III.

From the death of Solomon and the rent of the Kingdom, to the destruction of the Kingdom of Judah.

1. SOLOMON being dead, Rehoboam his Son, by Naama an Ammonish Woman, reigned in his stead. The Tribes, when they met at Sichem to make him King, petitioned for a relaxation of their burthens imposed by his Father; to which he answered so churlishly (despising the counsel of the antient and grave Men), that ten Tribes revolted from him, and made King over them Jeroboam the Son of Nebat, who had fled into Egypt for fear of Solomon, after that God's intentions came to be known of giving him part of the Kingdom. With Rehoboam yet remained the two Tribes of Judah and Benjamin, and the greatest part of the Levites, who left their possessions and settled themselves in Judah and Jerusalem, because Jeroboam and his Sons had cast them off from executing the Priest's Office. With the Tribe of Judah is also to be reckoned that of Simeon, whose possessions were within the Inheritance of Judah, for which that part of the division that fell to it was too much. Part also of the Danites had it's seat within that of Judah; for it appeareth that they had some Towns in the division of the Land, which formerly had been assigned to the Children of Judah, who (as hath been observed) had so large a Country at first assigned to them, rather to protect and defend, than solely to possess it. All these still remained the Subjects of Rehoboam, though ten Tribes are said to have revolted, the Tribe of Dan being attributed to Jeroboam, for that Dan the chief City, was within his dominions; and because the Tribe of Manasseh being separated and divided into two parts, might be reckoned for two Tribes. The Kingdom thus divided, the Northern parts fell off; but the Southern continued in obedience to the Son of Solomon, whose successors henceforth are called Kings of Judah, as those of Jeroboam, Kings of Israel; and yet this distinction is not alwaies observed, Jehosaphat being called King of Israel, and also Abaz; though we know they were both Kings of Judah; of that division onely.

2. Rehoboam purposed to make War upon the Tribes, but, admonished by God, gave over the enterprize of invading them with 180000 Men; although there was continuall War betwixt the two Kings all their dayes. The Priests and Levites that were driven into Judah, retained it in the true religion three years; but when Rehoboam had established himself, he forsook the Law of the Lord, and all Israel with him, committing sins above all that their Fathers had done. They built them high-places, images, and groves on every high hill, and under every green tree: there were Sodomites in the Land, and they did according to the abomination of those Nations, which the Lord cast out before the Children of Israel. Because of this, the fifth year of his reign, Shishak King of Egypt (perhaps invited by Jeroboam, who had lived with him in exile) came up against him with 1200 Chariots, 60000 Horse-men, and innumerable people, out of Egypt: the Lubims, Sukkims and Ethiopians, with which he took garrisons in Judah, and pierced as far as Jerusalem. Rehoboam, and his Princes humbling themselves at the preaching of Shemaiah, thereby obtained deliverance: which yet, was to be bought at an high rate. For Shishak took away the treasures of the house of the Lord, and the Kings house, with all the golden shields which Solomon had made, in the room of which Rehoboam put others of brasse. He died after he had reigned seventeen years.

Abiah.

3. Abiah his Son succeeded him, whose Mother is in one place (a) named Maachab the Daugher of Abshalom, and in another (b) Micajah Daugher to Uriel of Gibeah. Some think she was the Daugher of Tamer, which might be married to this Uriel, and adopted by Abshalom, who seemeth to have left no issue. He imitated the impiety of his Father; his heart not being perfect before the Lord his God, and yet God remembering the Covenant made with David, brought him by a fatherly correction into order, and acknowledgement of his Sovereignty. He also warred with Jeroboam all his dayes, who coming up against him with 80000 Men, he joyned battell with him having but half so many, and yet trusting in God, obtained Victory, and killed 50000 Israelites, the greatest number we read to have fallen in one battel. He took from him Bethel, Jeskanah, and Ephraim, with their Towns; neither did Jeroboam recover his strength in his time. Abijah waxed mighty, married fourteen Wives, begat two and twenty Sons and fifteen Daughters. Yet he reigned but three years.

time the Land had rest ten years. In his 17th year, according to Josephus, came Zerach the Ethiopian against him, with 1000000 Men, of Cushians (inhabiting Arabia, where also Zerach his Ethiopia is onely to be found) and Labeans, besides 300 Chariots. To those he opposed himself with 300000 of Judah, and 280000 of Benjamin; and, calling upon his God, obtained the Victory, which he prosecuted and got much bootie. Returnig to Jerusalem, he was so wrought upon by the words of Azariah the Prophet, the Son of Odai, as together with his own Subjects and others, (that fell to him in abundance out of Israel) he sacrificed to, and made a Covenant with, God. Then proceeding in the reformation of his Kingdom, he removed Maaca his Grand-mother from her dignity, because she was the patronesse of Idolatry. Baasa now who reigned in Israel, provoked with the revolt of his Subjects, and jealous of the growing power of Asa, came up against him, and built Rama, in the 36th year from the division, lest any should go in or out to him. Asa to divert him, hired Benhadad the King of Syria to invade Israel. This Benhadad was the Son of Tabrimmon, and Grand-son to Hezrin, or Rezin, the first King of Damascus, and from him the Surname of Hadad descended upon his Posterity. He smote Jion, Dan, Beihmaach, all Civeroth, with the Land of Naphali; and constrained Baasa to leave off building Ramah. Asa then destroyed Ramah, and with the stones thereof built Seba and Mizpah; but was checked by God for not trusting in him, but putting his confidence in the King of Syria; and War for this was denounced to be upon him all his dayes. Hereat he grew angry with the Seer that brought the message; and oppressed some of his people: and for this was punished with the Gout in his later dayes, for a remedy to which, he had recourse to the Physicians, and not to God. So he died, in the 41 year of his reign.

Jehosaphat.

5. Jehosaphat succeeded him, to a good Father a better Son. In his third year he sent the Levites throughout the Cities to teach the people, having removed the Sodomites out of the Land. He married his Son Jehoram to Athaliah the Daughter of Ahab King of Israel, and in his 18th year made him Vice-King. This affinity drew him down with Ahab to fight against Ramoth-Gilead, where Ahab received his death's wound, and he escaped narrowly with his life. For joyning himself with this wicked King, he was sorely chidden by Jehu the Prophet, the Son of Hanani; which so affected him, as he reformed his Subjects, travelling himself from Beerheba unto Mount Ephraim to accomplish it: he also constituted Judges, to whom he gave a pious and strict charge. After this the Moabites, Ammonites, and a great multitude of others invaded him; against which he first strove by Prayer to God, and thereby obtained Victory, his Enemies being so stricken with madnesse, that they fell upon, and slaughtered one another. Afterwards intending to send Ships for gold to Ophir; because he joynd with wicked Abaziah King of Israel, the Lord spoiled the works, and the Ships were broken at Ezion-geber. Some think he made his Son Partner in the Kingdom it self, having formerly been but his Vicegerent, a year or two before he died. He reigned 25 years, or rather 24, with some odd months.

6. To Jehosaphat succeeded Joram being 32 years old, to the best Father the worst Son, who being established in his Sear, made away all his Brethren, and some of the Princes. In his dayes the Edomites, or Idumeans, who hitherto, from the time of David, had been in subjection to the Kings of Judah, revolted. They had heretofore been governed by a Vice-Roy, chosen either out of themselves or the Jews; but now they made themselves a King; the Prophecie of Isaac, the common Progenitor of both Nations, being now fulfilled, that though Esau should serve his younger Brother Jacob, yet the time should come, when he should break the yolk from off his neck. At the same time Libnah (a City of the Priest's in the Tribe of Judah) revolted, because he had forsaken the God of his Fathers; for having married Ahab's Daughter, he followed the example of his house, making high-places in the Mountains of Judah, and causing his Subjects to commit Idolatry therein.

therein. Because of this, there came a Writing to him from the Prophet Elijah, rebuking him for his sin, and foretelling his punishment. Elijah being before this taken up to Heaven, the Jews have believed that this Letter was sent down thence. Some think, there was another Prophet of this name; but most are inclined to believe, that foreseeing, before his assumption, the Idolatry of this man, he left this Letter with his Schollers to be delivered to him in due time. According to the threatnings therein contained, God first stirred up against him the Philistins and Arabians, who making an invasion took away all his goods, his wives, and sons, except Jehoahaz the youngest, otherwise called Ahaziah and Azariah. Afterwards God struck him with an incurable disease in his bowels, which after two years came out of his body; so that he miserably died, having reigned eight years; three whereof are to be reckoned in conjunction with his father. He was buried without honour at Jerusalem, not in the Sepulcher of Kings; nor desired, missed, nor lamented.

At the end of these years, Jehoiada brought him out to the people, then seven years old, and anointing him King, slew Athaliah, restored the worship of God, and destroyed the house of Baal, whose Priest Matthan he slew before the Altar.

Joas.

8. Joas then succeeded his father after six years, who did what was good and just as long as Jehoiada the Priest lived, and through his advice took care to repair the Temple, which now had stood 155 years. But Jehoiada being dead (who lived 130 years; the Jews observing that he, the repairer of the Temple, was born the same year, that the builder thereof died) Idolatry brake out afresh through his connivance. The Prophets exclaimed against it in vain, especially Zacharias, the son and successor of Jehoiada, against whom Joas was so far transported beyond the bounds of piety, & gratitude to his father's memory, that he commanded him to be stoned, and that in the Court of the house of the Lord. Whilst as he died, he said, The Lord look upon it and requite it. So he did; for after a years time, the forces of Hazael, King of Syria, though but small, invaded Judah, destroyed all the Princes of the people, and sent the spoyl to their King. Joas himself they left very sick of great diseases, but when they were departed from him, his own servants conspired against him for the blood of the sons of Jehoiada the Priest, and slew him on his bed, in the 40th year of his reign. 9. Amaziah his son succeeded him, who also seemeth to have reigned with him the three last years; seeing he is said to have begun his reign in the second year of Joas, King of Israel. When he was confirmed in his seat, he put those to death that slew his father, sparing their Children according to the Law of Moses. In his 12th year, he undertook an expedition against the Edomites with 30000 of his own Subjects, and 10000 Israelites, which he hired for 100 Talents of silver. But as he was about to begin his march a Prophet dehorred him from joyning to himself the Idolatrous Israelites, so that he dismissed them, and they returned home in great discontent. He prospered against the Idumeans, but the Souldiers (dismissed) fell upon his Cities, and smiting 300 of them, took much spoyl. Yet he at his return, to amend the matter, having brought home the gods of the Edomites, set them up to be his gods, bowed down before them, and burnt incense to them. The Lord being sore angry for this, sent first a Prophet to him whom he rejected. But burning with a desire to be revenged upon the Israelites he sent and defied

Joas their King, who admonished him to be well advised, but this being in vain, they met, and joyned battel, wherein Amaziah was taken, and led back to Jerusalem; the Wall of which Citie, Joas demolished 400 Cubits, and plundering the house of the Lord with the Kings house then departed. Fifteen years after, Amaziah lived; but then, having turned away from following the Lord, a conspiracy was made against him in Jerusalem; whence he fled to Lachish, and there was slain by the pursuers, after he had reigned 29 years.

Uzziah.

10. He left a son named Uzziah and Azariah, who succeeded him; but being said to have begun his reign in the 27th year of Ieroboam, King of Israel, an Inter-regnum of twelve years must needs have passed betwixt his father's death and his beginning; the Kingdom all this time having, perhaps, been governed by a Lieutenant, or the High-Priest. When he came to the Age of 16. all the people of Judah took him, and made him King in the room of his father, and under him the State of Judah much flourished. He fought prosperously against the Philistines and Arabians that dwelt in Gur-Baal, and Mehunims, or Mineans, dwelling in Arabia the Happie upon the Red-Sea: the Ammonites sought to him with presents, and his name was great in those parts. About his 35th year was celebrated in Greece the first Olympiad, that great help to our understanding in the distinction of times. He invaded the Priests Office in Offering Sacrifice, and for that was stricken with Leprosie, which continued upon him till his death, living in an house by himself, and Ioatham his son ordering the affairs of the Kingdom. He reigned 52 years.

Ioatham.

11. Ioatham his son succeeded him, who prevailed against the Ammonites, and forced them to pay Tribute two years. He became mighty, because he prepared his wayes before the Lord his God; he built the High-Gate of the Temple much on the Wall of Ophal; Moreover, Cities in the Mountains of Judah, and in the Forrests thereof Castles and Towers. Under him, his Predecessor, and his two Successors, prophesied Isaiah and Hosea: Micah began in his time; and Nabum also, according to Iosephus, prophesied the destruction of Niniveh, which was fulfilled 115 years after; though others think the beginning of these years should rather be placed in the time of his son. He reigned sixteen years, and was succeeded by Ahaz his son, whose reign if it be compared with that of Pechab and Hosea, Kings of Israel, it will appear that he reigned seven, or eight years with his father. He did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord, walking in the wayes of the Kings of Israel: he made molten Images for Baalam, burnt Incense in the Valley of the son of Hinnom, burnt his Children in the fire, Sacrificed and burnt Incense in the high places, on the Hills, and under every green Tree. Because of this, God stirred up Pekab, King of Israel, and Rezin the son of Remaliah, King of Syria against him, who invaded his Kingdom, and did much hurt: Rezin got Elath, which Uzzias had recovered and built; the King of Israel gave him a grievous overthrow; the Edomites also afflicted him and the Philistins, whom Uzziah had brought under, made inroads upon him. Suspecting his Estate because of these things, he sent to Tiglath-Pileser, King of Assyria for help, presenting him with the Silver and Gold, which was found in the Temple.

Then turned he his Forces upon Pekab, transporting into Assyria the Inhabitants of Gilead and Naphthali, as formerly he had done those of Damascus. But Achaz, to procure those things, having made himself his Vassal, was yet never the better, remained in great fear of him, and still continued in his wickednesse. He made his son Hezekiah for his three last years partner with him in the Kingdom, and at the end thereof died, having reigned together with his father, and by himself, 16 years. Hezekiah succeeding, opened the Temple which his father had shut, and reformed the abuses in Religion. Serpent, because the Superstitious multitude fancying some Divine vertue therein, gave it suitable Worship. He shook off the yoke of the King of Assyria, refusing to pay Tribute; for which cause in his fourteenth year, Senacherib, being to make War upon Egypt, led part of his Forces into Judah. Besieging Lachish, Hezekiah bargained with him to depart; but he brake his promise, and sent Rabhakes with others to Jerusalem, who blaspheming God, and reproaching the King, laboured to draw the people from their obedience. This being to no purpose, Rabhakes returned to him, who had now departed from Lachish, and besieged Libnah, a strong Citie of Judah; removing still nearer Jerusalem, that he might seem to pursue what he had given in charge to Rabhakes to denounce against Hezekiah.

2 Kings 18.
2 Chron. 29. &c.

13. But lying before Libnah, news came that Tirhakah, King of Ethiopia (who, as it seemeth, had entred into conspiracy with the Egyptian against him) was moving towards him; at which he was so terrified, that he brake up his siege, and departed homewards. Yet having a greedy mind towards Judah, he sent a blasphemous Letter full of threats to Hezekiah; but he lost in one night by the stroke of an Angel 180000 men (as some think being on his way towards Jerusalem) and confounded hereat, returned to Nimveh, where he was slain by his two sons, Adramelech and Sharezer, as he was worshipping in the house of Misroch his God. In the time of these dangers, Hezekiah fell sick unto death, the sentence of which he received from Isaiah the Prophet. But by his prayers and tears he obtained a prolongation of life for fifteen years, and, in confirmation of the promise, the shadow of the degrees which was gone down in the Sun-dial of Ahaz was brought ten degrees backward; and it followeth, So the Sun returned ten degrees, by which degrees it was gone down. As for this Sun-dial it's thought that in those ancient times the knowledge of Dyals was scarce amongst the Hebrews. Yet is it possible that Achaz might have something of that nature, though imperfect, from the Babylonians, who were of old much given to Astrology, he being otherwise too curious an admirer of forrein things as appeareth, in that he must needs have such an Altar made, and erected at Jerusalem as he had seen at Damascus. That the Sun went back, hath been generally believed: but one of late hath gone about to prove that the shadow was lyable to reduction, without retrocession of the great Luminary.

14. The knowledge of this miracle coming to the Babylonians (who by reason of their continual observation of the Heavenly bodies might have more occasion to take notice of it) Merodach-Baladan their King sent to Hezekiah to congratulate his recovery, desirous, it's likely, of his friendship whom he had understood to be so much in the favour of God; especially bearing no goodwill to the Assyrians. He in a vain ostentation of his Wealth shew'd the Ambassadors all his Treasures, and whatsoever was in his house; for which, Isaiah the Prophet denounced the carrying away of all these things to Babylon. For the pride of his heart there was wrath upon him and Judah; yet he humbled himself, both he and the inhabitants of Judah, so that the wrath of the Lord came not upon them in his dayes. He flourished in abundance of riches and honour, stopped the upper water-course of Gibon, and brought it streight down to the West-side of the Citie of David. He reigned 29 years (3 whereof were together with his father:) being dead, they buried him in the chiefest Sepulchers of the sons of David, and all Judah, with the Inhabitants of Jerusalem, did him honour at his death.

Manasses.

15. Manasses his son succeeded him at the Age of twelve years, and therefore was begotten by him after his recovery. He did evil in the sight of the Lord above those Nations, which the Lord had cast out before Israel, being more Idolatrous then any of his Predecessors; he was also given to Witchcraft and Divinations, built Altars for all the Host of heaven, which he served in the two Courts of the house of the Lord, wherein he also set up an Image of the Grove which he had made. He filled Jerusalem with innocent blood; amongst other Martyrs Isaiah the Prophet (as it's said) being sawn asunder with a wooden saw, because he was free with him in reproving his ungodly ungodly life; although he was of the blood royal as the son of Amos, the brother of King Amaziah, according to the tradition of the Jews, who also have related him to have been father-in-law, nay (as some) Grand-father by the Mothers side, to Manasses himself. In such wickedness continued he for several years, till such time as God sent upon him the Captains of the King of Assyria (Esarchaddon some think) who took him lying hid amongst the thorns, and carried him bound with fetters unto Babylon, which City (as it appeareth from this place) was now again under the King of Assyria. Here having leisure and occasion to bethink himself, in his affliction he repented, was humbled greatly, and besought the Lord, who heard his Prayer, and restored him to his Kingdom. After this, he knew that the Lord was God; and purged his Realm of Idolatry; which Reformation the Jews make to have been in the 33th year before his death. He reigned 55 years.

16. Amon his Son succeeded him in his Kingdom, and Idolatry, but not in his Repentance, worshipping and sacrificing to all the carved Images which his Father had made, and going on to trespass more and more. After two years, his servants conspired against him and slew him in his own house, all whom the people of the Land put to death, and made Josiah his Son (a child of eight years old) King in his stead. He in the eighth year of his reign began to seek after the God of his Fathers, and in his twelfth to cleanse his Kingdom, and all the Land of Israel, from Idolatry: although the greatest part of the later, was now subject to the King of Assyria. In the 18th year of his reign and of his age the 26th, he commanded the Temple to be repaired, and the Worship of God therein restored: where also finding a Book of the Law, he renewed the Covenant between God and the people, and celebrated such a solemn Passover, as had not been kept in Israel since the time of the Judges. Now if the time of the Judges, and the Oppressions, be not confounded, but taken at their full length; then this year being the 93rd ending, or the 93rd beginning, from the entering into Canaan, was the 7th of the 133 weeks, or the last of the 19th Jubilee. Josiah in his 31st year ending, disguised himself that he might fight with Necho King of Aegypt (who was going up against the Assyrian) and would not hearken to his words from the mouth of God, labouring with him to refuse fighting against the Lord, who had sent him, and commanded him to make haste. Therefore joining battell with him in the Valley of Megiddo, he was fore wounded, and being carried to Jerusalem, died there; all Judah and Jerusalem, mourning and making great lamentation for him.

17. Whilst Pharaoh was busie in his affairs against the Assyrians, the people made Jehoahaz the younger Son of Josiah, King, who continued but three moneths in the dignity. For Pharaoh having finished his work at Euphrates, and in Coelesyria, came to Jerusalem, whence he led away into Aegypt this young King, and left his elder Brother Eliakim in his place, whose name he changed into Jehoiakim, imposing a tax of a hundred talents of silver and a talent of gold upon the Land. Though Jehoahaz be said to have reigned three moneths, yet some will have a year to have passed betwixt the 31 year of Josiah, and the first of Jehoiakim; partly for that Josiah seemeth to have reigned something more than 31 years, and some space would be taken up in so solemn a mourning for him, before the instalment of Jehoahaz; and also to consult about this thing, seeing it was against right and custom to give this honour to the younger Brother: lastly some time (perhaps some moneths) was requisite for settling the affairs of Judea, about the instalment of Jehoiakim, and the tribute. Ludovicus Cappellus moreover, giveth a whole year to Jehoahaz and Jehoiakim (though the Scripture speaketh but of three moneths a piece) that the last year of Zedekiah might fall into the 39th year from the rent of the Kingdom; of which more, when we arrive at that time.

18. Jehoiakim thus advanced by Pharaoh Necho, was 25 years old when he began to reign; which if so, he was born in the fifteenth year of his Father's age; as, if Jehoahaz was 23 when he began his reign, he must also have

SECT. 3. have been born in the sixteenth of Josiah. This maketh Josiah to have applied himself to procreation of children at least in the fourteenth year of his life; which seeming too early, and not agreeable to the Piety of that Prince, there are that suspect for 25, ought to be read 15, and 13 for 23; so that the one might be born in the 24 and the other in the 25 year of his Father: But there is no necessity for such a reading of the Text. The fourth year of Jehoiakim fell in with the first of Nebuchadnezzar King of Babylon, and was the 23th from the 13th of the reign of Josias, wherein Jeremiah the Prophet first began to prophesy; and hence it also appeareth, that Josias reigned at least full 31 years, and that one passed between his death and the beginning of Jehoiakim, else 23 onely had passed betwixt the 13th of the one, and the 4th of the other. In this year Pharaoh Necho fell upon the Babylonians with War, because, as it seemeth, they had solicited Jehoiakim his Tributary to revolt, and fought against Nebuchadnezzar at Carchemish near Euphrates, (by the Greek and Latin Writers called Cercusium); in which battell he was overthrown and slain.

Pharaoh's Necho slain.

19. After this Victory, came Nebuchadnezzar to Jerusalem, where he either took Jehoiakim captive to lead him to Babylon, or at least made him his tributary Vassall. Some account this year, as the beginning of the reign of Nebuchadnezzar, so of the Captivity of Judah, and the desolation of that Country, because that Jeremiah, having spoken first of the 13 years, in which he and the other Prophets had warned the people to no purpose, afterwards addeth, that God would send Nebuchadnezzar his Servant against the Land, which should be a desolation and an astonishment, and that these Nations should serve the King of Babylon 70 years. But the Prophecy of Daniel beginneth thus: In the third year of the reign of Jehoiakim King of Judah, came Nebuchadnezzar King of Babylon to Jerusalem, and besieged it: and the Lord gave Jehoiakim King of Judah into his hand, with part of the Vessels of the House of God, which he carried into the Land of Shinar, to the house of his God. This place seeming to contradict the other; some have chosen to close with the literall sense of it, and to hold, that in the third year of Jehoiakim, began the Captivity of the Jews. Others see more reason to stick to the other place, and, to take away all difference, interpret this third year of the third of the Sabbaticall year, or the week of years, and thus would read it, In the third year, Jehoiakim the King of Judah reigning, came Nebuchadnezzar King of Babylon unto Jerusalem, &c. But the Jews with some modern Writers understand by this third year, the third of the rebellion of Jehoiakim, against whom Nebuchadnezzar coming, about the end of the fifth year of his reign, made him his Tributary, and so he continued three years; viz. the 6, 7, and 8th of his reign. Afterwards, changing his mind, he rebelled in the beginning of his 9th year, and so continued for three years in rebellion, which being expired, in the end of his 11th, Nebuchadnezzar took Jerusalem, and carried him Captive to Babylon, with part of the holy Vessels, and others of the Royall and Princely Race, amongst whom was Daniel; and so the Captivity of Seventy years began not till this year.

Chap. 25. 9. & 11.

The beginning of the Seventy years of Captivity, which is variously assigned.

20. That this third year cannot be understood of the third of Jehoiakim's reign, is clear from Jeremiah, who joyneth his fourth with the first of Nebuchadnezzar; and because elsewhere is made mention of his fifth: whence is apparent, that he could not be led Captive in his third year. The second opinion indeed is not amiss; for this was really the third year of the week or the third from the Sabbaticall year. For, the 18th of Josiah, in which the Passover was celebrated, being the last year of the 19th Jubilee, and so the Sabbaticall year; from that to the 11th ending of Jehoiakim, or the 12th beginning, are counted 31 years: viz. four weeks and three odd years; this being usuall with the Pen-men of holy Story, to count their times by Sabbaticall years or Jubilies. Iacobus Cappellus * would have Nebuchadnezzar, at the command of Nabopolassar his Father, to have come into Judea in the second year of the reign of Jehoiakim, who then swore fealty to him; but in the third year rebelled: whence Nebuchadnezzar came down again in his fifth year, year, and took him Captive. Then will he have him to have set Shallum over the Kingdom, till Ieconias his Son, an Infant of a year old, should come to age; but Iehoiakim himself there lived miserably in Captivity, till the 11th year, reckoned from his first being made King by Necho. He being then dead, and news of it brought to Jerusalem, they there made his Son Iehoiakim King in his stead. And he beginneth the Seventy years of the Captivity in his fifth year, when he will have him caried to Babylon.

21. But Ludovicus Cappelus his Brother replyeth, that in no place is there any mention made of Nebuchadnezar's coming up against him in the second year of his reign, the (d) place thought to make for the purpose, having as much respect to the fifth as the second year. And as little mention is there any where made of Iehoiakim's six years of Captivity, who if he had died at Babylon, the Scripture would never have attributed to him the reign of eleven years, but onely so many as he really reigned, viz. 5. The rest, it would either have given to Shallum the pretended Viceroy, or to Iehoiakim's his Son; it being a thing improbable, that the name should be preserved for Iehoiakim, whilst Sallum indeed reigned: Besides, the Babylonian King observed no such matter afterward in Iehoiakim, whom taking away he really made King Zedekiah, without the title of Vice-Roy or Lieutenant. Nay, though Iehoiakim lived long at Babylon, and, after the death of Nebuchadnezar, being loosed out of bonds, was honoured and esteemed by Evilmerodach above any of his condition (and therein excelled Iehoiakim, if he lived there so long); yet is there no more time given to his reign, than that wherein he onely continued in his principality. As for the Regencie of Shallum, it is a meer invention, there being no other according to the Jews, then Jehoahaz, who was also called by that name. For in the * place thought to make this out, they are bidden not to weep for the dead (viz. Iosias) but for him that goeth away (Iehoahaz taken away by Necho) for he should return no more into his Native Country.

22. Iehoiakim therefore being taken to be led away Captive, in the third year of his rebellion and the 11th of his reign, died ere he went (as we may suppose) and was cast out or buried, according to the Prophecy of Jeremiah, who had foretold he should be buried with the buriall of an Ass; being cast forth beyond the gates of Jerusalem, in the day to the heat, and in the night to the frost, which could be done by none, except the barbarous Babylonians. After his death, the Conquerour placed in his stead Iehoiakim's his Son, called also Conias and Jechonias, who did evil in the sight of the Lord, as his Father before him, and Nebuchadnezar, it semeeth repenting of what he had done, lest he should be drawn from his obedience, by the example of his Father, and the persuasions of those about him, sent his Army before him, (about a year after his former expedition) to besiege Jerusalem. When he himself came to the Siege, Iehoiachim came out to him with his Mother and Servants, and yielded his person in the eighth year of Nebuchadnezar's ending. Then the Babylonian entring Jerusalem, took away the Treasures found in the house of the Lord, and the Kings house, brake all the golden instruments which Solomon had made for the Temple, and so caried Iehoiakim with his Mother, Wives, and Servants unto Babylon. Besides those, he transported all the best sort of the people from Jerusalem, with the ablest and strongest for War from other places, in which number was (e) Ezekiel the Priest, the Son of Buzi. Iehoiakim in (f) one place is said to have been eighteen years old, when he began to reign, but in another (g) onely eight. A fault must needs be in the reading of one place of the two, which may best be laid upon the former. For if Iehoiakim his Father was 15 years old when he began to reign, (as some will have it) then was he born to him in the 18th year of his age, being otherwise (according to this tenent) absurdly made to have been begot in his 7 or 8th year.

The year following Pharaoh came with an Army to his assistance, which Nebuchadnezzar understanding went to meet him, and he thereupon afraid to engage, retreated into his own Land. Nebuchadnezzar then returning sat down again before Jerusalem, wherein famine at length prevailing, and Zedekiah still refusing to yield, though Jeremiah constantly advised him to do it, in the end of his 11th year, and the first day of the moneth it was broken into, by the Caldeans. Zedekiah flying, was overtaken, and brought to Riblah: where he first saw his Children and Friends slain; and then, having his eyes put out, was carried to Babylon, where he miserably ended his dayes.

On the seventh day of the fifth moneth, in the 19th year of Nebuchadnezzar came Nebuzaradan, Captain of his Guard, and, having got all things ready in two dayes, set the King's House, with the Temple, and the rest of the buildings in the Citie on fire. The same moneth all the Walls were demolished; they that remained in the Citie, with those which before had revolted, and the rest of the people, together with the Treasures of the King and Princes, and the Utenils of the house of the Lord, did Nabuzaradan carry to Babylon. So went Judah into Captivity in the 12th year after the death of Ichojakim, 390 after the death of Salomon and the Rent of the Kingdom (which the Prophet * Ezekiel was commanded to represent by sleeping so many nights upon his left side, the iniquity of the Children of Israel having from that time abounded) to which the two years being added wherein the Captivity was compleated at the death of Gedaliah, and eight Jubilies are therein contained; 490 from the beginning of Saul; so that the Kingdom of Judah continued 10 Jubilies, or 70 weeks of years, so many as are given by Daniel to the Commonwealth of the Jews, from its restitution to the Messiah: From the building of the Temple 420. which therefore stood eight Jubilies, with four weeks, or in all sixty weeks of years; from the entrance into Canaan 967. as Ludovicus Cappellus reckoneth, containing 138 weeks; from the departure out of Egypt 1007. during which time Satan was as it were bound, and Gods people were free: Lastly, from the beginning of the World 3515. which make 502 weeks, and 71 Jubilies with five weeks of years. The concurrence of all these Accounts do mightily confirm the Discoverer in his opinion of their realitie.

The later of those he accepted, and went to Gedaliah, who being appointed Governour kindly imbraced him, and gave encouragement to all the Jews left under his charge, promising them favour and liberty, so long as they remained obedient Subjects to the King of Babylon: But ere the year went about, one Ismael, a Prince of the blood, who during the War had kept himself out of the way with Baalis King of the Ammonites, slew Gedaliah whilst he lovingly feasted him at Maspha, with others, both Jews and Caldeans in his Company. The residue then of the Jews being without a Governour, and fearing the revenge of their Lords and Masters, were minded to fly into Egypt, and caused the Prophet to inquire of the Lord for them. Jeremiah answered, that if they would remain in Judea, God would mercifully provide for them; but if they offered to save themselves in Egypt, they should undoubtedly perish. They, notwithstanding this warning, went down and constrained him, with Barach, to accompany them, where, by the leave of Pharaoh, they inhabited near Tahpanes. Here the Prophet often reprehending them for their Idolatry, and foretelling both their destruction, and the ruin of those that harboured them, was by their wretched and ingratefull hands * stoned to death; but is said to have been exceedingly honoured by the Egyptians, so that Alexander the Great translated his bones into Alexandria,

For, leſt his Subjects by going up to Jeruſalem to Worſhip, ſhould be turned again from their obedience to him, he ſet up two Golden Calves, the one at Dan, and the other at Bethel, having learnt Idolatry towards this ſort of Cattel in Egypt. To that in Bethel he ſacrificed, inſtituting a Feaſt like to that of Tabernacles: and though, rebuked by a Prophet, he was ſtricken with Leproſie, and might have been convinced by other Miracles; yet neither theſe things nor the many judgements of God againſt him, and his Succeſſors, could reclaim either him, or them. Rejeſting the Priests of the ſons of Aaron, and the Levites, he made of the loweſt of the people Priests for the high places: He had War with Rehoboam continually, and with Abiah his ſon, who overthrew him in a great battel, and ſlew 500000 of his men, although he added a ſtratagem to the force of his numbers (which doubled thoſe of his Enemy) compaſſing in Abiah's Army whilſt he was ſpeaking to it. Jeroboams posterity utterly destroyed.

For in this comparing of the times of the Kings of Judah and Israel, is to be taken notice ; That, 1. A year onely begun is taken for a compleit one. 2. The fathers often yet living communicated the royal dignity to their sons. 3. Some were twice inaugurated, as Joram in the Tribe of Judah, and Hoshea in that of Ephraim. 4. That there were many vacancies, especially in the Kingdom of Israel. Baasa cut off all the posterity of Jeroboam, not leaving one to pisse against the Wall, according as Ahijah had foretold ; so that here Jeroboam's policy failed him, the Golden Calves having pushed down his family. When Baasa saw that Asa had restored Religion, and for that cause many of his subjects revolted to him, he had War with him all his dayes, and in his fourteenth year built Ramah to restrain fugitives. Asa to divert him hired Benhadad, King of Syria, who breaking the league formerly made with Israel came up with his forces, and smote Jion (a Citie of the Tribe of Asher) Dan of the Danites, Abel-bethmaach of the Manassites, and all Cinneroth with the Land of Naphthali ; which forced Baasa to leave off building Ramah, and return to Tirza. 1 Kings 16.

Elah slain by Zimri.

4. Elah his son succeeded him in the 26th year of Asa, and reigned two years ; at the end whereof his servant Zimri, Captain of one half of his Chariots, slew him at Tirzah as he was drinking in the house of Arza his Steward, and the Prophecie of Jehu, the son of Hanani was fulfilled against the house of Baasa, that it should be made like to that of Jeroboam ; all of it being destroyed in like manner by Zimri. But Zimri himself reigned onely seven dayes ; for the people then besieging Gibbethon, and understanding how things had passed at Tirzah, made Omri the General of the Army, King. He presently led them against Tirzah, and took it ; Whereupon Zimri withdrew himself into the Pallace, and setting it on fire perished therein, because he also walked in the steps of Jeroboam. A Schism now followed, for one half of the people chose Tibni, the son of Gineth, and four years (imperfect) as the Jews have it : this division continued, till at length Tibni dying, Omri reigned alone. He is also said to have began his reign in the 31th year of Asa, which must be understood of his reigning alone, having slain Zimri in the 28th year (beginning) of that King. After he had reigned six years at Tirzah, he translated the seat of the Kingdom to Samaria, which Citie he had built on an Hill, bought of one Shemer, from whom it took the name. Having done worse then any that were before him, he died after he had reigned twelve years. Which if they be accounted from the death of Zimri, and so contain his whole reign, then reigned Ahab his son, and Successor but two years with him, his 11th year falling into the 38 of Asa ; but if they be reckoned from the death of Tibni, then must Ahab have reigned about five years together with him.

Ahab married Jezebel.

5. Ahab exceeded in wickednesse all his predecessors, not onely living in the sins of Jeroboam, but marrying Jezebel the daughter of Eshbaal, King of Sidon, whose God Baal he served and worshipped. For this, through the prayer of the Prophet Elijah, it rained not upon the Land for three years ; but at the end thereof he prayed again, and the Heavens gave rain. He took occasion to shew the vanity of the Idoll Baal, and then slew his Priests ; for which being threatened by Jezebel, he fled into the desert to Mount Horeb. Against Ahab came up twice Benhadad, King of Syria ; once with 32 petty Kings, and both times with great forces, but still was overthrown, and at the latter time yielded himself. Ahab honourably received him, and, making a league with him, let him go in safety ; for which he was sharply rebuked by a Prophet, and told that his life should go for the life of Benhadad, and his own people for his people ; but there followed a peace betwixt Israel and Syria for three years. In this space Ahab fell sick for Naboth's Vineyard, who being by Jezebel's procurement accused of blasphemy, was stoned to death, and so Ahab enjoyed the Vineyard by way of confiscation. For this so wicked a fact severe judgement was pronounced against him and Jezebel, by Elijah, the execution whereof by a temporary repentance they caused to be probe prorogued. But the three years of the peace being expired, he renewed the War with Syria; for that Benhadad having ingiged to restore such Cities, as he had taken, refused to surrender Ramoth-Gilead. Four hundred false Prophets perswaded him to undertake the Expedition; onely Micajah sent from God dissuaded him from it. With him joyned Iehosaphat King of Judah, whose Son Iehoram had married Athalah his daughter. But going down both together, Ahab received a wound by an arrow, and thereof died, that day, in the 22th year of his reign.

Ahaziah.

6. Ahaziah his Son succeeded him, whom he had formerly made his Associate in the Kingdom, and reigned 2 years in all; being said to have begun his reign in the seventeenth year of Iehosaphat King of Judah, because his Father then dyed, having reigned 21 years, and some part of another. After Ahab's death, Moab fell off from Israel, to which it had been subject ever since the dayes of David. Ahaziah falling sick, of a fall which he had through a lattise in his upper Chamber, sent to consult Baal-zubub the god of Ekron about his recovery; but the Lord commanded Elijah to meet the Messengers, and denounce death to him for this his sin. Hereat Ahaziah being angry, sent two Captains with their fifties, one after another, to fetch him to him; but he called for fire down from Heaven, which consumed them: then being intreated by the third, he went with him to the King, where denouncing the same to his face, Ahaziah accordingly died, not long after. Him his Brother Joram followed in the 18th year of Iehosaphat King of Judah ending, who wrought evil in the sight of the Lord, but not like his Father and Brother; for he put away the Image of Baal, erected by his Father, yet cleaved to the sin of Ieroboam the Son of Nebat, who made Israel to sin, because of his carnall interest; all the Kings of Israel accounting it an especiall piece of policy, to busie the people in the worship of the golden Calves.

Joram.

7. Joram made War upon the Moabites which had revolted, in conjunction with Iehosaphat King of Judah, and the King of Edom his Tributary, Elisha the Prophet miraculously providing the Armies of water, and promising them Victory. When the Sun arose and shone upon the Pits full of water, it appeared, to the Moabites, blood; so that they concluding their Enemies to have fallen one upon another, came out to take the plunder of the field; but finding other entertainment, were repelled with great consternation and losse. The Israelites then falling upon the Countrey, made havock of all things, and besieged Mesha King of the Moabites, in Kir-hazereh, who being streightened, attempted with 700 Men to break through to the King of Edom, but could not; whereupon taking his Son, (his own some think, others the King of Edom's) which should have reigned in his stead, he offered him for a burnt-offering upon the wall. This spectacle seemed so horrible, as raised indignation against Israel, and such pity towards the Man driven by extreme necessity, (as Josephus telleth it), that being mindfull of the mutability of humane affairs, they raised the Siege and departed.

Chap. 3.

8. Benhadad King of Syria made severall attempts upon Israel, and besieging Samaria, reduced it unto extreme necessity by Famine. Him Hazael his Servant slew, and possessed himself of his Kingdom; but having received, together with it, the succession of the War, Jehoram went up against him, and was accompanied by Ahaziah King of Judah to Ramoth-Gilead. Here receiving a wound, he returned to Iezreel, to be cured; but the Army was left under severall Captains, amongst which was Jehu the Son of Iehosaphat; to whom Elisha sent one of the Sons of the Prophets, to annoint him King. He was presently received as such by the Army, and returning to Iezreel, slew Joram, (and gave Ahaziah his death's wound) after he had reigned twelve years. He caused Iesabel to be thrown down out of a window, where her carkeise was eaten by the Dogs; after which writing Letters to Samaria, he procured Seventy Sons of Ahab to be slain, and their heads sent to him. Then going thither, he slew 42 persons in his way, of the kindred of Ahaziah

SECT. 4. King of Judah, who were going to visite Iehoram and Iesabel: at Samarina he put to death all the Priests of Baal, and burnt the Temple with the Images. Yet took he no heed to walk in the Law of the Lord God of Israel, with all his heart, departing not from the sin of Ieroboam. For his executing of justice upon the house of Ahab, the Lord promised that his seed of the fourth generation should sit upon his Throne; Yet because of the rottenesse of his heart, he began to cut Israel short in his dayes, by the means of Hazael, who now subdued not onely the Gileadites, but also whatsoever the Israelites possessed beyond Jordan, raging with cruelty againg Man, Woman, and Child, as Elisha had foretold him. Iehu coming to the Kingdom at the same time as Ahabiah began her usurpation in Judah, reigned full 28 years, and then died.

Jehoahaz, 9. Jehoahaz his Son succeeded him, in the 23th year of Joash the Son of Ahaziah King of Judah, who did evil in the sight of the Lord, in the sin of Ieroboam; a grove being also in Samarina. Hazael mightily oppressed Israel also in his dayes, so that to him were left but 50 Horse-men, 10 Chariots, and 10000 Foot-men. Yet the Lord was incited by him, and sent Israel a Deliverer; notwithstanding which, yet Prince and People remained incorrigible. After he had reigned seventeen years he died, and left his Kingdom to his Son Joash, who also reigned with him about three years, for that he began his reign in the 37th year of Joash King of Judah, and is held by the Jews to be that Deliverer, mentioned to have been sent by God. He overcame the Syrians thrice, as dying-Elisha foretold him (whom he visited, and consulted about the affairs of his Kingdom); and thereby recovered the Cities lost to Hazael by his Father. Upon the occasion formerly mentioned, he took Ierusalem, with Ahaziah the King of Judah, and, breaking down the wall of the City 400 cubits, plundered the House of the Lord and the Kings house. He also was guilty of Ieroboam's sin, and died after he had reigned together with his Father, and by himself sixteen years.

Jehoahaz the Second. 10. His Son came after him, Ieroboam by name, whom God made instrumental to preserve Israel; nay to raise it to the highest top of greatness it arrived at. For he recovered Damascus and Hamath, which had by right belonged to the Tribe of Judah, with whatsoever the Syrians had taken from his Predecessors, from the ancient border of the entrance of Hamath, to the Sea of the Plains, or the Lake Asphaltites, as Ionas the Prophet the Son of Aminbai had foretold, the same with him that prophecyed against Ninive, being of Gath-Hepher, a Town of the Tribe of (k) Zebulun, in (l) Galile of the Gentiles; out of which therefore arose a Prophet, though the learned Pharisees so earnestly urged the contrary to Nicodemus. In this King's dayes also prophecyed Hosea, and Amos, called from the Herd in Indea, to prophecy to the people of Israel. Notwithstanding all that God did for Ieroboam, he did evil also in his sight, accompanying his Ancestors in the sin of Ieroboam the son of Nebat. He reigned 41 years, and after his death the affairs of his Kingdom fell to decay; way being made for the ruine of his house, and an Anarchie insuing for 24 years. For so it must be, if Zacharias his Son began not his reign till the 38th of Uzziah King of Judah, the last of Ieroboam falling in with the 14th of this King, seeing Uzziah is said to have begun his reign in the 27th of his, and he reigned 41 years. This may well seem strange in this Kingdom, where Princes were often made away by Usurpers; but God had promised Iehu, that his Children should reign to the fourth Generation; and this Zacharias might be a posthumus, or however very young, and therefore not admitted by the Nobility to govern, till he had attained to such ripenesse, as was convenient for so great a charge.

Shallum. 11. Zacharias, doing evil in the sight of the Lord, as did his Ancestors, reigned but six moneths, being then slain by Shallum the Son of Iabesh who reigned in his stead in the 39th year of Azariah King of Judah. He enjoyed his usurped royaltie but a short space, being after two moneths served so himself by Menahem the Son of Gadi, who also reigned in his stead. Menahem smote Tiphshah and all that were therein, with the Coasts thereof from Tirzah, Tirzah, because they opened not to him; and ripped up the Women with child. He did evil in the sight of the Lord, not departing from the sin of Ieroboam all his dayes; wherefore God stirred up the Spirit of Pul King of Assyria, who invaded the Land; but he gave him 1000 talents of Silver, which he wrested from the richest of his Subjects, to confirm the Kingdom in his hand. After he had held it ten years he died, and his Son Pekabiah reigned in his stead, in the 50th year of Azariah; so that Menahem having begun his reign in the 39th of that King, and reigning but ten years, here seemeth an Inter-regnum of a year or more to have happened after his death, except that be admitted, which some think, viz. that Menahem did not peaceably enjoy the Kingdom till about a year after Shallum's death, purchasing it then of Pul; so that beginning his reign in the 39th of Azariah, or Uzziah, must be understood peaceably, and in that year ending. Then must Pekabiah have begun his reign in the very beginning of the 50th year, and so a few moneths being added to the ten years of Menahem, at the furthest, there will be no need of an Inter-regnum. Pekabiah treading in the wicked steps of his Prædecessors, reigned two years and then was slain by Pekah the Son of Remaliab, one of his Captains, who possessed himself of his Seat.

12. Pekah joyned with the King of Syria against Abaz King of Judah, slew in Judah 120000 in one day, all valiant Men, because they had forsaken the Lord God of their Fathers. Zichri a mighty Man of Ephraim, slew Maaseiah the King's Son, Azrikam the Governour of the house, and Elkanah that was next the King. Two hundred thousand were also carried Captive, with much spoil, all which Oded the Prophet, when they came to Samaria, procured to be sent back. This made Abaz purchase the help of Tiglath-Pileser King of Assyria, who first destroying the King and Kingdom of Damascus, carried the inhabitants thereof into Captivity; and then came against Pekah and transported the Reubenites, Gadites, and the half Tribe of Manasses into Halab, Habor, Hara, and to the River Gozan: then crossing Jordan, he set upon Galilee and carried away the Inhabitants thereof with all the Naphthalites (which remained of those that were left by Benhadad) into Assyria. Pekah doing evil in the sight of the Lord, after he had reigned twenty years, was slain by Hoshea the Son of Elah who usurped the Kingdom.

13. Hoshea the 19th King of Israel began his reign in the 12th year of Abaz King of Judah, who reigned seven or eight years with his Father Jotham, and began to reign by himself in the 17th year of Pekah; so that Hoshea may truly be said to have began his reign in the 20th year from the inauguration of Jotham; which we must say except we allow of a kind of Inter-regnum for eight or nine years, during which time, Hoshea for the stirs that hapned could not peaceably enjoy the Kingdom; and then must we lengthen out the time of this Kingdom longer by so many years. Hoshea did evil in the sight of the Lord, but not as the Kings of Israel which were before him. Against him came up Salmanasser King of Assyria, and made him his tributary Vassal, which he continued for some time, till weary of this bondage, he conspired with So King of Aegypt, and refused to pay his tribute: Hereupon, Salmanasser subdued first the Moabites, lest he should have an Enemy at his back, then invaded Israel and besieged Samaria, in the fourth year of Hezekiah King of Judah, and the seventh of Hoshea. At the end of three years (in the sixth of Hezekiah, and the ninth of Hoshea) he took the City, and carried the Israelites Captive into Assyria, where he placed them in Chalach, Chabor, by the River of Gosan, and in the Cities of Media, because they had not obeyed the voice of the Lord, but transgressed the Covenant. In their Seat he placed certain Persians that inhabited by the River Chuthus, and afterwards, in distinction from the Jews, were called Samaritans. This hapned to Israel, for their abominable Idolatry, 255 years after the rent of the Kingdom; so that this Schism lasted five Jubilies and ten years; in the 832 after the entrance into Canaan, according to Ludovicus Capellus, and therefore in the end of the seventeenth Jubilie from that; in the

The most ancient Kingdom of Egypt, Contemporary with the Babylonian Empire.

Cham the first inhabitant of Egypt after the Flood.

Misraim his son.

The same with Osiris.

Osiris, and Isis their renowned acts.

1. THis Countrey falling, at the Division of the Earth, to Cham and his Posterity, seemeth also to have been inhabited by himself. For, thence (a) David knew it by the name of the Land of Ham; (b) Plutarch found it was called Chemia; Stephanus, Hermochymius; the Inhabitants themselves calling it (c) Kam, who distinguished their Nomi, by this Allusion, into Chemmis, Psochemmis, Pstachemmis; the Oracle of Jupiter Hammon in Africk, and the names of Ammonis, and Ammonia, given to that Countrey, challenge no other Original. It is not probable that these names should be onely given to it upon this account, that part of his Posterity here fixed themselves, for then the like might have been expected concerning many other places. Misraim his second son succeeded him; or he, to whom Moses giveth this name, as father of the Inhabitants of the Land of Misraim; it scarce being the name of a man, because not of the singular number. The Scripture calleth Egypt (d) often by the name of Masor, which seemeth the singular of Misraim contracted from Mesoraïm, & signifieth a fortified place; no Countrey in the World being more fenced by its natural situation. The Arabians at this day know the Metropolis Alcaïro by the name of Mesre, and the Egyptians anciently called their first moneth Mesori. The dual word Misraim seemeth to hint at the distinction of Egypt into (e) Upper and Lower; whereof the former, watered by the River Nile, running in one Chinnel, was divided into Thebais and Heptanomis. (Thebais being called the Land of Païbros, and distinguished from Egypt by Isaiah and Jeremiah) and the lower part was by the Greeks called Delta, from the Triangular Figure thereof; the River being herein divided into many branches.

2. This Misraim is thought to be the same with Osiris, so much spoken of by the Egyptians, and accounted the son of Saturn, the eldest of the gods, and also the son of Jupiter Hammon. For Osiris being by the Greeks named Dionysus, * one telleth us that he had this appellation both from his Father and Countrey, the former part of the word noting the one, and the later the other, viz. Nysa a Citie of Arabia Felix, built by Cham, in which he seemeth to have been born. From the reign of Osiris, to the coming down of Alexander the Great into Egypt, the Priests reckoned, some above 10000 years, others little lesse then 23000. But several forms of years being used in several Nations we are to suppose theirs to have been measured rather by the course of the Moon through the Zodiack, than that of the Sun. Jacobus Cappellus therefore thinketh 1889 years to have passed from the reign of this Osiris to Alexander his going down into Egypt, the beginning whereof he fixeth at the 1778th year of the World; 100 and odd years after the Flood, about the same time that Nimrod his Nephew began his principality at Babylon. This Osiris is feigned by the Egyptians to have married his sister Isis, and they make them the true Bacchus and Ceres. Much they are both reported to have done for the benefit of mankind, by bringing it to civility; to him they ascribe the finding out of Agriculture, and to her the invention of Corn and Laws. He built Thebes the ancient seat of the Kings, with 100 Gates; travelled into the greatest part of the World to reach men civility with the use of Corn and Wine, taking Pan along with him, who being had in great reverence amongst the Egyptians, dedicated a Citie

The Sacred
Bull Apis.

3. Typhon, seizing upon the Kingdom, was by Isis, through the help of her son Orus, dispossessed again of it, and his life; after which gathering together the 26 parts of her husbands body (into which he had mangled it) she instituted to him divine honours, ordering that the several Tribes of the Priests should dedicate some one of their living Creatures to him, and for him worship it as long as it lived; then at its death, seeking out another of the same kind, to do as much to it. Several things were consecrated in several places, yet by a general consent the Sacred Bull, called Apis, or Mnevis, was most valued, and chiefly adored, because of the special help that kind of Creature affordeth to Tillage. This Bull was black all over, having onely a square white spot in his forehead, saith Herodotus, on his right side saith Pliny, like to a Crescent, being also sacred to the Moon, as Marcellinus will have it. On the back he had the image of an Eagle, a knot on the tongue like to a Crab, and on his Tail double hairs. This kind of beast did the Egyptians worship as the greatest God with astonishing veneration, as Macrobius termeth it, till it had lived several years; but not being suffered to passe a certain term, it was then drowned by the Priests. Being dead, a great and solemn mourning there was untill another could be found with the same marks. Now some make this beast to be worshipped in honour of Apis, King of the Argives, who going down into Egypt, was there Deified after his death, and called Serapis. But there having been several Kings in divers places of that name, they are confounded one with another.

August. de Civ. Dei l. 18. c. 5.

4. Nothing, indeed, but uncertainties attend the most ancient History of that Nation; no two Authors agreeing betwixt themselves, concerning the succession of the Egyptian Kings. This is not onely to be attributed to the force of time, but the unfaithfulness of their Priests, who having it committed to their charge, to record the Memorables of their Countrey, foisted things of their own heads into the story, concealed from the Natives whatsoever made against their own profit, and from strangers all things that tended to the dishonour of their Countrey. Out of such a kind of design they related not the same things to such as travelled thither with a desire to be informed; so that from the corrupt Fountains of their records have proceeded the Histories of several, who pretending to have taken them out of the very Archives, are no lesse dissonant amongst themselves then from the truth. The Catalogues of their Kings are full of inextricable Labrynth; Manetho being of no credit, because of his notable lying, and all those who profess to follow him, as Josephus, Africanus, Eusebius, Syncellus, Scaliger, Usher, and others, not agreeing in their ranking, and ordering of them.

The Dynasties
Kings.

5. Several Dynasties are made to have preceded the time of Abraham, with whose birth (as it is placed in the 43th year of Ninus) the beginning of the 16th is joyned. Much labour is spent by some, in an endeavour to clear the order of these Dynasties, and to expound them. But, if they should be allowed of; little more then 200 years are to be assigned to the continuance of all the first 15. because the passage of Cham, and his posterity from the Mountains of Ararat into Egypt, and the establishment of a formal Government there, could scarce be performed within one Century after the Flood; time for the increase of mankind, and the unpassableness of the earth duely considered; except we cast the beginning of the first Dynastie back beyond the Flood. It hath been thought therefore that these were not several successions of Kings, which continued for so small a time, but rather certain Ranks and Orders of Governours under the Kings; who might be content to enjoy their ease and quiet together with the Dignity (as the Kings did which Joseph served) whilst the management of publick affairs was wholly committed to these Regents, or Lieutenants, of sundry linages or sorts of men, who by their actions might leave greater impressions upon posterity than the Kings them-themselves, and so give occasion to the Egyptians of vaunting them for so many Sovereign Princes indeed: That Eusebius might accommodate the times and Orders of these Dynasties to the Histories of other parts of the World, he is not afraid to transpose them as he findeth them in several Authors. Upon this account Jacobus Cappellus thinketh it a vain thing to recite in his Chronicle the series of the Kings, seeing Manetho, by whom Scaliger would amend Eusebius, is most unworthy of credit. But it being requisite to give beginners some insight into the story; such things must be briefly related, as, out of such uncertainties carry the greatest shew of probability.

Orus the last
gods.

6. After Typhons death, Isis, as Diodorus writeth, for some time governed the Kingdom; but so joyntly with her son Orus, or Horus, that he is also said to have succeeded after the death of his father, and is moreover accounted the last of the gods. He instituted a year consisting of three moneths, and thence a year was called after him Horus. The Egyptian year, properly so called, consisted of 365 dayes; but besides this, they had also monethly years of thirty dayes, and others of four moneths apiece, or 120 dayes, that by this various, and cunning account, as Cappellus thinketh, they might delude the Greeks. Of this later way few examples we meet with: but Diodorus maketh mention of it, assigning the cause to have been for that they divided their Solar year, not into four, but onely three parts; and Cappellus maketh this following account to consist of such kind of years. After the gods, came men to the Government, and the Egyptians boasted that they had Kings of their own Countrey and home-born, for the most part, during the term of 4700 years; after Cambyfes strangers: as Persians and Macedonians having governed them. Now these 4700 years he guesseth to consist of four moneths apiece, and to contain 1544 Julian years, which being deducted out of the years of the World, at the period whereof Cambyfes came down into Egypt, 1931 will remain; at what time Osiris, or Orus his son might perhaps die, who being the last of the gods, Kings began where they ended.

King.

7. The first King that reigned after these gods was Menas, or Menis, which name by some is thought to have been onely of Dignity, and that Osiris was so called. Others think Mercurius Trismegistus meant thereby, for that the Hebrew word Meni signifieth an Arithmetician, and that Osiris might well be termed Trismegistus, being a great Conquerour, Philosopher, and Benefactor to mankind, in giving good Laws, and teaching profitable arts. Another would have Sesostrius, whom he supposeth to have succeeded Osiris, to be meant by Menas, as nothing inferiour to Osiris in prowesse and great undertakings. But Sesostrius the Great reigned not till many years after, and nothing hindereth but Menas in the Egyptian language (to say nothing of the Greek) might be a proper name as well as a title of dignity. But, who succeeded him is not known; the Priests feigning 52 Princes to have followed him in order for the space of 1400 years unto Busiris, multiplying Kings, years, lies (or fallacies) to make their story the more admirable. We must therefore in this unknown path, take the blind conduct of the Dynasties again, of which omitting the first seventeen, to which almost 4000 years are ascribed, the 18th is by Cappellus made to begin nine years before the time whereunto Eusebius sets it, viz. in the 107th year of the Patriarch Jacob, the first in order of it being Amos, or Amosis.

8. To his reign are given 25 years; so that, according to this account, he it was who honoured Joseph and set him over the Land. He dying in the second year of the Famine, Chebro succeeded him, who reigned thirteen years, and him Amenophis who reigned 21, under whom Jacob died. To him succeeded Mephres, according to Eusebius, but Manethon after him placeth his Sister Amesses, or Amereses, to which he giveth 21 years and 9 moneths. After this reigned Mephres twelve years, Mephramnibosis 26, and Thurbmosis (or Thmosis) 9. After him followed Amenophis (otherwise called Palmanothis and Phamenophis) who reigned 31 years, and by some is accounted that Memnon, whose image of stone, at Thebes in Egypt, Egypt, founded like an Harp, when the Sun-beams, first in the morning, beat upon it; which is witnessed by many Authors of good credit. To him succeeded Orus, or Horus, who reigned 38 years, and to him Acenchres, who reigned 12. Manetho maketh Acenchres the Daughter of Orus, and giveth to her 12 years and one moneth; after her, he bringeth in Rathous her Bro her, to whom he giveth 9 years. But after Acinchres, Eusebius placeth Achoris, and giveth to him but 7 years, to whom succeeded Cenchres the twelfth King: who, being more wicked than his Prædecessors, oppressed the Israelites most grievously, and continued eighteen years in his tyranny, till an end was put to it in the Red Sea.

afflicted in Egypt.

9. Above Eighty years had they vexed the Israelites with insupportable burthens, notwithstanding which, they grew and increased exceedingly; nay although order was given to drown all the Male Children, lest growing too numerous, they might in time of War joyn with their enemies: else get them out of the Land with an high hand; or because of a Prædiction mentioned by Josephus, that an Hebrew should be born, who was to afflict and overthrow the Egyptians. That the Jews lived amongst them, is ever acknowledged by their Historians, accounting it an honour, as all Nations do, to have sent forth Colonies. But to take away disgrace, and to save the honour of their Country, (which to the Priests was ever most solemn) abominable Lyes have been made, and strange stories devised, concerning their first coming into Egypt, and especially about their departure: which briefly to relate seemeth agreeable enough to the nature of our design.

Manetho his Lyes concerning the Originall of the Jews.

10. Manetho, an Egyptian Priest and Historian, pretending to describe the Originall of the Jews, relateth that in the dayes of one of their Kings, Timaus by name, a certain ignorant people called Hycsos, (which signifieth Royall Shepherds, or Cassites as he himself interpreteth it) from the Eastern parts, with great confidence invaded Egypt, which easily obtaining without any force of Arms, they burnt the City and Temples, and raged against the Natives with Sword and Servitude. At length they made them a King of their own stock, named Salus, who, coming down into the Country about Memphis, imposed a Tribute upon the upper and neather Province; and put Garrisons in convenient places. Especially he took care of the Eastern Coasts, being jealous of the Power of the Assyrians; so that in the Principality of Sais, Eastward from the River Bubastis, he built up a City called antiently Anaris, which fortifying with most strong walls, he therein placed a Garrison of 240000 Men. When he had reigned nineteen years, he gave place to Beon, who governed 44, after him Apachnas 36 with seven moneths, then Apochis 61, Janius 50 and one moneth, then Assis 49. Under those six first Kings, they sore oppressed, and endeavoured utterly to destroy Egypt, and 511 years had they power over it. Afterwards the Kings of the Province of Thebes, and the remaining part of Egypt, fell on them with a great and lasting War, and by a King named Alisfragmutibosis, were they overcome, and driven up into a place containing the quantity of 10000 Akers of ground, called Auaris. The Son of this King, Themosis by name, attempted the taking of this place, besieging it with 480000 Men; but, despairing of successe, agreed with them, that leaving Egypt, they should go whither else they pleased; so that departing with all their goods, to the number of 240000 persons, they travelled through the Desert into Syria, (for that they feared the Assyrians, who then obtained the Empire of Asia) and built them a City in the Country, afterwards called Judan, which might suffice for so many thousands, and named it Jerusalem.

In 2^o Egyptiac.
apud Josephum
lib. 1. contr.
Apionem.

11. To this history taken out of the antient records, Manetho addeth, as he confesseth, fabulous reports rise amongst the Vulgar, mixing with the Israelites a multitude of Egyptians languishing with Leprosie and other diseases; which he relateth, as having forgotten, that the Shepherds left Egypt 518 years before, as may be gathered from the series of the Kings, and the distance of time betwixt Themosis, who reigned when the Shepherds departed, and Aminophis, under whom the Lepers went out: the time of whose reign neither dareth he to define; though he be exact, in the years of other Princes, as Josaphus noteth. Now this Amenophis, forsooth, was told by a Priest of the same name, That he might see the gods, if he would cleanse his Kingdom from Lepers, and other unclean persons. He, being a very religious Man, gathered all the infirm out of the Land, to the number of 80000, whom he sent with others to cut stones on the East of the River Nile; there being amongst them also some of the learned Priests infected with Leprosie. Because favour was shewed towards them, the Priest who would have had them destroyed, feared much the displeasure of the gods, as well against himself as the King, and foreseeing they should have power over Egypt for thirteen years, he durst not tell the King so much, but wrote a Book concerning the matter, and then killed himself; which cast the King (you must know) into a great melancholly.

12. But being still desired to do something for the security of the diseased people, he gave them Avaris, the City of the Shepherds, now not inhabited: whither being entred, and perceiving the place to be very advantageous for rebellion, they made choice of Osarsiphus, one of the Priests of Heliopolis, for their Captain, swearing to obey him in all things. He presently established for Law, that they should not worship the gods, nor abstain from such creatures as were most sacred to the Egyptians; to marry with none but those that were tied to them by the same league, and commanding many other things (especially such as he knew contrary to Egyptian custom) he prepared for War. Then sent he to the Shepherds at Jerusalem, formerly expelled by Themasis, to open their condition to them, and to invite them to give their assistance against Egypt. The Shepherds readily closed with the motion, and all, to the number of 200000, marched down to Avaris. Amenophis much startled hereat, especially because of the Prediction of the Priest, committed his Son, but five years old, to a Friend; and, together with Apis and his other gods, went into Ethiopia, where he was received with all his multitudes of Subjects, and was kindly entertained by the King, who made provision for them for these thirteen years. The Solymitans, or Shepherds, with the unclean multitude, made now great havock of all things in Egypt, burning Villages and Cities, and raging against the sacred Animals with their Priests, whom they compelled to be their Butchers, and drave away naked; the forementioned Priest still giving Laws, and framing their Policy; who being from Osiris the Heliopolitan-god called Osarsiphus, now changed his name into Moses. But at the end of the thirteen years, Amenophis returned with great power out of Ethiopia, and with the assistance of his Son Rampses, fell upon the Shepherds and unclean multitude, whereof killing many they pursued the rest as far as the borders of Syria.

13. These ridiculous lyes are much more augmented by others. Charemon, who professed to write the History of Egypt, giveth the same name Amenophis to the King, and of Rhameses to his Son; but addeth, that the Goddesse Isis appeared to the former, complaining that her Temple was destroyed by War. That Phrisphanes a sacred Scribe, told the King, that if he would be freed from terrors in the night, he must purge Egypt from polluted Men: he therefore gathering out 250000 diseased persons, cast them out of his borders: That the two Scribes Moses and Josaph (the Egyptian name of the former being Tisibes, and of the later Petephis) became their Leaders, and, coming to Pelusium, found there 380000, which Amenophis having left behind would not convey into Egypt: with those they struck up a league, and undertook an Expedition against the Land. Amenophis not expecting the issue of their attempt, fled into Ethiopia, leaving his wife big with child, which lying hid in a Cave, brought forth a Son called Messenes. He, when he came to age expelled the Jews, to the number of 200000 into Syria, and received back his Father Amenophis out of Ethiopia.

14. Lysimachus an Historian, going beyond the other two in the maliciousness of his lyes, wrote, that when Bocchoris reigned in Egypt, the people of the Jews, infected with Leprosie, Scab, and other diseases, resorted to the Temple to beg for their living, and many being infected with this disease, barrenness fell upon the Land. Bocchoris, sending to the Oracle of Ammon about it, received this answer; that the Temples were to be cleansed from impure and prophane persons, who were to be cast out into the Desert; but the scabbie and Leprous should be drowned, the Sun not enduring they should live; which being done, and the Temples purified, fruitfulness would be restored to the Earth. Bocchoris accordingly ordered the Priests to gather all the prophane out of the Temples, and give them up to Soldiers, who were to carry them into the Wilderness; and the Leprous and Scabbie to be wrapped in Lead, and cast into the Sea; which being drowned accordingly, the other were exposed to perish in the Desert. But those, consulting for their own safety, kept fires that night, and strict watch; then, the day following, a solemn Fast to God for their preservation. On the next, counsell was given them by a certain Man named Moses, that they should march on in one body, till they arrived at some good Soil. Then commanded he them to be kind to no man, to give bad counsell rather than good, and overthrow the Temples of the gods, as many as they should find; which being approved of, they travelled through the Desert, and, after much trouble, came to a fruitfull Soil, where using the Inhabitants very injuriously, and rifling and burning the Temples, they arrived at length in that Country, since called Judaa, and building a City seated themselves there. This City was at first called Hierosyla, from the spoiling of the Temples; but afterwards, to shun the disgrace of the occasion, they changed it into Hierosolyme, and took the name of Hierosolymians.

Apion his Lyes.

15. Further than this; Apion a Grammarian of Alexandria, as he counterfeited himself, but born in Oasis, a Town of Egypt, amongst severall other Lyes against the Jews, wrote, that he had received from the eldest of the Egyptians, how Moses was a Heliopolitan, and, being brought up according to the customs of his Country, changed the rites thereof at his own pleasure. That he led the Leprous, Blind, and Lame, out of Egypt; but fairly saith, it was in the first year of the seventh Olympiad, the same wherein Carthage was built by the Tyrians, which happened about 150 years after Hiram the King of Tyre (as appeareth out of the Phœnician Annals) with whom Solomon was contemporary. He mentioned the same number of infirm persons as Lyfimachus, but addeth a reason why the Sabbath was so called. Travelling six dayes together, saith he, on the seventh day they rested in Judaa, for that they were sorely plagued with Ulcers in their privy parts, and named it Sabbath, from the Egyptian word Sabbatosis, which signifieth that disease. Norwithstanding that he saith they finished their journey in six dayes, yet he further writeth, that Moses hid himself for forty dayes upon the Mount Sinai (which lyeth betwixt Egypt and Arabia) whence coming down, he gave Laws unto the Jews. As for the Jewish Religion, he was not ashamed to write, that in their Temple was set the head of an Asse made of gold, and of great value, which being there worshipped, was taken thence when Antiochus Epiphanes spoiled the place.

Josephus Lib. 2. contr. Apionem.

Reason for these Lyes raised by the Egyptians, and others against the Jews.

16. Such absurdities were delivered by the Egyptians, and those who out of desire to gratifie them, have, after their example, endeavoured to conceal the truth; to which Josephus in his two Books against Apion, hath abundantly answered. Severall reasons have moved them to corrupt their Originall Records. The Israelites growing great in that Country, out of it they returned to the promised Land by the stretched out arm of God, to the great reproach of their cruel and imperious Lords. The difference of religion raised also betwixt the two Nations (as betwixt the Jews and the whole world) mortall enmity, whilst the one worshipped the onely true God, and the base and degenerate spirit of the other fell down to things far inferior to themselves; which difference some (though but few) persons discerning, were ambitious to become Profelytes to the Jewish Doctrine: Hence again arose such Envy, that some descended to that indiscretion and weaknesse, as to contradict their own most ancient and authentick Writers. The in-bred blindnesse of Men's minds, increased by Paganish Education, hath so far prevailed, that the (b) greatest part of Heathen Writers have in this contention sided with the Egyptians, (otherwise contemptible enough in their eyes) and subscribed to what they have said concerning the Originall of the Jewish Nation; though some (c) have not given credit to such reports.

Manetho his
logic.

17. As Manetho erreth in the cause of the departure of the Jews out of Egypt, so also in the time thereof, though not so grossly as his Friend Apion. Manetho nameth the King Themusis, by whom they were expelled: Who, if the same with Amosis, he lived 230 years before their true departure; and that he is the same appeareth by Manetho's Catalogue, taken out of Josephus. But (to go on with the Storied of the Kings) Themusis reigned, according to Manetho, 25 years and four moneths after their Expulsion. Chebron his Son succeeded him, and reigned thirteen years; next him, Amenophis 20 with seven moneths; his Sister Amesses 2 and 9 moneths. Mephres followed her, and continued twelve years and nine moneths, him Mephramuthosis, who reigned 25 and ten moneths; then Thmosis nine and eight moneths, Amenophis thirty and ten moneths, Orus 36 and five moneths. His Daughter Acencheres reigned 12 years and one moneth, Rathosis her Brother nine years, Acencheres twelve and five moneths, another of that name twelve and three moneths, Armais four and one moneth, Armesis one and four moneths, Armesses Miamun Sixty six and two moneths, and lastly Amenophis nineteen and 6 moneths. In whose time one who, forsaking Eusebius, followeth Manetho, in ranking those Kings, holdeth the Israelites to have departed Egypt, and consequently will have this King drowned in the Sea. That Ramesse Miamun was he, who first began to afflict the Israelites, the length of his reign (as * one supposeth) maketh probable; whose name also seemeth to him, to have given appellation to one of the Cities, in building of which they were employed.

Egyptus.

18. After Amenophis reigned Sethosis, who having great Forces both by Land and Sea, left his Brother Armais deputy of Egypt, and forbidding him the Diadem and meddling with his Wife or Concubines, undertook an Expedition against Cyprus and Phœnicia, and then against the Affyrians and Medes, all which he brought under, either by the sword or the terror of his name, whereby, elevated in his mind, he confidently marched up and down the East-countries, overturning the Cities and States thereof at his pleasure. Much time being herein spent, his Brother in the mean while acted all things in Egypt contrary to his injunctions, by the advice of his Friends, assuming the Diadem and rebelling. Of this the Chief-Priest secretly gave him intelligence, so that hasting back to Pelusium, he recovered his Kingdom. Manetho addeth, that this Sethosis was also called Egyptus, (from whence the Country took the name of Egypt) and this his Brother Armais had also the appellation of Danaus. If so; then Amenophis, who was swallowed up of the Sea, must be taken for Belus, the Father of Egyptus and Danaus according to the Greeks, who not being confounded with the Father of Ninus (as by Mythologists he is wont to be) is said to have lived 322 years before the destruction of Troy, which account Learned Usher judgeth fitly to agree with the time of Amenophis. He also thinketh Ramesse Miamun to be Neptune, Mia coming near to, and therefore seeming to be derived from, Moy; which in the antient Egyptian language, according to Josephus, signifieth water. Neptune is said also to be Father of Busiris, who at this time tyrannizing about the River Nile, cruelly slew such Strangers as came near him. Such a Son indeed was worthy of so cruell a Father as Ramesse Miamun; and it seemeth likely enough, that the Story of Busiris might be taken from his and his Son's cruelty to the Israelites, and so the thing may well enough be applied to Amenophis. Further, if we observe what * another telleth us, that the Poets are wont to call cruell and bloody men by the name of Neptune, as born of the raging and troublesome Sea; then may we find more reason for Ramesse Miamun his being so called, because of his inhumanity towards the Israelites and their innocent Children.

concerning Sethosis.

His 'Conquests.

19. Now, to joyn this Storie of the Egyptians with that of the Greeks, (whom yet the other complain of, as corrupting their Antiquities) (d) Apol-lorus writeth, how Neptune, on Lybia the Daughrer of Epaphas (who (d) Lib. 2. being the Son of Telegonus, and 10 the second daughter to Jasus King of Argos, built Memphis, as some say, and reigned in the lower part Egypt) begat two Sons Belus and Agenor, whereof the later went into Phanicia, and there reigned. Belus obtained Egypt, and of Anchinoe the Daughrer of Nilus begot Egyptus and Danau. He sent *Danau*s to inhabit Africk or Lybia (so called from his Mother); and after Egyptus had subdued the Country of the Melampodi, or Black-feet, named it Egypt after himself, which, according to Eusebius, was formerly called Aeria, and, according to others, Potamitis. But he whom Maneth, in Josephus, calleth Sesothis, seemeth to be the same with Diodorus his Sesosis, and Sesistris of Herodotus, concerning whom both of them record (as Manetho hath done) very admirable things. Agreeable to what Manetho delivereth of Sesothis, Herodotus (e) writeth, that Sesistris subdued many Nations. (f) Diodorus saith, that Sesosis conquered Arabia and Lybia before his Father's death, and afterwards having a great ambition to do as much by all the World, first secured the affections of his Subjects at home (to keep them in obedience) by his clemency and bounty. Then with an Army of 60000 Foot, 24000 Horse, and 27000 Chariots, he set upon the Ethiopians, towards the South, whom having conquered, he compelled to pay a Tribute of Ebonie, Ivory, and Gold. With a Navy of 400 Ships sent into the Red Sea, he subdued all the maritime Coasts, as far as India; he himself with a Land-Army overrunning not onely those parts of Asia which afterwards Alexander subdued, but beyond Ganges all as far as the Ocean it self.

(e) Lib. 2.
c. 102, &c.
(f) Lib. 1.
p. 34, &c.

20. After this, he conquered the Nations of Scythia as far as the River
to make a Plantation by the Lake Meosis, that gave originall to the Nation of the Calchi, which the Egyptians supposed they sufficiently proved to be their Colonie from the use of Circumcision, imagining that the Jews had also this rite from them. Finally all Asia he subdued, with most of the Islands Cyclades; but then passing over into Europe, was in danger of losing his Army for want of Provisions, and by the difficulty of places: therefore in Thrace he put bounds to his Expedition, having in all places erected Pillars, wherein was written his successe; and where he found courage, he caused a member of a Man to be ingraven, but where he met with cowardise that of a Woman. At length, after nine years, he returned home with much spoil, where he refreshed, and rewarded his victorious Army. Here he was not idle, but set himself to such works as he thought might eternize his name, wherein he imployed none of his naturall Subjects, but the Captives he had brought with him. This the Babylonians not enduring, brake out into rebellion, and fortifying a place near the River, held it out in despite of him, till at last by composition they enjoyed a Seat, which they called Babylon, in remembrance of their own Country. He raised up great heaps of stones and earth, and to them removed such Cities, as by reason of the lownesse of their situation, were obnoxious to inundations from the River: yet, lest there should be want of water, and for convenience of trade, he caused Rivolets to be digged throughout the Land; he also fortified the Country by a wall on the East, and otherwise provided against invasions.

His pride.

21. For an ostentation of his greatnesse, he caused such, as being subdued held their Kingdoms of him, or had received new Principalities at his hand, at certain times to come down with their Presents, whom he otherwise used with much respect: but being to go to the Temple, or enter the City, he would loose his Horses out of his Chariot, and be drawn by four of these Princes. At length, having excelled all Men in Conquests, and other Royall Atchievements, he fell blind, and killed himself when he had reigned 33 years; for which act he was the more admired by the Egyptians. These amongst other things are reported of Sesistris, before whose Statue many years after Darius, the son of Hystaspes causing his own to be erected, the chief Priest contradicted it, alleading that Darius had not yet excelled Sesostris in honourable actions; with which freedom the King was well pleased, and said, if he lived, he would labour to come no whit short of him. His son succeeded him of the same name and misfortune in the losse of his sight, which to recover he was bid by an Oracle to wash his eyes in the Urine of some woman which never knew any other man then her own husband. Beginning with that of his own wife, he proceeded to make trial of the honesty of many others, but found none effectual to the cure, but the wife of a certain Gardiner, which woman he then married, and burnt all the rest. Many after him followed in order till one Arnosus came to the Government, who by his Tyranny made way for Atisanes, the King of Ethiopia. He, using his power with moderation, put no Malefactor to death, but, cutting off their Noses, sent them away into the Confines of Egypt and Syria, where he built them a Citie, called from the maimednesse of the inhabitants Rhinocolura, which was destitute of all sorts of provisions through the barrennesse, and unhealthfulnesse of the place. The soyl he chose on purpose, that they might be diverted from idle, and vicious courses, by anxious and effectual care for a livelihood, which they got by a trade of fishing in the adjoining Sea.

22. After his death the Egyptians recovered the Sovereignty, and created a King of their own Nation, called Mendes. He spent his life in making provision for death by a Sepulcher inimitable for Art, which he made under the notion of a Labrynth; according to which pattern they believed Dadalus to have framed that he made for Minos, King of Crete, wherein to keep the Minotaure. After Mendes an Anarchy followed for a long time, till one of ignoble extraction was made King; by the Egyptians, named Cetes, but by the Greeks Proteus, who living in the time of the Trojan War, had great skill in Astrology, and the knowledge of winds; whence, and because the Kings of Egypt were wont to have several kinds of living Creatures, Trees, Fire, and other things painted, and worn about their heads, the Greeks took occasion to invent that fable of his turning himself into all manner of shapes. Remphis his Son, and Successor spent his time in the improvement of his revenue and customes, insomuch that he died far richer then any of his Predecessors, having got together 400000 Talents of Gold and Silver. The next, who was any thing considerable was Nileus, who because he took great care about bringing water from the River to furnish the Countrey, changed the name of it from Egypt into Nile.

23. The 8th. from Nileus was Chemmis, who being born at Memphis reigned fifty years, and built the greatest of the three Pyramids, counted amongst the seven wonders of the World. Herodotus writeth that the first King who gave his mind to this work was Cheops, and that he prostituted his daughter to raise money for this purpose: That the biggest was twenty years in building by no fewer then 100000 work-men, towards the diet of whom the price of Onions and Garlick onely, amounted to 1600 Talents of silver: That his daughter, of every one who had to do with her, begged a stone, and therewith built a little Pyramid near adjoining. Diodorus writeth that the basis of the greatest was on each side 700 foot broad, the height above 600 foot, and at the top it was six Cubits broad, all of solid stone very hard, and of an everlasting substance, which he proveth for that the whole structure in his time remained unchanged and uncorrupted, though raised 1000 years before. But others which within this hundred years have travelled into Egypt relate how those monstrous buildings which stand 13 miles off from Memphis, and look like Mountains at a distance, are on the North-side much eaten, and consumed with that wind; the Etesian winds being there as much putrifying as the Southern in other parts. These Piles of stone stand in a sandy place which affordeth not any quarries of stone, some five miles distant from the Nile, so that the work may well seem right miraculous, though the Egyptians raised many fables thereupon. But so many thousands of men were to be killed killed with this toil that one might be stately buried ; which yet they say happened not to him : For the people were so enraged hereat, that his son durst not there bury him , but laid him in another obscure and ignoble place. And yet he could not contain himself , but to his power must also imitate his father's madness.

Diodorus.

Vide Phicium lib. 36. c. 22.

Cephren, 24. Cephren the brother of Chemmis succeeded him, and reigned 56 years, Herodotus, though some would have his son Chabrys immediately to have followed him. Diodorus.

He spent his time the same way, building another Pyramid in workmanship like to the former, but much inferior to it in compass and largeness ; being also buried in an obscure place for fear of the rage of the multitude. After Cephren followed Mycerinus (or Mycherinus) the son of Chemmis, or Cheops, of whom the Egyptians made great account, because he reformed much amiss in his Father's and Uncle's days. He also built a Pyramid lesse than the other , but in excellency of workmanship far exceeding them. One Bocchoris, Bocchoris succeeded next, according to Diodorus; in body contemptible, but for endowments of mind going beyond all his Predecessors. Then, after a long time came in Sabacon the Aethiopian, and reigned in Egypt. But Herodotus writeth that Apychis succeeded Mycerinus, and built a Pyramid of Brick ; then followed Anysis, who being blind, in his time Sabacus, or Sabacon, invaded Egypt, and drove him into the Fens, where he hid himself : but Africanus relateth that Sabacon took Bocchoris alive, and burning him quick, reigned in his stead eight years. This cruelty is little agreeable to that humanity which Herodotus ascribeth to him, viz. that he put no malefactor to death; but, according to the degree of guilt, imposed upon every one the carriage of so much earth to the place where he dwelt ; and hereby the Towns were made much higher, and lesse subject to inundations , at the time of the overflowing of the River. His piety is much commended ; for being told by one of the gods, that if he would reign quietly in Egypt he must cut off all the Priests by the middle, he made choice rather to quit his interest in the Kingdom, and the possession thereof , than to hazard the quiet of it, or commit such an act of cruelty. He is thought by some to be the same with Soo, King of Egypt, who combined with Hoshea of Israel against Salmannasar.

25. After his departure Herodotus brings the blind man out of his lurking hole, where he had now lien fifty years, and maketh him to have recovered the Kingdom. More likely it is that Sathon the Priest of Vulcan succeeded him, thought to be Senectus his son whom Africanus placeth after him, and it may seem probable enough that if he forsook the Kingdom himself, yet he might leave his son in the Government. This Sathon (or Seathon) wholly devoted to his Superstition neglected Military men, and therefore when Senacherib King of Assyria invaded Egypt, was quite forsaken by them ; yet he is said by his importunity so far to have prevailed with his god, that pitching his Tents at Pelusium, the Mice did eat the Thongs of the Assyrian Targets, and the Horse-Bridles, so that his Enemies were rendred incapable of fighting; and, confounded with fear at so strange an accident, retreated. But whatsoever was done at Pelusium, the Prophecies against Egypt clearly shew that the Assyrians pierced further into the Countrey, and led away a multitude in Captivity. After Senectus, Africanus placeth Tirachis the Aethiopian, the same with Tirhaka, who affrighted Senacherib back into his Countrey, and is said to have made an expedition into Europe, and pierced as far as the Pillars of Hercules. Him followed an Anarchy of two years, and then happened the Government of twelve men together, which having continued fifteen years, Psammetichus one of the twelve, assisted by the Ionians and Carians, got the power wholly to himself. He reigned 54 years, 29 whereof he spent in the siege of Azotus, or Ashdod in Syria. By placing his Egyptian Soldiers in the left Wing of his Army, he gave them such distaste, that, disdain-ing strangers should have the chief place, 200000 forsook him, and, do what he could, departing into Aethiopia, there seated themselves. He, first of all Egyptian Princes, invited the Greeks, and others to Trade in his Dominions, ons, from which they had been formerly discouraged, either by the severity of his Predecessors, or by giving credit to the fable of Rusru.

26. He left the Kingdom to his son Neco, called in Scripture Pharoh Neco, who first undertook that fruitless task of cutting a passage from the River Nile into the Red-Sea, and in that work spent the lives of 120000 men. Undertaking a War at Gods command against the Assyrian, Josias King of Judah opposed him in the Valley of Megiddo, where he was wounded, and so mortally wounded that he died within a short space. After his return he disposed of the Kingdom of Judah to Eliakim, to whom he gave the name of Jehojakim, and made him his Tributary: Him Nebuchadnezzar King of Assyria withdrawing from his obedience to his own service, Neco went up against the Assyrian to Carchemish, and there was slain as is before (a) shewn from Scripture. Herodotus (b) writeth that he got a victory over the Syrians in Magdalum, and took Cadytis in Syria, which may well be that Kadesh mentioned by (c) Moses. He reigned sixteen years, saith Herodotus, six saith Eusebius, and was succeeded by his son Psammiss or Psammitichus, who after he had reigned six years made an expedition into Aethiopia, and died. Him followed Apries, his son, called in Scripture Pharoh Hophra or Apries, and Vaphres, who invading Phœnicia, made War by Land upon Sidon. He fought a battel at Sea with the Tyrians, whom overthrowing, and returning home with great spoyle, he was so far puffed up, as to persuade himself that no god could deprive him of his Kingdom; so strongly did he think he had established it. But making War upon the Cyrenæans, he received from them a great overthrow, and the Souldiers thereupon mutined against him as having wilfully exposed them unto danger. To appease them, he sent one Amasis whom they presently chose for their King, and he after some pause accepted their offer. Apries fled, but after some time was taken, and by Amasis delivered up to his Subjects, who strangled him, having reigned six years.

27. With this report of Herodotus agreeth Diodorus Siculus his storie, relating how Apries vanquished the Cyprians and Phœnicians in a Sea-fight, took by force and demolished Sidon, wan the other Towns of Phœnicia with the Isle of Cyprus, and finally perished, as is before rehearsed, when he had reigned 22 years. But others of late considering the more sure Testimony of Scripture, and how Egypt was promised to Nebuchadnezzar * as wages for the service he had done against Tyre; how Pharoh and his Army should be slain by the sword, and the Jews in Egypt, and Pharoh Hophra delivered into the hands of his Enemies as Zedekiah had been; resolve that the Egyptian Priests notably deluded those Historians, hiding the disgrace and bondage of their Nation. Therefore it is thought fit rather to believe the report of Josephus, that Nebuchadnezzar in the 23th year of his reign, and the 5th after the destruction of Jerusalem Conquered Egypt; killed the King thereof, and appointed another in his stead. Some think Amasis might be used as an instrument by Nebuchadnezzar, and for that was made Governour by him; others that the Deputy, or Vice-Roy, which he had set over the Land was slain by Amasis. Agreeable to this later opinion, the Army of Ionians and Carians are held to have been none other than the Garrisons of Mercenaries left by the Assyrian, for the Guard of his Viceroy, and custody of this his new subdued Province: as likewise the Company returning from Cyrene and Barce, who, together with the friends of such as were slain in that expedition, deposed, & slue Apries, are conceived to have been the Egyptian Fugitives, which then recovered their own Countrey, seeing that of the Prophet was verified: At the end of fourty years will I gather the Egyptians from the people where they were scattered, and I will bring again the Captivity of Egypt, and will cause them to return into the Land of Pathros, into the Land of their habitation, and they shall be there a small Kingdom.

28. Amasis being a man of mean extraction, and perceiving himself upon that account, despised of his people, took a Golden Vessel wherein he and his Guests had used to wash their feet, and thereof made an image of a god, which which when the Egyptians worshipped with great reverence, he called them together, and comparing his Original with the former use of the Gold, convinced them of that equal reverence which the change of both ought to beget in them. Under him the Egyptians boasted that their Countrey was most happy, no fewer then 1020 Towns of good note flourishing therein, in his dayes. He made a Law that all men should yearly give account how they lived, which if they could not prove to be by some honest calling, they were to be punished with death; and this, Solon is said to have translated to Athenians. He being the first of all others that took Cyprus, reigned 54. or 55 years. It seemeth probable enough that he revolted from Cyrus, being before tributary to the Babylonian Empire (though the Priests hid this amongst other things from Herodotus and others); and that this was the chief cause, whatever is pretended, why Cambyfes came down and conquered his Kingdom. This was not accomplished in his time, he dying in preparation for the War. But his Son Psammetichus succeeding him lost all, and so Egypt became a Province of the Persian Empire; which things involving much of the affairs of Persia, and nearly relating to the tragedie of Cambyfes, are to be referred to a more proper place.

Psammetichus.

The Kingdom of Egypt very antient.

29. The Egyptians, accounting themselves the most antient of all Nations, were not wanting indeed of many reasons to witness their antiquity, although their pride transported them beyond the true Epoche of their Original. The Scripture it self witnesseth Egypt to have been a mighty Kingdom, every way better replenished then any other Country that we can read of, in so antient times: in the dayes of Abraham it was a flourishing Kingdom, and the Israelites were not a People till such time as the Egyptians were one of the most flourishing Nations upon Earth. The Ethiopians concluded themselves more antient, because Egypt, as they thought; was of old a Sea or Lake, (k) antient Writers being of opinion, that it was the gift of the River Nile, which having once contained within it self all the compasse of the Land, at length warped it up out of it's bowels; so that from it's mud, or dirt, the firm ground proceeded, and became a Continent. They urge, that in the yearly inundations of the Nile much mud is left and sticks immovable; that in the mountains of Egypt the shells of Fishes are found; that the Springs and Wells there digged, afford water of a brackish taste, as if the reliques of Sea-water yet remained in the Earth: Lastly, they say, that the Island Pharus at this day, is scarce a mile distant from Alexandria; whereas in the time of (l) Homer it was a day and a nights sail off from Egypt. But experience sheweth, that for some thousands of years there hath been no accession by any such mud, but that those Towns which anciently stood upon the Shore of the Sea, and River, still continue there. The shells might come from the generall Deluge, being found also in other places as well as Egypt. Many describe the Fountain of the Sun at Heliopolis, and yet none observe any brackish taste in the water. And as for Pharus in the Trojan times it was distant from Canopus, where Menelaus is thought to have arrived, but 120 furlongs; and therefore could not be a day and nights sail from Egypt, as Homer wrote by virtue of his Poetick liberty, or rather his ignorance in Geographie.

Egypt not the gift of the Nile, as was generally imagined.

The antiquity of the Greeks, novelty in comparison of that of the Egyptians.

30. Certainly they had cause enough to charge the Greeks with novelty, and to jeer (as they did) at their pedantick pretence to Antiquity; the lustre of any one of their Common-wealths being to that of theirs but as yesterday; their Laws and Policy, their Religion and Rites but new upstarts, and (as the Egyptians would go about to demonstrate) but copies of their Originall. There was ripenesse of literature, civil discipline, and inventions of severall sorts amongst them, before the like did as much as bud forth in Greece, Italy, or other Western Countries. They stick not to instance wherein the Greeks have borrowed of them. All, or most of the names of their gods, with the superstition belonging to them, were, they say, stolen out of their Country, the Rites being something altered and new stories invented, to blind the World, as to their Originall. Osiris they avow to have been the true Bacchus or Dionysus, in whose Mysteries Orpheus the Poet being initiated whilst he sojourned in Egypt, when he was afterwards kindly entertained at Thebes in Bœotia, to gratifie them of that place, raised a Fable of his being born there, and begotten by Jupiter on Semele the Daughter of Cadmus, a certain Bastard having at that time been born of her, and fathered upon Jupiter. Isis the Sister and Wife of Osiris, they affirm to be the true Ceres. Hercules was an Egyptian, not born immediately before the Trojan War, but in the most antient time, even at the beginning of Mankind, to which season the wearing of a Club and Lyons-skin was most congruous, when clothes were not as yet found out, as also his cleansing the Country of Monsters and wild Beasts, at that time; the Earth being but inhabited in a scattered manner. Apollo in like sort was no other than Orus, who was taught the Arts of Prophecy and Healing, by his Mother Isis. As to this controversie, is observable the incertainty of the names of those Heathenish vanities, the same being to some Isis, to others Ceres, and to others Themophoris (or, the Inventor of Laws) to others Juno, to others the Moon; and to some all those names are one. Osiris in like manner, is now taken for Serapis, then for Dionysus, otherwhiles for Pluto, somerimes for Ammon and Jupiter; and not seldome thought to be Pan, as Diodorus hath observed.

Colonies pretended to, by the Egyptians.

31. Severall Colonies they glory to have sent forth. The first by Belus the Son Libya, and Neptune, into Babylon; where, upon Euphrates, he constituted Flamins after the custom of Egypt, free from all taxes and impositions. These by the Babylonians were called Chaldaans, who in imitation of the Egyptian Priests, and Philosophers, observed the Stars. Danaus out of Egypt peopled Argos the (almost) antientest City of Greece. The Nation of the Colchi and the Jews they prove theirs by Original, from the rite of Circumcision. Cadmus and Phœnix his Brother they report to have been Natives of their Egyptian Thebes, whence the former translated the name of that City into Greece: but Agenor his Father, as is believed, (being the Brother of Belus and Uncle to Egyptus and Danaus) came thence into Phœnicia, then have they further occasion to boast of a Colonie led by him into that maritime tract. The Athenians they prove to have been a Colonie, led by Cecrops from Sais in Egypt, for that they alone called their City Astu, from a place so named in their Country, and because the members of their Common-wealth were distinguished into three ranks; of Noblemen, who only were capable of honours as the Egyptian Priests; Country-men who bare Arms agreeable to that sort of people in Egypt, who being called Husbandmen, afforded Soldiers for the Wars; lastly, Artificers, exercising manual and common Arts, which fitly answereth to the custom of that place. Besides Cecrops, Petes the Father of Mnestheus and Eristheus were of the Egyptian extraction; of whom the later carrying great store of Corn out of Egypt to Athens, thereby obtained the Kingdom, and gave occasion to the Story that Ceres at that time came into Greece.

32. Although it may not passe for currant, that the whole World is beholding to them for the use of Letters, the knowledge of the Stars, Geometricall Speculations, the best Laws, and most of the liberall Arts, as they have bragged; yet most antient have several of these things been amongst them. Besides the common and usuall way of writing, they had certain Noces, called * Hieroglyphicks, wherein each letter served for a word, and single words expressed whole sentences. As by the image of a Vulture they expressed the word Nature, because in that kind of Bird no Male can be found. By the picture of a Bee making Honey they understood a King; hinting, that in a Governour, a sting or sharpnesse ought to be mixed with sweetnesse. They also used ænigmaticall compositions or mixtures of images; as, by a Scepter with an Eye, and an Ear on the top thereof, they signified the Sovereign and all-knowing Majesty of God. As for Astronomy, though the Babylonians, for the antiquity of their knowledge herein, had no need to give them place, yet were the Egyptians furthered in the due observation of the Stars, by the plainnesse and evennesse of their ground, and the severity of the air; it never raining in Egypt in ordinary course of Nature, which defect is supplied by the yearly overflowing of the River. If the World be bounden to them them for Geometry, it's to be ascribed also to their River, as another fruit of it's inundation, whereby washing away the marks and removing the fences of their particular Lands, they were forced every year to measure them over again, and thence, through necessity, driven to Mathematicall speculations. Now that the best Laws, and most ingenuous Arts were from them conveyed into Greece, they evidence by a particular of the bearers.

Greek Poets & Philosophers that borrowed their knowledge of the Egyptians.

33. The Priests, pretending in their Sacred Records to find the Register of their names, and to demonstrate the truth thereof by other tokens, have made mention of Orpheus, who out of Egypt fetched the Mysteries of Ceres, with the Fable of the Inferi, or those in Hell; the severall places whereof, with the Ferrie-man Charon, are taken out of the Fens of Acherusia, and the passing over this Lake by boat to bury their dead there. Besides him, they make mention of Museus, Melampus, Dadalus, and Homer, who travelled into Egypt to get knowledge. To these they add, of Law-givers, Lycurgus the Spartan, and Solon the Athenian, who borrowed many of their Laws, and Plato the choicest of his notions. Pythagoras of Samos from them received his Sacred Speech, as it's called; his Principles of Geometry, Arithmetic, and The doctrine of the transmigration of Souls. Democritus of Abdera they take for granted, to have lived amongst them five years, in which time he proved an excellent Astrologer. Oenopis of Chius, by his conversation with their Priests and Astrologers, amongst other things, learnt the particular oblique course of the Sun. And, to add no more; Eudoxus the Mathematician is beholding to Egypt (where he studied) for those instructions which much profited Greece, and thereby procured him no small honour.

Hermes or Mercurius Trismegistus.

34. The invention of Philosophy and Laws, with all the rest of the Egyptian wisdom, wherein Moses was learned, is ascribed by divers unto Hermes, or Mercurius Trismegistus; of whom yet either as to his person or time, nothing certainly can be affirmed. Cotta in Cicero, reckoneth up five, who have borne the name of Mercury. The first, begotten by the Heaven, or the Day; the second, Son to Valens and Pheron, who liveth under the Earth, called also Triphonus; the third, begotten by Jupiter the third on Maia; the fourth, Son to the Nile, whom the Egyptians feared to name for reverence sake; the fifth and last, whom the Pheneatians worship, who slew Argus, and flying thereupon, was set over Egypt; to the Inhabitants whereof he gave Laws and Literature, and was by them named Theus. But others attribute the finding out of Letters, not to the last, but the first Mercury truly called Theus, Thayoth, Thot, and Tautus; it being utterly against all Antiquity, that any should out of Greece transport Learning into Egypt. Others account two of this name naturall Egyptians, of whom the later was Nephew or Grand-son, to the former. Some think Joseph, some Moses the true Mercury. What ever he was, his Works lost and those yet extant, shew him to have been a Man very well skilled in true Divinity, and have gained him the credit to be numbered amongst the Prophets, and Sibylls, for that he wrote many things of God, worthy of admiration; nay also, it's believed, of the coming of Christ, of the Trinity, and the last Judgement. Of the Learning of the Egyptians he is (n) said to have written 36525 Books, if Pages be not rather meant hereby: And (o) telleth us, that in his time were extant 36 of his Books, viz. of the wisdom of the Egyptians sixteen, of Physick six, of the Orders of Priests ten, and four of Astrology.

The ancient Government of Egypt.

35. The most ancient Government of Egypt, though Monarchicall, yet left not Princes to the liberty of their own wills, which were restrained by the Laws and Customs, that had such authority over their private and domestick actions, as they could not exceed the bounds of Temperance and Moderation prescribed to them thereby. For no slaves were they suffered to entertain, which might prove instruments for debaucherie, but were attended by the Sons of the most noble Priests, excellently educated. Their hours, both night and day, were divided and set over to particular businesses. In the morning when first awake, Letters were brought in to them; that, having perfect intelligence, they might be better able to provide for the publick safety. When washed and royally apparelled they sacrificed; during which devotion the chief Priests prayed for them, and their subjects extolled their virtues, cursing at last their sins of ignorance, committed without their faults, and reflecting upon their Advisors and Councillors. Then did the Priests read out of the Records, famous Presidents of Council, or Action performed by their most Illustrious Predecessors, which were to them proposed as Copies to take out. Their time was prescribed, not onely of speaking to the people, and distributing Justice, but also of walking, washing, and other more secret employments. Their diet was very moderate: usually Veal and Goose, with a moderate quantity of Wine, as if ordered by an exact Physician. No liberty was there of punishing any man in passion, or choler, either of acting any otherwise unjustly; every case being determined by the Laws. Yet neither did they hereby account themselves straitned of true liberty, but rather happy in that they indulged not their appetites like other men. Hereby obtained they the love of their subjects who held them more dear, alive, or dead, than their own relations, and the Government continued for many Generations, as long as they submitted to those Rules and Orders.

The divisions of the Land, and its Inhabitants.

36. Sesosis, or Sesostris, divided Egypt into 36 Nomi; which word, whether Greek, or Egyptian, signified several Cities with certain Villages and Grounds thereto belonging. Of these, 10 belonged to the Province of Thebes, or to Thebais, other 10 to Delta, and the rest to the Midland Countreys lying betwixt them; all which had their several Nomarchæ, or Governours, who ruled them, and took care of the King's Tributes. The Lands were divided into three portions, whereof the first belonged to the Priests, who were in great Authority, and high esteem with the people. Of their Revenues they maintained Sacrifices throughout the Land, and their own families; being exempted from all burthens and impositions. They were chief Counsellors to the Kings, alwayes assisting with their advice, judging of things out of their deep skill in Astrology, and suggesting usefull matter out of the Records; their function hereditarily descending upon their Children. The second portion of Land belonged to the Kings, by which they maintained their State, waged War; rewarded deserving persons, and which affording them sufficient Treasure, they burthened not their Subjects by any Taxes. The third portion belonged to the Souldiers, who were at all occasions ready for the War; it seeming reasonable that such as ventured their lives for the safety of their Countrey should be well rewarded; and good policy not to commit the safeguard thereof to any that had nothing dear, or precious in it: and hereby they were encouraged to be carefull in behoof of their posterity which succeeded them in their possessions. As for the rest of the people, they were divided into three Ranks, or Orders, viz. Shepherds, Husband-men (that farmed the grounds), and Artificers; who all attending their businesse, and not meddling with State-affaires, neither having any right to Offices, thereby the more improved their Arts, and saved the Commonwealth harmlesse from such distempers, as are bred by the violence of an heady, and ignorant multitude.

The Courts of Justice.

37. Their Courts of Justice were furnished with the most upright, and able men that could be procured. Thirty Judges were chosen from Helio- polis (or On), Thebes, and Memphis, each of them 10. Which Assembly would not give place, either to that of the Areopagites at Athens, or the Senate at Lacedæmon. One of these thirty being chosen President, the Citie for which he served made choice of another to sit in his place. All had maintenance from the King; but the President in larger proportion: who also wore about his neck, in a Chain of Gold, an image of Truth made of precious stones, as a badge of his Office. When they were sate and the Codes, wherein the Laws were contained, laid before them; then the Plaintiff exhibited his Bill of the Crime, the manner of it, and the estimate of the dammage. The Defendant having a Copy of the Bill answered particularly to it, either that he did not the thing, committed no Crime in doing it, or else had not deserved so great a punishment. The Plaintiff had liberty to reply, and the other to re-

joyn his answer ; but after this, the 30 proceeded to judgement, and the President set the image of Truth towards one of the parties. No Lawyers were suffered to plead, as being thought rather to cast a mist upon the Cause, and darken the Evidence.

Particular
Laws.

38. As for particular Laws ; Perjury was punished with death as a great offence, both against God and man. If one man suffered another to be murdered in the high-way, or undergo any other violence, without giving his assistance, he was to die for it ; and if he could give him no help, he was bound to discover the Robber, and follow the Law against him, under pain of enduring a certain number of strokes, and being deprived of all sustenance for three dayes. False accusers underwent the punishment due to that fault they accused of. Every one was bound to give in an account to the Magistrate how he lived under pain of death ; which Law was made by Amasis. Wilfull murder, either of Bond, or Free, was death ; onely this Law took no hold on Parents ; but such were constrained to continue three dayes embracing the Carkeises. Against Children who killed their Parents most exquisite punishment was devised : for, having first their flesh all cut and flased, and then being laid upon Thorns, they were burnt quick. Women condemned were not executed before their delivery. For other Laws not-Capital, it was enacted that Souldiers running from their Colours, or disobeying their Officers should not dye ; but be branded with infamy, as a means to excite them to regain their former credit. If any held intelligence with the Enemy, his Tongue was to be cut of his head. They that imbased the Coyn, used new weights, counterfeited Seals ; Clarks that falsified and forged Records, were to loose their hands. Ravishment of a free woman was punished with the losse of the Members. Adultery of the man, with 1000 strokes with a Rod ; of the woman, with the losse of her Nose.

39. Bocchoris enacted, that he who denied the borrowing of any money should be absolved upon his Oath ; which was accounted as a sufficient purgation ; a mans credit being so much therein concerned. Usury upon Bond was not to exceed the double of the principal ; for which it was lawfull to distrain the goods, but in no wise to meddle with the person of the debtor that was owing to his Countrey, and not due to his Creditor ; especially if a Souldier, the common safety suffering in him. Upon this account, they were wont to scoff at the Lawgivers of Greece, who forbade seizing upon Plows, Weapons, and other things, but suffered those that should use them to be carried away, and imprisoned. For stealing, they had a peculiar Law : Every Thief entered his name with the Chief of that mystery ; and when he had stoln any thing carried it streight to him, where, if any one could tell the time, and place, and prove it by certain tokens to be his, he was to pay the fourth part of the value, and receive it again ; the Law-giver thinking this the best remedy against what otherwise could not be prevented.

The Law-
gypt.

40. The first man that gave Laws to the Egyptians was Mnevis, perswading the people to receive them, because they were communicated to him by Mercury. The second was Sasyches, who amongst other Laws instituted those concerning religion ; and, being a man of great learning, taught Geometry and Astronomy. 3. Sesostris, who as he excelled all others in military glory, so he made Laws for the Discipline of War. 4. Bocchoris, a wise and prudent man, several of whose Apotegms were a long time preserved in the memories of men. 5. Amasis, who much amended the whole policy of Egypt, his rare wisdom having preferred him to that high Dignity, for which also being admired abroad as well as at home, he was resorted to by some out of Greece as an Oracle. Lastly, Darius, the son of Hystaspes, King of Persia.

41. As for particular Customs. The Egyptians married as many wives as they pleased (posterity being with them a thing of greatest consequence) except the Priests, vvhoo were allowed but one apiece. Children born of bond-women, and free, were alike respected, and equally legitimate, the father by them being onely accounted the author of Generation, the mother affoordfollowed Achilles to the Siege of Troy, neither any place calleth he Hellas, but onely one in Thessalie, mentioned by Strabo, who knoweth not whether it be a Town or Country, though he would gladly prove, that, by Hellas, Homer understood the whole Nation: Strabo is in no wise to be heard against Thucydides, and Apollodorus, whereof the former witnesseth, that the Poet no where mentioneth the Barbarians, because all the Hellenes were not yet known by one common name, whom he might oppose against them; and the later expressly saith, that he onely called those in Thessalie by the name of Hellenes. But though in Homer's time the whole Nation might begin to be called Hellenes, and the Country Hellas; yet clear it is from many witnesses, that these names came out of Thessalie, and were thence transferred to signifie the whole Nation, and their Colonies placed elsewhere; insomuch, that priding themselves, as it were, in it, they wholly rejected the other of Græci (which signifying antient, as it seemeth, they had also out of Thessalie from the same people) who were afterwards called Hellenes; though the Poets despise it not, as Callimachus, Sophocles, and others; and the Latins still retain it, taking no notice of the other in their Language, whence these words Greece and Gracians are derived.

Vide Strab. lib. 8. p. 370. A.

2. Greece was not antiently inhabited in any settled or established way, though in after ages it became so famous in it's flourishing Common-wealths. Seats and habitations were often changed, according to the power and strength of such as were not satisfied with their own fortune. No commerce was there amongst them, being in continuall fear one of another: they lived onely from hand to mouth, not regarding money, or the improvement of their grounds, knowing not how long they should enjoy any thing in present possessions; so that no considerable City was there, or any Fortifications of value. Attica indeed was something privileged by it's barrenness, and secured from such violent attempts as other parts were obnoxious to; whence such, as were disturbed elsewhere, flocked thither, and it grew so populous, that not able to maintain the great numbers, under which it groined, it poured out Colonies into Asia the lesse, which made up the body of the Ionians. Before the Trojan War, nothing considerable was done abroad by the Gracians; but at that time having got some power at Sea, they were rendered capable of that expedition. For Minus King of Crete, (whom Thucydides would make to have had the first and most antient Fleet of all others) had not long before obtained the dominion of the greatest part of the Greek Sea, and making himself Master of the Islands Cyclades, cast thence the Carians, and placed Colonies of his own therein, over which he made his Sons Princes. And, to increase his Customs, he scoured the Seas of Pyrats; it being then the trade of those that lived upon the Coasts, to passe over and make prey one of another; which to the last could not be left by some, as the Ætoliens and Acarneanians amongst others.

3. The Sea being cleared, Cities began to be built upon the Coast both for trade and security, whereas the more antient Towns stood at a good distance from the Sea, both in the Continent and Islands. Then came it to passe, that the weaker submitting themselves to the more powerfull for matter of profit, or the other by strong hand procuring it from them, some new and considerable Principalities were erected, which rendred them fit for the Expedition against Troy; wherein Agamemnon presided, as the most powerfull Prince then reigning, especially at Sea. Yet was there still such scarcity of money and of provisions, that onely so many Forces did they carry over, as they hoped the War might maintain, and used those not all together, and at the same time, but employed them in tilling the Cherronesus, and in depredations; whereby being thus dispersed, the Trojans were the longer able to resist them; which they could not have done, had they been sufficiently furnished with necessaries, and incontinently with all their strength, fallen upon the City. Ten years being consumed in this War, great alterations were thereby produced in Greece. For through their absence so long abroad, seditions and tumults arose at home; whence many at their return, or afterwards, wards, were forced to seek out new habitations. A long time it was, ere the Country returned to quietness and settlement; but at length, it was enabled to send out Colonies as the Athenians into Ionia and the Islands of the Greek Sea, the Peloponnesians, and some other Cities, into Italy and Sicily. The Nation growing now stronger and wealthier daily, Tyrannies or petty Kingdoms were erected in every place, there being now a possibility of raising revenues; and as any exceeded others in power or cunning, they invaded the Governments of others, which they made arbitrary; whereas before Kingdoms were hereditary with a constant limited power, that they seldom exceeded.

The Corinthians first eminent at Sea.

4. The Corinthians first began to be famous at Sea, being the first that used that sort of Gallies called Triremes, and fought a battel with the Corcyreans, 220 years before the beginning of the Peloponnesian War. For being seated in the Isthmus, they enjoyed thereby a constant Mart, which filled them with wealth, especially after the Sea was cleared of Pyrats, and Traffick increased.

The Ionians.

Long after, the Ionians got the start of the rest in navall glory, making good progresse therein, and had gone still further, but that Cyrus having broken in pieces the power of Crius, and subdued all as far as the River Halys, forced them also, after some struggling, to submit themselves unto the yoke: After them, Polycrates the Tyrant of Samus, the Massilians and Corcyreans obtained the greatest power at Sea; the Egyptians and Athenians, with the rest, being inconsiderable therein, till these two States falling out, Themistocles procured the Athenians to apply themselves more to Sea matters, when they now also expected the coming of the Persian King. Great commodity all these obtained by the power of their Navies, either in getting money, or new possessions; for they subdued the Islands, such especially labouring herein, whose native Soils afforded least advantage. By Land no War arose that gave any sufficient advantage of enlarging their dominions further, than to the disturbance of their next Neighbours; they stirred not abroad nor gave their minds to any new Conquests. Those that were Subjects, were patient under the yoke, and Equals in power made no considerable quarrells, till all Greece came to be divided in the old War, betwixt the Inhabitants of Chalcis and Eretria. Then to hinder them from growing great, the affairs of the Persians were advanced; till having cast out their Tyrants, (who all this while contenting themselves with the private power they had over particular places, stirred not) they got ground by little and little of the Eastern Empire. Almost during this whole Period had they * no written Laws, Homer being witnesse, who never useth the word * Law throughout his writings. They were not generally governed but by indefinite Sentences and Præcepts of their Kings, remaining a long time without any written Præcepts, and referring all to the event, according to which Judgment ensued. Such was the most antient condition of Greece in generall. Now a particular account is to be given of the severall Kingdoms and States, that were most considerable and contemporary with the Babylonian Empire.

A. M. 1915.

1. The affairs of the Sicyonian have the (a) first place allotted to them in Antiquity, who inhabited a City situated upon the Bay of Corinth, and the confines of Achaia. Here Ægialeus began a Kingdom about 270 years after the universall Deluge, 232 before the beginning of Inachus, 1213 years before the first Olympiad, the year of the World 1915, according to the Vulgar way of computation, without taking in the 100 years formerly mentioned in the History of the Judges, and the 859th year of Noah whilst Ninus reigned in Assyria. From him the City was first called Ægialia, and part of the Peninsula itself according to some; which afterwards was from Pe- lops named Peloponnesus. He left his Kingdom to Europs his Son, after he had reigned 52 years, and Europs having reigned 45, was succeeded by Tel- chines. He governed 20, and was followed by Apis, who was so great, that all within the Isthmus was from him called Apios. When he had continued 25 years, his Son Thelxion succeeded him, during whose reign, all things were so prosperous and happy, that being dead, they worshiped him for a god by sacrifices, and solemnizing games, which (as they say) were first invented for his sake. Him followed Agyrus, after he had reigned 52 years.

Agyrus or Agyrus, reigned 33, Thurimachus 45, Leucippus 53, who had onely a Daughter named Calchinia, on which Neptune (or rather Mesa- pus) begat Peratus, who was Heir to his Grand-father, and governed 47 years. After Peratus followed Plemneus, whose children all died as soon as they were born, till Ceres came in the likeness of a Woman, and brought up Orthopolis, who succeeded his Father, having reigned 48 years.

2. Orthopolis the twelfth King of Aegialea, had a Daughter named Chry- sorthe, on which Apollo is supposed to have begot Coronus his successor. Coro- nus left two Sons Corax and Lamedon. Corax after he had reigned 30 years, died without issue, and Epopeus a Thessalian seized on his Kingdom.
Epopeus stole Antiope the Daughter of Nycteus King of Thebes, for which injury he was prosecuted with War by the Thebans. A battell being fought, he had the better, but both the Kings were mortally wounded. Nycteus presently died after he was carried home, but left the tuition of Labiacus the Son of Polydorus and Nephew to Cadmus, (whose Guardian he had been) to his Brother Lycus, requesting of him to lead down another Army into Aegialea, to revenge him upon Epopeus, & to punish Antiope, if he could take her; but in the mean time Epopeus died also of his wounds, being neglected, and Lamedon the Son of Coronus obtained his Fathers Kingdom, gave up Antiope to Lycus, as Pausanias writeth, though Apollodorus saith, that Ly- cus took Aegialea and slew Epopeus. Antiope in the way to Thebes fell in travell, and brought forth Amphion and Zeibus, who being found and nourished by an Herdsman, the former gave himself to Musick, and the later to nourishing of Cattell; and both afterwards revenged their Mother upon Ly- cus and his Wife Dirce, from whose hard usage she had escaped and came to them.

3. Lamedon married Pheno the Daughter of Clytus an Athenian, and undertaking War against Archander and Architeles the Acheans, sent for Sicyon the Son of Metion and Nephew of Erechtheus, out of Attica to assist him, to whom giving his Daughter Zeuxippe in marriage, he left him also his Successor. From Sicyon the City was named Sicyon, and the Country Sicyonia. He had a Daughter named Chthonophyle, on which Mercury begat Polybus; after whose birth she was married to Phlias the Son of Diony- sus, and to him bore Androdamas. Polybus succeeding his Grand-father, left also his Grand-Son Adrastus (by his Daughter, married to Talaus King of Argos) his Heir, who being expelled his own City, had fled to him. But he making his peace at home returned, and after his departure Janiscus or Inachus the Nephew of that Clytis whose Daughter married with Lamedon, came out of Attica and obtained the Kingdom. After Janiscus had reigned 42 years, he gave way by death to Phastus, one vulgarly accounted the Son of Hercules, who after eight years, at the direction of an Oracle, went over into Crete, where he built a City of his own name.

4. After his departure Zeuxippus the Son of Apollo by the Nymph Syllis, was King of Sicyon; but reigned not long, Hippolytus Nephew to Phastus by his Son Rhopalus, obtained his Grand-Fathers seat. Against him Aga- memnon King of Mycena made War, till he forced him to submit. After four years succeeded Polyphides, and continued 31, then Pelagus 20, and after this * Ensebins would have Zeuxippus to have begun his reign, which after 32 years ended with the Kingdom. It having now continued the space of 962 years, the Priests of Apollo Carnius obtained the Sovereignty, and SECT. 3. Lacestades. Phalces seized upon Sicyon, held it 33. But Pausanias writeth, that when Lacestades, the son of Hippolytus reigned at Sicyon, Phalces the son of Temennus (who had been King of Argos) seized upon it with the Dores in the night time; but, for that both of them were descended of Hercules, dealt not roughly with him, but admitted him to partnership in the Kingdom. So, from thenceforth the Sicyonians became Dores, and were reckoned amongst the Argives. This fell out 87 years after the destruction of Troy, 120 before the first Olympiad, A. M. 2908.

SECT. III.

The Kingdom of Argos.

The Kingdom of Argos hath the second place, if not the first.

1. The (a) second place in Antiquity belongeth to this Kingdom, for which (b) some have not been wanting to challenge the first, affirming that many years after the establishment of this, Egialeus began that of the Sicyonians; and certainly though Argos missed something of Sicyon in years; yet in fame, dignity, power, and riches it exceeded it. Inachus first here began a Kingdom, about 244 years after the beginning of the Sicyonian, the 142 of the life of Abraham, 676 before the destruction of Troy, and 1082 before the beginning of the Olympiads. From the Antiquity of Inachus came that proverb Inacho antiquior, concerning which Erasmus is to be consulted in his Adages. On his sister Melissa he begat Phoroneus and a daughter named Io, which must not be confounded with the daughter of Jasus of a later date, as she is wont to be by Mythologists. After fifty years reign, he left his Kingdom to his son Phoroneus, who by (b) some was thought the first man, as the son of a River in that place, called Inachus, and consequently the father (c) of Mortals, and Author of Mankind. He is said to have (d) built the first Altar unto Juno. Against him and the Parrhasians, the Telchines, and Caryata made War, but being overcome betook themselves to the mercy of Wind and Sea, and at length arrived in Crete, as some, or Rhodes, as others say. He obtained the Dominion of the whole Peninsula and of the Nymph Laodice (e) begot a son called Apis, and a daughter named Niobe, which Jupiter loved the first of all women, and on her begat Argus. Phoroneus, after he had reigned sixty years, died, and left his Kingdom to his son Apis.

2. Apis turning Tyrant, commanded the Peninsula to be called after himself, Apia, and being circumvented by the wiles of Thelxion, and Telchin, died without issue after he had reigned 34 years. Apollodorus saith, he was killed for his Tyranny in Greece, though some make him to have gone into Egypt, and there dying to have been taken for a God, and called Serapis; but there being two Kings of this name besides him, viz. one of Sicyon, and another of Egypt, most Mythologists confound them, and attribute what was done by all unto one; which thing is usual with the Greeks. Apis dying after he had reigned 34 years, left for his Successor Argus his sisters son by Jupiter, the King of Crete, who lived about this time. In that Island first reigned Cres, who gave name to it, and was one of those Curetes that were said to have hid Jupiter from his father Saturn, who would have devoured his youngest son after the other, and nourished him; as also to have built the City Cnos, and the Temple of Cybele. With this man, many others are confounded, according to the custom of Poets, who have observed no distinction in ascribing to one what many did, and fathering things of their own invention upon the common name of Jupiter.

3. The first man known to have had this name was Ham, the youngest son of Noah, who was worshipped for a God under the title of Jupiter Hammon. His Nephew Nimrod, the first King of Babylon, and Affyria, was surnamed named Belus, and often called Jupiter Belus. In Crete lived (f) one very ancient that hath gone under this name; although as many places have challenged him for their Native, as (g) contended for the birth of Homer. (f) Euseb. Some think that he who is reported to have been preserved, and nourished by the Curetes, or the Idai Dactyli, was more ancient than Niobe, and therefore make a second Jupiter to have lived in Crete about 150 years after; who because he was the first of this name known to have been extravagant towards women, thence arose that saying that Niobe was the first woman beloved by Jupiter. Aeolus the son of Hellen, and Nephew of Deucalion, who lived about Thessaly, and gave name to the Aeoles, became so famous with Posterity, that they gave him the name of (h) Jupiter and Nepiune. Picus, (h) Idem ibid. King of the Aborigines in Italy, father to Faunus, and supposed to be begotten by Saturn, after he had fled into Latium from his son Jupiter, is also called Jupiter by (i) one, and Aeneas Jupiter Indiges by the Romans. There are (i) Apud Suidam, such particular men as are known to have had this name, which hath been so far advanced as to signify the best, and chiefest Being, whilst such as at first were revered for their virtue or power, at length were forgotten to have been mortals.

Whence so many.

4. Each Nation of old had its Native Jupiter, who was either the Founder thereof, or, living in remote times, was by that Generation, which attributeth immoderate things to Antiquity, elevated into Deity. Here is to be considered what Annianus his Xenophon wrote in his Treatise of Equivocals, as he calleth them. The most ancient King of any great, and illustrious family was wont to be called Saturn, the eldest son Jupiter, and the most valiant amongst the Nephews, or Grand-sons, Hercules. Jupiter the ancient King of Crete, or some other, by his great exploits, and well-deserving of that Age, might gain this credit to his name; or the word Zeus, in the Greek tongue signifying what Ham doth import in the other language, the Original of this name may better agree with the name, place, and condition of the son of Noah. As for Jupiter the younger, who is supposed to have begotten Hercules on Alcmena, the wife of Amphytrio, appeareth a meer fiction; so valiant a person as that Child proved, enhancing the repute of his generation: or if this Hercules was not the son of Amphytrion, but begotten by some other man, then was the name of Jupiter given to his father to take away the Odium of Bastardy; it being an ordinary thing for such as were base-begotten to be fathered upon Jupiter, Mars, or Apollo.

From Argus the Citie took its name.

5. From Argus the Citie was named (k) Argos, before called Phoronium from Phoroneus, who first gathered the people into it, being before that dispersed; and made them Laws for Government. From him also his Subjects took the name of Argi and Argivi, and the whole * Peninsula, named Asia before; he would have called after himself Argos. In (l) his time Greece began to be full of Corn, which being ascribed to his care and industry, he was honoured after his death with a Temple and Sacrifice, which worship was before given to one Homocyrus, killed by a Thunder-bolt, for that he had first yoked Oxen in the Plow. His brother (m) was Pelagius, (said also to have been begotten by Jupiter on Niobe) the father of Lycaon, and who gave name to the Pelagii, a people that first inhabited Arcadia, (hence called Pelagii & Pe'asgia) afterwards spread (n) themselves throughout Greece, and sent Colonies into Latium. Argus, on his wife Euadne, the daughter of Strymon begat Jasus, Peiranthus, Epidaurus, and Criasus. Jasus begat Agenor, the father of that Argus whom the Poets make all eyes, though some report him the son of Arestor. Criasus succeeded his father after he had reigned seventy years, and Governed the Argives 54. Two of his brothers are added by Pausanias, viz. Piraeus the same with Peiranthus and Phorbas. Peiranthus first built a Temple to Juno at Argos, wherein he placed her image made of a wild Pear-Tree, and made his daughter (o) Callithya called also Callithoe, and (p) Priest thereof; which Superstition being continued for many Ages, all instruments publick and private were dared from such or such a year of her Successors, as the cu-

6. That this Peiranthus reigned, appeareth no where but in Pausanias, who seemeth to make him the immediate Successor of Argus, by the name of Pirafus. But Phorbas succeeded Criasus, and reigned 35 years; after him Triopas 46. whose son Xanthus being Prince of some of the Pelasgi, who went out from Argos, seized first upon part of Lycia, and there seated himself: afterwards he passed over into the Island Isa, then void of Inhabitants, which dividing amongst his followers he named Pelasgia, in proesse of time called Lesbos. Pausanias maketh Jafus and Agenor the sons of Triopas, and Jafus to have reigned at Argos, though by Ensebins he be not reckoned amongst the Kings. His daughter was the famous Io, which being got with Child by Jupiter, and thereupon, through the displeasure of Juno turned out of her wits, or into a Cow, as the Poets sing, passed over the Straits of Thrace, to which, upon this occasion of her Metamorphosis, was given the name of Bosphorus. Then went she down into Egypt, where, restored to humane shape, she brought forth her son Epaphus, the builder of Memphis, and was afterwards taken for a goddesse, and called Isis. Herodotus leading us out of the Labrynth of fables, relateth that the Phenicians after their removal from the Red-sea (where he thinketh them once to have inhabited) to the Mediterranean, applied themselves unto sailing, and Traffick from Assyria and Egypt unto other places. On a time coming to Argos (which then excelled all Greek Cities); on the fifth or sixth day after they had exposed their merchandise to sale, many women came to their ships to buy what liked them, and amongst the rest this Io, the Kings daughter. The Phenicians encouraging one another laid hands on those they could catch, and taking her with some others, carried them into Egypt. This by Herodotus is made one of the first grounds of envy, betwixt the Asiatics & Greeks; though he confoundeth her with the daughter of Inachus, (which is usual) and the Greeks, as Pausanias hinteth, gave another account of her deportation.

Crotopus.

7. As Pausanias reckoneth Jafus amongst the Kings of Argos (which after him was, without doubt, called Jafos (p) and the Citizens Jasii); so he nameth Crotopus, his brother Agenor's son, for his Successor, whom Ensebins will have to have succeeded his Grand-father Triopas. His daughter Psamathe being with Child by Apollo, after her delivery exposed the Infant, which she named Linus. It chanced to be devoured by wilde beasts; whereat she was so troubled, that her father perceiving it, got out the matter, and put her to death, for which Apollo brought a plague upon the Argives, who, to pacifie him, made great and solemn lamentation for the Child, which is not to be confounded with the Poet Linus, as some so order the matter. Crotopus having reigned 21 years was followed by Sthenelas his son, who held the Kingdom for 11. and then left it to his son Galenor. In his time, Danaus, the brother of Egyptus, King of that Countrey, having 50 daughters, refused to marry them to his brother's 50 sons, because he was bidden by an Oracle to beware of a son in Law, and therefore taking them away with him, sailed to Rhodes, wherein he built a Temple to Minerva Lindia; and thence to Argos, where he moved a contest with Galenor for the Kingdom, as descended of Epaphus, the son of Io. Both pleading hard before the people, the cause; as doubtfull, was put off till the day following; at what time there came a Wolf and killed an Ox, which was feeding by the Walls. The people took the Wolf to signifie Danaus, because a stranger; and, making this contest of the beasts a leading case, decreed the Kingdom to the Egyptian.

Danaus.

8. Danaus having obtained the Kingdom, his brother Egyptus feared lest by the marriage of his daughters he might get too great alliance and strength, and therefore sent down his 50 sons to Argos with an Army, and command, either to marry them, or destroy him. They perswaded their Uncle by fair means to receive them as sons in Law; but he commanded his daughters that each of them should the first night kill her Bridegroom, and gave gave them Poniards for that purpose. They all obeyed him, except Hyper-mestra, (and some add Bebrice); which, dismissing Lyncus, with advice to shift for himself, was by her Father accused, and brought to Judgment; but acquitted by the Agaves, and afterwards had leave from him, to receive again Lyncus, now reconciled to him. As for the rest of the Sisters, they were bestowed upon such, as in tryall of Masteries got the better; and became so infamous, that it was believed they were condemned in Hell, to fill with water a Barrell, which having an hole in it, let out as much as it received in.

SECT. 3.

9. From Danau those who formerly had the name of Pelastgiote were called Danai. He built the Castle, and his Daughters are said to have supplied the City with water, by digging of Wells; although (q) Strabo proveth, that by reason of it's situation it could never want the commodity of that Element. Having reigned (r) 50 years, he died, and was succeeded by Lyncus, who governed 41, and on Hypermetra begat Abas his Successor. Abas ruled 23 years, and begat on his wife Ocalca, the Daughter of Man-rinens, Acrisius and Præus Twins. They are said to have strugled in the womb, and did it to purpose afterwards for the Kingdom. Præus first obtained and held it seventeen years, but then was driven from Argos by Acri-sius, and forced to flye into Lycia, to Iobas his Father-in-Law, King of that Country. From him he returned with armed hand, seised upon Lyrinthe, and afterwards joyned battell with his Brother, wherein they two are reported first of all others, to have used Targets, The battell ending with æquall successe, they came to an accommodation, and divided the Kingdom. Acri-sius was to stay at Argos, and Præus to enjoy Hereus, Midea, Tirynthe, and the maritime parts. Præus had by his wife Sthenobea, a Son named Megapenthes, and three Daughters, which being taken with the fury of Racchus, Melampus the Poet is said to have cured. Acrisius on Eurydice begat a Daughter named Danae, and consulting the Oracle about issue-Male, was answered that he should have no Son, but a Nephew by his Daughter, that should procure his death. Hereupon, he shut up Danae with her Nurse in the ground; but Jupiter turning himself into a golden shower, thereby got to her, and begat Persus. Both Mother and Son were put into an Ark, and cast into the Sea, which drave them ashore on the Island Seriphus, where Ditys Brother to Polydectes the King, educated the Boy. Being grown up, he made an Expedition into Africk, where he slew the Gorgon Medusa, being sent, as the Fable goeth, by Polydectes, who sought to be revenged on him, for hindering him from the Marriage of his Mother; but Pausanias not at all regarding the Fable, writeth, that this Medusa was the Daughter of Phorchus, and succeeded him in his Kingdom which lay upon the Lake Tritonis; that she was wont to go out to hunt and fight with the Africans, over which she reigned; but Persus coming against her with choise Forces out of Pelopon-nesus (so that this Voyage must have been after his return thither, and his Grand-Father's death) she was entrapped by him and slain in the night. He admiring her beauty, cut off her head, and caried it into Greece for a spectacle.

10. Persus, after this, married Andromeda, (Daughter to Cepheus, by Cassiopeia, who reigned at Joppe a maritime Town of Libania) having first saved her from being devoured by a Whale. This by one is thus interpreted;
That Phanix by her Father's consent, took her away by force, and carying her in a ship called the Whale, Persus sailing that way, and hearing her lamentations, boarded the Ship, and delivering her out of his hands, married her.
After this, he returned to Sisyphus, where he revenged upon Polydectes, the violence offered to his Mother; and then, with her and his wife, went to Argos to see his Grand-Father, who being afraid because of the Oracle, departed into Pelastia (or Thessalia, so called, from the Pelastgi, who were now removed thither out of Peloponnesus, being a vagabond people, and staying in no place): where when Teutamias, King of the Larissæans, made Games in honour of his deceased Father; thither also came Persus, amongst

11. Some (f) think that rather to Acrisius then to Amphythion the Son of Denealion (who 182 years before began his reign at Athens) the founding of the famous Concill of the Amphythiones is to be ascribed. It seemeth probable, that Amphythion first of all assembled it in Thessalie, near the Streights of Thermopylae, (Pausanias writeth to have been the common opinion) and that Acrisius thence transferred it to Delphos in Phocis, where it for the most part assembled; this place being the middle of Greece, and, as the Greeks thought, of the World it self, where was also the famed Oracle of Apollo Pythius. For, These Cities which at first had onely right to send their Deputies to the Council, were such as either were seated in Thessalie, or near unto it. This was the chief Tribunall of all Greece, for deciding of publick and most weighty causes, betwixt the severall Cities, and Common-wealths. The authority thereof was very great; insomuch as it's Decrees have sometimes been executed by the Sword, with the great motions of severall States, some or other scarce ever being wanting to undertake the work. It used to meet twice a year, (and oftener if necessity required) in the beginning of Spring, and Autumne; the Cities sending their Deputies, three, two, or one, according to their bignesse. These were called Pylagora, because they met at Pyla, a place near to the Temple, of which they also had the oversight, and presided over the Games made in honour of Apollo Pythius every other year. This Court continued for many Ages without change, untill the time of Philip King of Macedon, and Father of Alexander the Great, who overthrowing the Phocians, in the Sacred War; for their Sacriledge outed them and the Lacedemonians their assistants, of their Priviledges of voting therein, and transferred the right to his own Kingdom. Long after, Augustus Caesar innovated again, by removing the Magnesiens, Maleans, and others, from their interest herein, and making Nicopolis (a City built by him in memory of his Victory at Actium) free of that Society, as Pausanias telleth us, who hath also recorded, that in his time, (which fell in with the reign of Antoninus Pius the Roman Emperour) this Council was still maintained and kept up, consisting of thirty persons.

12. Perseus, after that dyaster, which hapned to his Grand-Father, was ashamed to return to Argos, his Inheritance, and therefore went to Tirynthe, and changed Kingdoms with his Cousin Megapenthes. He built Mycene (so called from his Sword's * Scabberd, that fell from him in this place, which thing he took as a sign, that here he should build a City) and making it his seat, therein reigned 58 years. About this time this Kingdom of Argos, that had now continued about 544 years, came to be divided into three parts. For Anaxagoras the Son of Megapenthes contenting himself with a third of his half, gave the other two to Melampus the Son of Amythaon, and his Brother Bias; either for that he (who is said to have found out the way of purging) had cured the Daughters of Prætus (Aunts to Anaxagoras) of their madnesse, as was told before, or (x) invented a Remedy for that distemper, which had seized epidemically upon the women of those parts. But Perseus begat of Andromeda five Sons: Perfes, Alcaeus, Sthenelus, Electryon, and Mestor. Hereof Perfes the first, as the Greeks believed, gave Originall to the Persians, Alcaeus was Father to Amphytrion, Sthenelus succeeded his Father in the Kingdom of Mycene, and Electryon begat Alcmena, wife to Amphytrion. Sthenelus on a Daughter of Pelops begat Eurystheus his Successor, seven moneths after whose birth Hercules the Son of Amphytrion and Alcmena was born. Aphules their other Son coming into the World after Hercules (for they were Twins) Amphytrion was accounted the Father of him, and Jupiter of Hercules, whereupon, Juno is said to have ever hated him, and by the help of Ilythia, (Lucina or the Moon) to have hindred his birth, and kept his Mother in travell for seven dayes. The Boy was first named Alcaeus after his Grand-Father; but afterwards, for his great great achievements called Hercules, and ascribed to no less a Father than Jupiter, who made the night wherein he began him, as long as three, that his strength might be the greater. That this person was eminent in his time, is easie to be granted; but incredible things contained in twelve labours, being reported to be done by him, are either meant of the passing of the Sun through the twelve Signs of the Zodiack; or what things were performed by several others that lived elsewhere, have been by his Country-men attributed to him, whose Epithere of Hercules (signifying fame and glory spread abroad in the air) came also to be given to them, if the word be of no other than Greekish Original.

SECT. 2.

How many of that name.

13. Cicero reckoneth up six who had the name of Hercules. The first and most antient, he maketh begotten by the antientest Jupiter on Lipus, and to have striven with Apollo about the Tripos. The second was an Egyptian, Son to Nile, who despised the Phrygian Letters. The third a Native of Crete, and one of the Idai Dactyli, who first found out the making of Iron, by taking notice of the melting of that Metall in the Hill Ida when it burned, and being five in number, had the name of Dactyli from the fingers, in number so many on each hand. The fourth was son to Asteria the Sister of Laiona, and Father to Carthage, being worshipped by the Tyrians. Belus in India is reckoned for the fifth, and then in the sixth place cometh this Son of Alcmena. The Egyptian Hercules is said to have aided the gods in their War against the Gyants, which being the off-spring of the Earth, Diodorus acknowledgeth that this cannot agree with the time of the Gracian Hercules, who lived but one Age before the Trojan War; but rather happened at the original of Mankind.

14. Hercules the Tyrian is believed to have been the Captain of that Expedition which the Phœnicians made into Spain and Gades, which though the Gracians attribute to theirs, yet this convinceth their assertion of falshood, that in the Island Gades, was a most antient Temple, wherein Hercules was worshipped, not after the Gracian manner, but according to the Rites of Phœnicia. This was he, who erected his pillars at the bound or utmost limit of the World, and that overran Spain, Italy, and Gaul. Ganchonizhon a Phœnician Author of great antiquity, wrote, that he was the Son of Demacus, and that his proper name was Melcharibus (which signified the King of the City) by the Greeks called Meliceretes and Palamon. He was also called *Diodas by Eusebius (for which Desanaus is thought to be corruptly written in Hierom's translation) which Phœnician name he seemeth to have had, because he was invoked by lovers; their happy successe being supposed to depend on him. Some think this Tyrian Hercules was the same with the Egyptian or Libyan, by Pausanias named Maceris, who undertook a journey to Delphos, and whose Son Sardus leading a Colonie into the Island Ichnusa, changed it's name into Sardinia. *Tacitus writeth, that the Libyans would have the most antient Hercules a native of their Country, and that such as came near him in valour and renown, were named after him. Diodorus Siculus, and Eusebius mention three of this name, (though the former attributeth all their actions to the youngest, or the Son of Alcmena) Servius four, and Varro 44. And here must be remembred what was before noted; that it was the custom of old, to call the most antient Kings by the name of Saturn, their Sons by that of Jupiter, and their most valiant and active Nephews by this of Hercules.

The story
Son of Alcmena.

15. This Heroe being so much written and talked of, it concerneth beginners to have some account of his actions, and the rather, because they include the labours of many. Amphytrion his Father, as it seemeth, was Prince of Tirynthos, but thence was forced to flye to Thebes, having at unawares killed Electryon his Uncle and Father-in-Law, where Hercules being educated, slew Linus his Musick-Master with an Harpe as he taught him. His Father seeing his disposition, and fearing some such like accident might fall out again, sent him amongst the Herdsmen, where not yet eighteen years old, he slew a Lyon. For his extraordinary strength and courage, he was taken ken notice of by Thespius (or Thespius) Prince of the Thespienses, who made him lye with his fifty daughters, of which begetting so many sons, these afterwards passed over into the Island Sardinia with the name of Thespiades. A little after this he delivered Thebes from the Tyranny of Erginus, King of the Minyans, who exacted an annual Tribute of 100 Oxen. He destroyed Orchomenus with his Palace therein, and for this was rewarded with Megara, daughter to Creon, Prince of Thebes. When he was about 20 years old, he sailed with Jason amongst others to Colchos, to fetch thence the Golden Fleece so much celebrated by Poets, and variously interpreted by Expositors of Mythology.

16. This Jason was the son of Aeson, and the fourth in descent from Aeolus, being born at Ioleus, which place Pelias, King thereof, unjustly detained from his father. He considering with himself what glory Perseus, and others of late had gotten, sought how he might accomplish some notable Enterprize for the eternizing of his name, and having at length resolved on this design, published his intentions throughout Greece, by a Crier. The young and active spirits of that time were much taken therewith, and 53 of the flower of Greece gave their names to the expedition, of whom the most eminent, besides Hercules, were Orpheus, (Scholar to Linus) Oileus, Telamon, and Peleus, the sons of Aeacus, Pollux, and Castor, sons to Tyndareus, King of Sparta, Meleager, and Argus, who built the ship, named after him Argo, wherein they sailed, and thence were afterwards called Argonauta. Having all things in readinesse (Pelias supplying Jason with all necessaries, to be rid of him, fearing he should call him to account for the Kingdom) they set sail from Ioleus, and came to Lemnus, an Island in the Aegean Sea, whence they sailed to the Countrey of the Doliones, by whose King Cyzicus they were honourably received; but thence lanching out by night, were driven back by Tempest, and being taken by him for the Pelasgi, with whom he was at feud, he fell upon them, and lost his life in the fight, with many of his followers; but, his error once understood, was magnificently buried by them. From Cyzicus they came into Mysia, where Hercules for want of skill in rowing brake his Oar, and going into the Woods to provide another, whilst his companions rested themselves on the shoar, it happened that Hylas his Boy drinking at a Fountain, was intercepted by the Nymphs, as the story goeth. Crying out, Polyphemus, the son of Elatus, who had married Laonome, the sister of Hercules, ran out to rescue him, and meeting with Hercules, went up and down seeking him in great perplexity; so that they were left behind by their companions, whom Hercules followed on foot to Colchos.

17. Jason with the rest sailed to Colchos, and by the treachery of Medea, daughter to Aetes the King, that fell in love with him, became master of the Golden Fleece, and returned home with her, having finished his journey in four months. They lived hapily at Corinib for ten years, till Creon, King of that Ctrie, betrothing his daughter Glauce to him, Medea was commanded to quit the place; whereupon mad with anger, she set the Palace on fire, and slew her own three sons, which she had by Jason; as Euripides relateth the story. Who, as it's probable, too much indulgeth his poetick liberty, the Corinthians having corrupted him with five Talents, as an antient (1) Historian hath discovered. (2) Herodotus writeth in that a Messenger was sent from Colchos to demand Medea, but he was put off with this answer, that they of Asia had formerly stoln away Io from Argos. As the Argonauta sailed by Athos and Samothracia, they were driven by Tempest upon Sigeum, a Promontory of Troas, (a) where they found Hesione, daughter to Laomedon, King of Troy, bound upon the shoar, that she might become a prey to a Whale. This Whale had been sent by Neptune to devour Passengers upon the Coast, because (b) Laomedon with money taken out of the Temples of Neptune, and Apollo, had built the Walls of the Ctrie, and made no restitution. Apollo, had answered that no way could they be quit of the Whale, but by the devouring of some one chosen out by lot, which fell upon the Kings own daughter. But Hercules moved with pity, upon promise to have the maid, and certain horses that never were handled, undertook to kill the Whale, which readily performing, he trusted Laomedon with his wages, till his return from Colchos. Then he demanded them (c) by Iphicles his brother and Telamon, whom he sent into the Cirie, but the King instead of restoring what he formerly detained, imprisoned the Messengers, and plotted the destruction of the whole company. Priamus of all his sons was onely against this treachery, and when he could not otherwise prevail, sent in two swords to the prisoners, wherewith they dispatching their keepers, got out to their companions. In revenge for this afterward Hercules took the Cirie, slew Laomedon, and preferred Priamus for his integrity to the Kingdom.

SECT. 3.

(c) Diodorus

18. The Argonauta being returned into Greece, Hercules (d) took an Oath of them mutually to aid one another, as also to chuse out some certain place, wherein to meet and celebrate Games in honour of Jupiter Olympius. This matter being left to his care and management, he pitched on the plains of the Eleans, lying upon the River Alpheus, where he ordained exercises, both to be performed on foot and horse-back, appointed rewards to the Victors, and sent abroad to give notice thereof to the several Cities, which were all hereby wonderfully affectionated towards him. But after Eurystheus had succeeded Sthenelus his father in the Kingdom of Mycena, he began to grow jealous of the strength and prosperity of Hercules, and ceased not to presse him forwards into dangerous, though glorious attempts. He at first refusing went & consulted the Oracle at Delphos, which is said to have acquainted him with the pleasure of the gods, that at the appointment of Eurystheus he should finish twelve labours, and so attain to immortality. Hereat he grew exceeding melancholy, taking it in great disdain to be commanded by him, which discontent arose to a Phrensie, and in this distemper he killed the Children that he had by Megara, and put her away; but afterwards coming to his right mind, resolved to venture himself, and returned to Eurystheus for his orders.

19. The first task imposed on him was to kill a Lyon in Nemea, a Wood of Achaia, whom no sword nor any other vveapon could pierce. Being onely to be mastered by the hand he caught and strangled him, then taking off his skin, thenceforth wore it as a Garment. The second thing injoynd him was to kill an Hydra with 100 heads, like Snakes, whereof when one was cut off, two others sprung up in its room. The third was to bring home alive the Erymanthian Boar, at the sight of which beast upon his shoulders, Eurystheus was so frighted that he ran for fear into a brasen Hogshead; and in this expedition he also overcame the Centaures. The next thing commanded him was to catch an Hart of marvelous swiftnesse with Golden horns, which he effected, but in what manner is not agreed on. After this he drave away innumerable companies of Birds from the Symphalian Fens, which there, and in other places devoured the Corn. Then cleansed he Augeas his stable; not by carrying the Dung out upon his shoulders, (which indignity was intended him by Eurystheus) but by the current of the River Peneus, which he brought down thither for that purpose. The seventh thing commanded him was to fetch a wilde Bull out of the Island Crete, with which Pasiphaes is said to have fallen in love: and betwixt this and the next labour he helped the gods against the Gyants, and pacifying Jupiter towards Prometheus, loosed this man from the place vvhether an Eagle continually fed upon his Liver for his communicating to men the knowledge of fire. The eighth task was to fetch the Mares of Diomedes out of Thrace, which had brazen mangers, were tied with Iron chains, and fed not on any other fodder than the flesh of strangers coming that way: But Hercules first gave them their masters flesh, and then brought them to Eurystheus, who dedicated them to Juno, and their breed is said to have continued to the time of Alexander the Great.

against the Amazons in Africk, and brought to him the Girdle of Hippolyta their Queen. The tenth labour was to fetch the Oxen of Geryon out of Iberia, or Spain, as the fable goeth; whereas Geryon reigned not there, but in that part of Ephesus which lieth about Ambracia and Amphilochus, as (e) Arrianus witnesseth from the Pen of Hecataeus a most ancient Historian, (f) and others do testifie. There were afterwards in Epirus a very large sort of Oxen, called Larini, thought to be of that kind which Hercules drove away, and to have had this name from Larinus his herdsman. Seeing then that this occasion of invading Spain, Italy, and Gaul is taken away from this Hercules, that expedition is to be left to the Phœnician, to whom formerly we ascribed it. But Hercules is farther said in this journey to have slain Antæus, to have gone down into Egypt, and made an end there of Busiris that cruel Tyrant, and erected his Pillars in the utmost bounds of the World. Within eight years and one moneth he finished these his ten labours. After his return he was enjoined to fetch Cerberus out of Hell, which having accomplished, the 11th was the fetching of the Golden Hesperian Apples; which, whether they were such, and were kept by a terrible Dragon, or by them is to be understood Herds of Cattel defended by some strong and valiant man, he also brought out of Africk to Eurystheus. Those are his 12 labours, as Diodorus describeth, and ranketh them.

21. Having served Eurystheus twelve years, he returned to Thebes, and there gave Megara, whom he had put away, to Iolaus, the son of his brother Iphicles. He had now no legitimate issue, and therefore married Deianeira, daughter to Oeneus, King of the Calydonians, to pleasure whom he derived the River Achelous into another Chanel, and thereby rendred the Countrey more fertile; whence the fable arose that he fought with Achelous, turned into a Bull, and cutting off one of his Horns, gave it to the Æolians (part of whom the Calydonians were) called the Horn of Amalthea, wherein was plenty of all fruits. Before this he had won Iole, the daughter of Eurytus Prince of Oechalia, by shooting, which exercise her father had proposed to all comers against himself and his son. Yet was he denied her, whereupon to be revenged on Eurytus, he drove away his Horses, and carrying his son Iphitus, who was sent to seek them, up into a Tower to see if he could make any discovery of them, when he could not espy them, as if he had wrongfully accused him of theft, he threw him down headlong. For this he was struck with a disease, and had answer from the Oracle at Delphos, that if he would be freed from it he must be sold, and the price given to the Children of Iphitus. He then passing over into Asia, willingly permitted one of his friends to sell him, and was bought by Omphale, Queen of the Meonians, to whom her husband Timolus had left the Kingdom. Being freed from his disease, he did his Mistress great service, killing many of the famous Robbers, called Cercopes, and bringing some of them alive unto her. Omphale admiring his acts, after she knew who he was, gave him his liberty, and took him to her bed. Of her he begat Lamius, having already a son by his fellow slave, named Cleolaus: he served her three years, and then returning into Peloponnesus, went against Laomedon King of Ilium, as some rank the series of his actions.

22. Some years after, having subdued several persons, and Cities in Greece, he joyned the Arcadians and others to him, and went with an Army against Eurytus, whom he slew with his three sons, and taking away Iole, came to Cenæum, a Promontory of Eubœa. Here being about to sacrifice, he sent Lichas his servant to Trachine for his Shirt and Coat, wherein he was wont to perform that religious work. From Lichas, Deianeira learning how Iole was taken, and fearing to be robbed by her of her husbands affections, annointed his Shirt with a poyson given her by Nessus, the Centaure, as he was dying (who would have ravished her, and for that was killed by Hercules) perswading her that it was an oyntment Efficacious to procure love. As soon as the Shirt touched his body the venom also seized on it, wherewith being grievously tormented he dismissed his Army, and returned to Trachines, where the dis-disease increasing, he sent to enquire of Apollo about a remedy. It was answered, he should be carried up to the Mountain Ossa, where a great pile of wood being reared, Jupiter would take care for the rest. This done, and all hope of recovery past, Hercules in his warlike habit cast himself upon the pile, and desired the standers by to put fire to it, which when all his own relations refused to do, Peas, who seeking his Cattel, came that way, as Apolodorus writeth, or his son Philoctetos, as most deliver, (to whom Hercules gave for a reward his Bow and Arrows) set fire to it, which also being kindled with lightning, was presently reduced together with the body into ashes. Iolans finding one of his bones, a persuasion arose, that he passed from amongst mortals to the Gods, as the Oracle had formerly shewed. He commanded that Hyllus his son, when he came at age, should marry Iole. As for Deianeira, she seeing what she had brought upon her husband, out of vexation hanged her self. Thus perished Alcaus, surnamed Hercules, the Son of Amphytrion and Alcmena, at the age of 52 years, having in a fit of Phrensie, as it's thought, burnt himself. And these are the most remarkable things that are written of him, who lived (according to that Chronology which taketh not in the hundred years formerly mentioned) in the dayes of Tholab the Judge of Isral.

A. M. 2776.

23. Hercules being dead, his children for some time staid at Trachine with Ceyces, the King, till Hyllus and others of them were grown up. Then Eurystheus began to fear them, and therefore resolving to banish them all out of (g) Greece (or rather Peloponnesus) sent to Ceyces, commanding him upon pain of his displeasure, to remove them together with Iolans and the rest of their Friends. They being unable to make resistance, voluntarily quitted the place, and sent about to the principal Cities to beg harbour, which none would afford them except the Athenians, who placed them in Tricorinth, one of the four parts of their City. After some time, when they were come to ripeness of age, and now bare themselves high upon the glory of their Father, Eurystheus much more suspecting their growth, lead down a great Army against them; but assisted by the Athenians under conduct of their Cousin Iolans and Ihesens, they overthrew and slew (h) him with all his Sons, and then invaded Peloponnesus. Now a Plague seized on the Country, and the Oracle answered, that it was, because they returned thither before their time; whereupon Hyllus returned, as some say, and went to Æpalus King of the Dorians about Ossa, by whom he was (i) adopted, because, by Hercules his means, Ægymus had formerly recovered his Kingdom; and thenceforth the Heraclide became imbodyed with the Dorians. Diodorus writeth, that Hyllus provoking some one of his Enemies to a single Combat, upon this condition, that if he overcame, then were the Heraclide to be Masters of Mycena, if not, they should depart for fifty years, was slain, and so they accordingly returned, and kept themselves quiet for that time.

Atreus the son of Pelops.

24. Eurystheus being slain after he had reigned at Mycena 43 years, (k) Atreus the son of Pelops succeeded him, who also at this time had the sovereignty of Argos. This Pelops above an hundred years before (for so famous a Man must not be omitted) being the son of Tantalus Prince of Phrygia, had made War upon Ilium, where after he was put to the worst by Ilus the King, he was forced to fly into Greece, and coming to Pisa, fell in love with (l) Hippodamia Daughter of Oenomaus Prince of that City, who being warned by the Oracle to take heed to himself, when she should take an husband, had condemned her in his resolutions, to perpetuall virginity. Therefore he admitted no Surer, but on this condition, to run a race with him in the Chariot, and if he won her not, then to suffer death, to which he brought many, through the swiftnesse of his Horses, till Pelops (or Hippodamia for him) corrupting the Chariot-driver, obtained the Prize, for grief of which, the old man thinking now the Oracle to be fulfilled, hanged himself. Pelops then obtained Hippodamia and Pisa with her, after which, by little and little, he got most of the Peninsula into his possession, called after him Peloponnesus, wherein he reigned 58 years. Of Hippodamia he begot many SECT. 3. many children, by which he promoted his affairs more than power; for by the marriage of them, he insinuated into the Principalities of most of the Cities. Amongst his Sons the most eminent were Arcus, Thyestes, and Plishtenes. The two former he left his Successors, and Plishtenes dying young, left two Boyes to Arcus, to be brought up, called Agamemnon and Menelaus. Arcus married their Mother, by name Aerope, the Daughter of Minos King of Crete, with whom his Brother Thyestes committing Adultery, he first banished, and after recalling him, feasted him with the flesh of his own sons.

25. Some will have Arcus to have outlived Thyestes; others say, he died before him, and, being reconciled, left him the Kingdom at his death, on this condition, to restore it to Agamemnon when he should come to age. After Eurystheus his death, it seemeth, that he became Master of all Peloponnesus, and opposed Hyllus, who challenging any in his Army, as was said, to a single Combat, Echemus King of the Tegoeata in Arcadia accepted the challenge, and slew him. He was very skilful in Astrology, being by some reputed the first that discovered the motion of the Sun to be contrary to that of the Starry Heaven, (m) and that observed the Eclipse of that luminary. He adopted his two Nephews Agamemnon and Menelaus, who succeeded him (n) seventeen years before the beginning of the Trojan War. Agamemnon a Man of prudence and courage, obtained not onely Mycena, but Argos also, with all as far as (o) Sicyon and Corinsh, and that Country then called Ionia and Aegialea, afterwards Achaia. Menelaus got Lacedaemonia, and their reigned at Lacedaemon. For Castor and Pollux the sons of Tyndareus the King, (p) dying before their Father, he sent for him to Sparta, and delivered up his Kingdom to him, having first given him his Daughter Helena, whom Paris the second Son of Priamus King of Troy (by his wife Hecuba) stealing away, gave occasion to the famous ten years War, and the ruine of that City; concerning which something is to be spoken.

26. The first (q) Man reported to have reigned in Arcadia, was Atlas, who inhabited about the Mountain of Caucasus, and had seven Daughters, which made up the Pleiades, whereof on Electra, Jupiter her husband begat Jasus and Dardanus. Jasus lived unmarried, but Dardanus had by his wife Chryse, the Daughter of Palaeus, two sons, Idaeus and Dimas, who succeeded Atlas in his Kingdom. Afterwards great inundations happening in this Country, they were forced to divide the people into two parts, whereof leaving one with Dimas in Arcadia, with the other Jasus, Dardanus and Idaeus left Peloponnesus, and coasting by Eupoe, at length came into the Bay of Melane, and arrived at a certain Island of Thrace, called Samo-thracia, from the Countrey, and a Man's name who inhabited it; one Samon the son of Mercury, by the Nymphe Rhene. Here finding no convenient habitation, the greater part under the conduct of Dardanus (for Jasus died in the Island, being struck with a Thunder-bolt, because he attempted the chastity of Ceres) passed into Asia, and landing in the Hellepont, seated themselves in Phrygia. Idaeus with part of the Army, settled upon the Mountains, which bore his name, and Dardanus in that part of the Country, since named Troas, built a City of his own name, having some grounds given him by Teucer the King of the place, the Son of Scamander, from whom the Country was called Teucris, and whose daughter Batea he married. He succeeded him in his Kingdom, and changed the name of his Subjects from Teucris to Dardani, and built the City upon the Sea-side, about the 2530th year of the World, in the daves of Sibonelaus King of Argos. On Batea he begat his Son and successor, called Erichthonius, reported by (r) Homer and others, to have been exceeding rich and fortunate, who on Callirhoe the Daughter of Scamander begat Tros, from whom the Country was named. Tros succeeding him begat Ilus, Affaracus and Ganymedes. Ilus succeeded him. From Affaracus descended Aeneas. Ganymedes for his beauty was stolen by Tantalus King of Phrygia, and Father to Pelops, whence arose a War, in which many lost their lives, and Tantalus (though the son of Jupiter by the Nympha Priamus.

27. Podarces (Surnamed Priamus, as Apollodorus writeth) was exceeding rich, and had a large dominion, extending from Lesbus and Tenedos, to the upper Phrygia, containing (f) nine divisions, and many Towns besides. He had Fifty Sons, (g) whereof seventeen were lawfully begotten. His first wife was Arisba the Daughter of Merops, on which he begat Aeschus. Dismissing her, he married Hecuba, the Daughter of Dymas, Cisseus, or Sangarius (all which are mentioned) and by her he had Hector, Paris, Helenus, Deiphobus, and others. Before she was brought to bed of Paris, she dreamed that she was delivered of a firebrand, which should consume to ashes the whole City. (u) Priamus hereupon caused the child to be exposed on the Mountain Ida, but by the procurement of his Mother, he was educated amongst the Shepherds, whom because he assisted against robbers, and shewed himself very courageous, he obtained the name of Alexander. He (whether out of design or no, is uncertain) came to Sparta to the house of Menelaus the King, and thence stole his wife Helena, which some (x) report he took away by force, and that after the taking of the City; but (y) others affirm of her, as of all others thus taken away, that it was not without her own liking. Fearing he might be persued, he carried her first to Sidon in Phoenicia, where he married her, and thence to Troy, at which City they were scarce arrived, before all Greece was in an uproare, as if the whole Country had been overrun. Agamemnon, who was much concerned for his Brother, possessing almost all Peloponnesus, by his authority easily perswaded other Princes to engage in the quarrell. He first assembled them at (z) Aegium, a City of Achaia, to consult about the management of the War, where being chosen General, they afterwards met at Aulis, a Sea-town of Boeotia with their Ships, and there sware, never to return home, till Troy should be taken.

28. The chiefest of these renowned Warriours were (a) Nestor, who reigned in Messenia, Ajax the Son of Telamon Prince of the Island Salamina, Ajax the younger, or the son of Oileus King of Locri, over against Euboea, Achilles the Son of Peleus by the goddess Thetis, whose principality was Pisiotis, part of that Country afterwards called Thessalie, Ulysses the son of Laertes King of Cephalenia, Thoas the Etolian, Podalirius and Machaon, Sons of the third Aesculapius, and Telepolemus the Son of Hercules, who now inhabited the Island Rhodes. They made up amongst them a Navy of about 1000 ships, and therein transported an Army of 120000 men. From Aulis they sailed to Lenus, and thence, missing of Troy, into Mysia, which mistaking for their Enemies Country, they began to make encursions into it, and were bearen back by Telephus Prince thereof; all but Achilles and Patroclus, the former whereof sore wounded him: and Thersander (b) General of the Boeotians here lost his life, into whose room, because his Son Tisamenus was but young, they elected Penelopeus. A conflict presently ensued their arrival at Troy, wherein Protesilaus was slain by a Dardanian, as Homer calleth him, (either Hector or Aeneas) and then the Greeks sent Menelaus and Ulysses Ambassadors, to demand Helena. Priamus calling a Council to deliberate about the matter, Antenor was for delivering her up, and so were the rest of the grave and ancient Men, though they attributed much to the beauty of the Woman; but Antimachus being corrupted by the gold of Paris, urged the contrary, and not onely moved to have the message rejected, but the messengers killed.

the old men, and out of indulgence to his son, sent away the Ambassadors without any satisfaction. Then both parties prepared for the War, and another engagement followed, wherein the Greeks had the better, who then dividing their forces, left part to continue the siege, and with the other, Achilles (who took with him Palamedes) was sent to harraze the Countrey, and cut off provisions from the Cirie. This he so well performed, as he took 23 Towns, and therein got much booty, which was divided. Whil'st Palamedes was with him carrying on the War in the Island Lesbos, Ulysses envying him for his great wisdom, wherein he seemed to overtop him, circumvented him by treachery, and by false suggestions procured him to be sent for to the Camp, and stoned as a Traytor, though he had exceedingly well deserved of the Army, being a person of great courage (which he also expressed at his death) and yet so moderate and wise, that he thereby allayed the too much heat of Achilles. To him (a) some attribute the invention of 16 Letters in the Greek Alphabet, (b) others onely 4. but withall the ordering and ranking of an Army, the watch word, Guards, and Dice to divert the Souldiers. His death was grievously taken by Ajax the son of Telamon, who for some time absented himself, but especially by Achilles, who took it so heinously, that for a great while he would not be reconciled, nor brought to fight, having much more cause to be offended for this thing, than the detaining of a woman from him by Agamemnon, as the Poet sings, who industriously omiteth whatsoever reflecteth upon Ulysses.

(a) Tacitus lib. 11.

(b) Plin. l. 7. c. 56.

30. Achilles determined not to fight till the Trojans should peirce as far as his own ships, which at length happening, he first sent out Patroclus in his Armour, who had desired it. Patroclus with the Myrmidones (Achilles his subjects) put the Trojans to flight, who now had begun to cast fire into the ships, slew Pyrachmes with his own hand, pursued Hector, and smote Sarpedon King of Lycia about the heart so that he died; but being wounded by Euphorbus, who came behind him, he was slain by Hector. Euphorbus endeavoured to get his body, but was killed by Menelaus; and the Soul of this Euphorbus Pythagoras affirmed (according to his principle of commigration) to have passed into his own body. After this, Achilles (whose presence formerly had kept the Trojans within their Walls) went out to fight, and taking twelve young men alive slew them at the funeral of Patroclus. By the River Scamander (or Xanthus) he killed Asteropaeus, Captain of the Paones, from whom, though he received a wound in the Arm, yet went he to fight with Hector, who expected him without the Walls, and would not be perswaded to decline his fury, though it proved his ruine, being slain in this single Combat about the 30th year of his age. His body tied to a Chariot, the Conquerour drew in Triumph about the Walls, but afterwards it was ransomed by Priamus. After this he slew Memnon the Nephew of Priamus by his brother Tithonus, who was sent out of Persia by the Assyrian King Tentamus to his aid; then Troilus his son by Hecuba, and lastly Penthesilea one of the Amazons, who for murder had fled her Countrey, and coming to Troas * after Hector's death, did good service against the Greeks. When dead, Achilles is said to have been enamoured of her body, and with her also the valour of this sort of women is believed to have been extinct.

31. Achilles, whom no art nor violence of the Trojans could overcome, was taken by the love of a Woman, and slain by treachery. For having a view of (a) Polyxena, the daughter of Priamus, from the Wall, he became so inflamed to her in his affections, that he proceeded to a Treaty of marriage, wherein he was shot with a Dart by Paris, who hid himself behind the image of Apoll, which idol is therefore feigned an assistant in the work. Afterwards the Greeks had it revealed to them, that except they could take the Palladium, or Image of Pallas out of the City, till they should get Hercules his Arrows, and provide a wooden Horse, Troy could never be taken. Ulysses therefore, and Diomedes, as * Virgil singeth, stole away the Image; Philoctetes, who had the Arrows was sent for from the Island Lemnos, and with them slew Paris the incendiary, after whose death Diiphobus the son of Priamus mus obtained Helena, as being of best account for valour next to his brother Hector. Then was a wooden Horse prepared by the hands of Epeus, which pretending to dedicate to Minerva they left before the Citie, having industriously made it higher than the Gates, hoping the Trojans would pull down part of the Wall to take it in. They left also some of their choicest men in the Horses belly, and Sinon with his hands bound behind him, who under notion of a fugitive that had been ill used, should perswade them to receive it into the Citie; and then giving out that they would raise the siege for some time, they withdrew into the Island Tenedos. The Trojans with great resolution break down the Wall, and taking in the Horse placed him in the Castel; but in the night Sinon giving warning by fire, the Greeks came from Tenedos, and being easily let in by their companions, by reason of the Trojans had drunk themselves fast asleep, the Citie was taken, sacked and burnt. Menelaus killing Deiphobus in his bed, took away Helena, and Priamus was slain in his own house by Pyrrhus (or Neoptolemus) the son of Achilles. Of the Trojans which escaped, Antenor being spared by the Greeks came with the Heneti into the Adriatick Sea, where he built Padua, and Aeneas the son of Anchises at length reached Italy. This destruction of Troy hapned in the 10th year of the siege, 408 before the first Olympiad, 1182 before the Era of Christ, of the World 2821. in the dayes of Jepthah, who judged Israel.

32. Of the Greek Captains which escaped, Ajax the son of Telamon striving with Ulysses for the Armour of Achilles, and overcome by the judgement of the Army, killed himself, or else was circumvented by his adversary. Ajax the younger, the son of Oileus, having taken prisoner Cassandra, the daughter of Priamus, unwilling to part with her, was driven by the plots of Agamemnon to shift for himself, and putting out to Sea in an unseasonable time miscarried by shipwrack. Of those that returned home, most encountered with many difficulties; Ulysses especially, who for many years wandred about, as it is poetically described by * Homer. Menelaus after the work was done, presently commanded the Greeks to prepare for their return; but Agamemnon being unwilling to depart before he had sacrificed to Minerva, the Fleet was divided, and a contention arose berwixt the followers of Menelaus when they came to Tenedos, because some would have stayed for Agamemnon there; infomuch as Ulysses then returned back to him. Nestor set sayl thence before Menelaus; but was overtaken by him about the Island Lefbos, whence they sailed together as far as Atica, where Menelaus staying to bury Phrontes, the other left him and came safe home to Pylus. Menelaus his ships were most of them overwhelmed in a Tempest about the Promontory of Malea, and the rest with him and Helena driven into Egypt, where, and in other places he continued till * the 8th year. Agamemnon, after he had sacrificed, and erected an Altar to the twelve gods in the Promontory of Troas, came home, and was presently * murdered by Aegisthus, the son of his Uncle Thyestes, with whom Clytemnestra his wife (the daughter also of Tyndareus) had lived in Adultery, and now conspired to make him away.

33. He left a son named Orestes, and three daughters begotten on this woman. The Boy (for he was but young) was by his sister Electra, and his Nurse, when they perceived his life was laid at by Aegisthus before his fathers return, conveyed into Phocis, unto Strophius, who had married his father's sister, whence returning the 8th year after his death he killed Aegisthus together with his mother, and recovered the Kingdom. Because of his mothers death he was vexed by the furies, and found some difficulty in mastering the Argives, who now opposed him; but by the help of the Phocians he recovered his father's Dominions, though Menelaus his Uncle, either for that he disapproved the death of his mother, or for private respects, bare him no good will, and neglected him, which he shewed further in taking from him his daughter Hermione (who had brought him a son) and giving her to Pyrrhus, the son of Achilles. Tormented with the furies he went into into Arcadia, and thence to Athens, where he was acquitted in the Court of Areopagus about his mother, the suffrages, for, and against him being equal, in which case judgement alwayes passed on the Defendants side. A little after this he is thought to have killed Pyrrhus as he was sacrificing to his father at the Temple of Delphos, and then resumed his wife. When Mene-laüs was dead he obtained the Kingdom of Sparta, the Lacedamonians being more willing to receive him as the Grand-son of Tyndareus by Clytemnestra, than the base sons of Menelaus, Nicostratus and Megapenthus, begotten on a slave. It is probable that he, as his father before him, was supreme Lord of Argos, and that the Successors of Melampus and Bias, ever since the division of the Kingdom, or for a good space, held their principalities of his Predecessors and himself. But now being King of Lacedamon, and the greatest part of Arcadia, lying near to Argos, after the death of Cyathos, the son of Sthenelus (who left no Children) and that Amphilocheus was departed thence to the Amphilocheians (to whom he gave name) having the Phocians constant friends to him, he easily made himself sole master of Argos, and so this Kingdom was re-united about 140 years after the threefold division of it. Divers years after, he placed a Colony of the Aeolians in *Asia (four ages before that of the Ionians) and shortly after died in Arcadia, when he had reigned 70 years.

Tisamenus.

34. He left (b) two sons: One legitimate, and named Tisamenus (from his revenging his fathers death) begotten on Hermione; and another born of Erigone, the daughter of Aegisthus. Tisamenus succeeded him according to Pausanias, though Paterculus writeth that both of them reigned after their fathers death. Scarce was Tisamenus warm in his seat when he was displaced by the Heraclidae, or posterity of Hercules. They had several times attempted their return into Peloponnesus, but were ever frustrated till now; Hyllus the son of Hercules once or twice, Cleodæus his son after him, and Aristomachus his son also with the same success. Aristomachus left three sons, Temenus, Cresphontes, and Aristodemus, which being grown up consulted the Oracle of Apollo concerning their return, and had the same answer their father formerly had, that they should attain their desire, if they went by the way Stenygrus, which word in the Greek being of an ambiguous signification, Aristomachus thinking by it to be meant the Isthmus, as a narrow way, led down his forces through it, and miscarried. Temenus objecting this, the Pythia, or woman that delivered the Oracles, answered, that their Ancestors by their misunderstanding had been Authors of their own infelicity; for whereas Hyllus was told that the third fruit was to be expected, the third Generation was meant, and not the third crop, or summer, as he expounded it, and accordingly perished: And as for Stenygrus, by it they were to understand the deep Sea on the right hand as one entrench Peloponnesus, and not the narrow Isthmus. Having received this answer, and conceiving all things now to be fulfilled and ripe for their effectual return, they built ships in Ætolia upon that Sea, the place wherein they were made thenceforth keeping the name of Naupactus from that occasion. Whilst they were about this work, a certain Prophet appeared to them, and foretold them several things; but Hippotes taking him for a Magician sent on purpose to delude the Army, killed him. For this a Pestilence was sent amongst them, about which consulting the Oracle they were bidden to banish Hippotes for 10 years, and use the conduct of a Captain with three eyes, for two years space.

35. Seeking out such a man, they met one (c) Oxylns, an Æolian, son to Thoas that went to the siege of Troy; who being on horse-back had but one eye, now returning into his own Countrey from Elea in Peloponnesus, whither he had been banished for killing a man. Him they made Captain of the expedition, bargaining to procure him the possession of Elis as (d) Pausanias witnesseth, who reporteth him to have ridden on a Mule that had but one eye, and therefore to have been taken for the man meant by the Oracle, through the perswasion of Cresphontes. the Peloponnesians attending their motions there, easily passed over the Sea, and landed at Molycrium. Three parts of Peloponnesus especially they challenged as their due: Argos, because descended of Persens, whereas Tisamenus the present King was of the posterity of Pelops, who had no right to that Kingdom. Lacedamon, for that Hercules killed Hypocoön, who had expelled Tyndareus thence, and restored the later to the Kingdom, on this condition, to keep it for his children. Messenia, because having also conquered it, when he destroyed the City Pilus, and slew all the brothers of Nestor, he gave it to him of meer goodness and compassion, but on the same condition as Lacedamon to Tyndareus. The dominion of Argos without much adoë they got into their hands; after that, taking a certain Village in the confines thereof, Temenus fortified it, and used it for a place of retreat for carrying on the War. One Philonomus betrayed Sparta into their hands, which they entered with sound of Pipes instead of Trumpets, as most effectual by the tune, to make the Soldier attentive, and keep his ranks, which use was constantly observed by the Lacedamonians, together with that of the Harp.

But they being jealous of him, lest for his high birth and valour, he should be chosen King of the Country, denied their request. The Achaëans then, driven by necessity and desperation, attempted to get by force, what they could not by intreaty, and though they lost Tisamenus in the fight, drove the Ionians out of their Seats, and constrained them to passe into Asia, where they were received by the Athenians, through the perswasion of Melanthus the King. As for the Heraclidae, when they came to divide what they had won, Argos fell to Temenus, Cresphontes, by fraud used in the Lot, obtained Messene, and Lacedamon became the portion of Procles and Eurystheus, the sons of; Aristodemus, who was slain by the sons of Pylas kinsmen to Tisamenus, before they entered Peloponnesus: They also according to their engagement possessed Oxylus of Elis.

37. Temenus being settled in Argos, after some years incurred the displeasure of his Sons; for marrying his Daughter Hyrnetho to Deiphontes his kinsman, he so affected them two above his other children, that he made him his onely Counsellour in all affairs; insomuch that his sons fearing he would transfer the Kingdom from themselves to him, made their father away, by one means or other. And Cresphontes his Brother, who had used too much cunning in getting Messene, not long after, seeming to be too gracious with the people, incurred the displeasure of the Nobility, and was murdered together with two of his Sons; onely Aepus then but young escaped, and killing Polyphontes the usurper, revenged his Father's death. Recovering thus the Kingdom, he had Successors, Glauens, Isthmius, Doradas, Syboras, Phintas, Antiochus, and Euphaes, who dying of a wound, received in a battel fought with the Lacedamonians, without issue, Aristodemus was elected in his room, and continued as long as the Kingdom it self lasted, being overturned by means of the Spartans, as will be seen in their story. Cisus the eldest son of Temenus succeeded him, though the people generally inclined to Deiphontes, by whose party they were so stirred up and animated, that Cisus being dead, they took away from his Successors all regal power and authority, left them nothing but a meer empty title, and so in reality, this Kingdom fell, being in effect turned into a Free-State. Which change happened about forty years after the return of the Heraclidae, 690 after the beginning of Inachus. A. M. 2940.

38. One (f) (and he a great one) there is, who would gather out of an old Tragædian, that the antient government of this Kingdom of the Inachide was meerly absolute, the King being by the Poet called both People and City, not subject to any Laws, but sustained by the power of his Throne, and acting all things according to his meer will and pleasure. may be given to the expresse words of (g) Pausanias, rather than the liberty of a Poet, Emmianus thence concludeth, their power was but moderate; for the Argives saith Pausanias, from the most antient times were exceeding studious of liberty. Out of this principle (being stirred up as it seemeth by the party of Deiphobus) they abated the power of Cisus his Successors, leaving them nothing but an empty name. And this they further shewed, when Meltas the Son of Lacidans, one of these Kings, not enduring this abatement, grew as they thought dissolute and imperious in the Government. For impatient hereof, they deprived him of all power, took upon them to condemn him to death, and plucked up all Supremacy by the roots, not suffering any afterwards to reign amongst them. For though we meet with one afterwards, called King of Argos in Herodotus; yet that name signified no more than it did in the Common-wealths of Athens, Carthage, and Rome, where this title was wont to be given to some sorts of Officers, as this work will shew. The Government was now Democratical, the chief power lying in the people, divided into three tribes, to which the Senate was subordinate, chosen every year for the preparing of matters for the whole body, and the management of the executive power, with authority to enact things of lesser consequence. There was also a Council of State, consisting of 80 persons, besides inferior Magistrates of the City, and Judges for determining of causes, all which are mentioned in the league, made betwixt the Argives, Athenians, and others, described by Thucydides in his fifth Book of the Peloponnesian War. No fuller intelligence have we concerning the constitution of this Common-wealth, which yet flourished downwards for many Ages, and had great contests with the Lacedamonians, especially about the territories of Thyrea, to which both laid claim. Sometimes they fell out about their confederates, being moved with much emulation and distaste at each others Government (the one being a Democracie, and the other an Oligarchie) which once especially brought the State of Argos into great danger. But these things belong to another place.

The most antient Kingdom and Common-wealth of Athens.

Cecrops.

1. THe founding of the Athenian Kingdom is ascribed to (a) Cecrops, who first reigned in Auica (then Atte) in the dayes of Triopas King of Argos, 373 years before the destruction of Troy, 780 before the first Olympiad, A. M. 2449. The (b) Egyptians said he was their Countryman, and brought hither a Colonie of the Saite, who inhabited upon one of mouths of Nile. He was feigned to be double-natured, consisting both of a Serpentine and Humane shape, because coming into Greece, he shook off barbarism and turned civil. Besides this Colonie, he gathered the people of these parts into twelve Towns, whereas before that they lived dispersedly according to the most antient custom of Greece, and called them Athens, after the name of Minerva in the Greek Language. The storie is (c) told, that when the name came to be given, on a sodain an Olive-tree, and a Fountain of water appeared, whereat Cecrops moved with wonder, sent to enquire of the Oracle what they should mean. It was answered, that the Olive signified Minerva, the water Neptune, and that they might name that City from which of these two they pleased. Hereupon, all the men and women were gathered together to make the choice: the men were for Neptune, but the women being the greater number, carried the name for Minerva. Neptune angry hereat, drowned their territories, whom to pacify, they punished the women several wayes. They decreed, that thenceforth they should not have a voice in any publick matter; that no child should bear the mother's name, and that they should not be called Athenaa, but Atica. Some women known by the name of Atine va there have been, though impure spirits, ambitious to blind men with superstition and idolatry, might well act in this matter, as Augustine telleth us, under the name of Neptune.

Several Mi-
nerua's,

2. Cicero (d) mentioneth five several women that have had the name of Minerva. The first was the mother of Apollo by Vulcan. The second born of the River Nile, and worshipped by the Saita. The third daughter to Jupiter Caelius. The fourth begotten by Jupiter on Ceriphe, daughter to the Ocean, called Coria by the Arcadians; which invented the Chariot drawn by four horses. The fifth was the daughter of Pallas, said to have killed her Father, because he attempted to violate her virginity. Of these the second must be she that was thus honoured by Cecrops, having founded the City Sais, near to Delta, being by the Egyptians called Nuth. To her he had formerly erected a Statue in Aegypt, and he, as they say, first gave the name of Zeus to him whom the Lains called Jupiter. As there were several Minervæ, so also more (e) than one City known by the name of Athene. From this in Atica, the Citizens were by the Romans called Athenienses; but another there was in Eubœa, built by Cecrops the Son of Erechtheus, the Inhabitants of which went by the name of Athenai; and a City in Narbonne, a Province of Gaul, near to Marseils, called Atheneopolis, and the Citizens Atheneopolitæ. There was also in Laconia a Town called by the name of Athene.

3. In the dayes of (f) Cecrops, Deucalion the Son of Prometheus reigned in Thessalie, whose history being remarkable, must be briefly touched. Iapetus had three Sons, Atlas, Prometheus, and Epimetheus. For (g) the first, One telleth us there were three that bore the name of Atlas. One a Moor, and the greatest of all; another an Italian, Father to Electra; the third, an Arcadian, Father of Maia, the Mother of Mercury; all which the antients confound according to their custom. The first (h) lived near to Mount Atlas; to which for his great skil in Astrology, is attributed the bearing up of the Heavens; and he is also counted the Father of Electra. Prometheus found out the instrument to strike fire, and thereupon is said to have stolen fire from the Gods. Deucalion his Son married Pyrrha the daughter of his Uncle Epimetheus, and in his time (i) happened that great deluge in part of Greece, which is known by the addition of his name; that Country called most antiently and truly Hellas, his seat near to the Mountain Parnassus being chiefly afflicted with it, on which Hill he is thought to have saved many men by boats, and thence the Fable to have risen of his repeopling the Earth. But (that we may note it altogether) there are three particular Floods which we read to have hapned to this Country of Greece. The first, under Ogyges (called the Ogygean deluge) concerning whom, we shall speak in the History of Thebes. This fell 248 years before either of the other, and overwhelmed Attica especially so, that as Pererius will have it, it remained waste 200 years after. The next was this of Deucalion, which happened 727 years before the first Olympiad: and the (k) third fell 86 after it, in the dayes of Dardanus and Cadmus.

4. Deucalion of Pyrrha his wife begat Hellen and Amphyktion. Hellen gave the name of Hellenes to his Subjects before called Graci, and of Hellas to the Country formerly named Pelasgia, from the Pelasgi (who there inhabited) is Hæmonia from Hæmon, the son of Pelasgus, and Pyrrha from Pyrrhar. He had three sons, Xuthus, Æolus, and Dorus. To Æolus he left his Kingdom, and sent the other two abroad to seek out seats elsewhere. Æolus grew so famous, that the name of Jupiter and Neptune came to be given him. Dorus inhabited the Country Histiæotis, about the Mountains Ossa and Olympus. Xuthus after his Father's death was banished Thessalie by his other Brothers, for stealing away a great part of his Fathers treasure, and came to Athens, where he married the daughter of Erechtheus, on which he begat Achæus and Ion. Achæus getting aid from Athens and Ægialus, went into Thessalie, and recovered his Grand-Father's Kingdom; but afterwards killing a man by chance, he fled into Laconia, where his posterity continued till expelled by the Heracidae and Dorenses, as we shewed in the History of Tisamenus. Ion being exceeding famous at Athens had a numerous progeny, which, for that Attica was now grown too full, was sent out as a Colony into Peloponnesus, whence they were thrust out by their brethren the Acheans, after they had denied them harbour (as is formerly said) and returned to Athens, from which Citie they were afterwards led out into Asia, by the sons of Codrus. But these things hapned in after times.

The Council of Areopagus.

5. In Cecrops his time (l) one maketh the Council, or Senate of Areopagus to have had its Original, though no clear light can we discover concerning the true beginning of it. (m) Some write that it began under Solon, but (n) another of a more ancient date signifieth that it was a Court of Judicature before. (o) One deriveth the word from Mars (in Greek Ares) making him to have been first tried there for killing Halirrhodius, the son of Nepetune, who offered violence to his daughter Alcippe. Others would fetch a reason from the erecting of his Spear there, or from this, that the Court of Areopagus took Cognizance of slaughters, which are usually committed with Swords, or other Weapons of Mars. Lastly, some think it thence to have been named, for that the Amazons, when they fought against Theseus, made Mars his Hill their Fortresse, and there offered sacrifice to him. * Cecrops died after he had reigned 50 years, and because Erysichon his son died before him, Cranus the most powerfull man then at Athens succeeded him in the Kingdom. He, after he had reigned some seven years, was thrust out by Amphyction, the son of Dencalion, and his son-in-law, the founder as some have thought of the National Council of the Amphyctiones, of which we have already spoken. He is reported to have given entertainment to Dionysus, or Bacchus, who at this time, as they say, came into Attica, and when he had reigned ten years, was also expelled by Erichonius.

Erichonius.

6. The father of Erichonius was said to be Vulcan, and his mother the earth, because he was found in Vulcan's Temple upon the earth, with a Snake wound about his feet, whence also they feigned that he had feet like Snakes, and invented a Chariot wherein he might ride and hide them. He instituted Games to Apollo and Minerva, and having reigned 50 years, left his Kingdom to his son Pandion, who also, after 40. gave way to his son Erechtheus. He became a man of great account, and whereas the subjects of Athens were before his time called Cecropidae, thenceforth they were named after the place it self. He made War upon the inhabitants of Eleafine, Ion the son of Xuthus, and his own Grand-son by his daughter being his chief Commander, wherein after he had slain Immaradus, the son of Eumolpus their General, he also lost his life, when he had reigned 50 years. He left three sons, Cecrops, Metion, and Pandorus, who falling into contention about the succession, put it to the arbitration of Xuthus. He adjudged it to the eldest, but yet would they not rest satisfied, which made him leave Athens, and go into Aegialea where he died. This Cecrops the second, some think to have gathered the people into twelve Towns, for that living dispersedly abroad, the Carians by Sea, and the Boeotians (called Aeone) by Land harrafed the Countrey, as * Strabo writeth. At the end of 40 years his son named Pandion succeeded him, who was expelled the Kingdom by the sons of Metion his Uncle, and fled to Pyla, the King of Megara his father-in-law, who left him his Successor. Whil'st he here reigned he begat four sons, Aegens, Lycus, Pallas, and Nisus, who after his death went against the Metionidae, and expelled them Athens, the Dominions whereof they divided into four parts, according to their father's injunctions, Megara falling to Nisus, who reigned there a long time.

quire of the Oracle about posterity. The answer being obscure, in his return he was entertained by Pitheus, the son of Pelops, a man famous for learning at Iraene, who either understanding the Oracle, or otherwise induced, made his daughter Aethra to lye with him, after he had caused him to drink good store of Wine. At his departure he put a sword, and a knife under a great stone, bidding her, if she brought forth a Boy, as soon as he could remove the stone, and take those things from under it, to send him with them as tokens unto Athens, and he would own him for his son. She accordingly brought forth a son (called Theseus, from putting the marks under the stone) whom Pitheus brought up, and for that he proved exceeding prudent and courageous, his mother at sixteen years of age brought him to the stone, acquainting him with his Original, and his fathers injunctions. He easily removing it, and taking away the tokens, prepared for his journey; but they were unwilling to let him go by Land, because all the wayes were full of Robbers, since Hercules (who went up and down destroying them) after his killing of Iphitus had quitted these parts, and was gone into Lycia, where for some years he served Omphale the Queen. But Theseus burning with emulation upon hearing continually the praise of Hercules his Kins-man (for their mothers were next Cousins) resolved to take that way to obtain some renown in killing those Robbers, and effected his design upon several of them.

8. Being arrived at Athens, he was in danger to be poisoned by his father, through the perswasion of Medea (who now was fled to him from Colchis, and filled his jealous head with suspicions of this stranger) till thinking it wisdom to make himself known, rather than let another do it, he shewed him the tokens, which he presently acknowledged, & owning him for his son, made his subjects as such to take notice of him. But the sons of Pallas, who before had been seditious, now seeing all hopes of the Kingdom taken from them by him, and disdaining that Ageus should first reign himself, being not of the blond Royal, but adopted onely by Pandion (as Plutarch writeth) and then leave for his Successor a stranger, and a Bastard, they took Arms, and the better to accomplish their design, divided themselves into two parties, whereof the one came openly with their father against Athens, and the other lay in ambush. Theseus having notice of the later sort, surprized, and cut them all off, which so discouraged the other as they separated themselves and fled. Theseus after this, to employ himself, and gain the favour of the people, went, and took the Marathonian Bull, fetch't out of Crete by Hercules, and brought him quick into the Citie, after he had infested the Countrey very much. Then sailed he to Crete, where, as the fable goeth, he slew the Minotaur, a Monster kept by Minos, King of that Island.

Minos.

9. Minos, (q) Rhadamanthus, and Sarpedon were the Children of Jupiter by Europa, and all adopted by Asterius (the Grand-son of Hellen, by his son Teutamus) King of that Island, who married their mother, and was childlesse. Minos was the Law-giver of the Cretians; this honour being ascribed to him by the most Authentick of ancient (r) Authors. Yet (s) Ephorus in his book of European Commonwealths, wrote that he was but an imitator of one Rhadamanthus (of the same name with his brother, who by others is also said to have been employed by Minos in this work, but more ancient) who first cultivated the Island by Laws, Cities, and Commonwealths, feigning that he had from Jupiter all the Ordinances which he published. In (t) imitation of him, Minos having continued in the Law of Jupiter nine years, produced Laws in writing, and ascribed them to the same Author as Homer also himself; which (u) word of Homer, though Strabo taketh to signifie a continuance for ten years, yet Plato, and from him (x) Valerius Maximus interpret it not of nine years continuance, but every ninth year wherein as it seemeth he amended his Laws. Although Minos was a King, yet he directed (according to * Ephorus) the whole model of his Laws to the freedom of his subjects. This liberty he thought to be preserved best by Concord, which would be most established by the prevention of avarice

He would therefore have them all live soberly and frugally, to which purpose he ordained that Boys should live together in companies, called Agelæ, when they were grown up, and men, in others, called Syssitia, from eating together, (which they also named Anaxia from their manhood) that taking their meat all in publick, the poor might live in equal condition with the rich.

10. After the abdication of regal power, the chief Magistracy was exercised by ten Cosmi, in power, though not in number, like to the Spartan Ephori, being chosen out of the lowest sort of people as those; yet not out of the whole body but particular families, which custom Aristotle accounteth worse than the other of Lacedæmon. Those Cosmi at home Governed the Commonwealth; in War commanded the Army with absolute Authority. There was also a Senate, chosen out of those who in this Office had well demeaned themselves, being for life, and not liable to be called to account. There was an Order of Hors-men, who were bound to keep horses for the service of the State, whereas they at Lacedæmon had no such tie upon them. In the Concio, or great Assembly, all Members of the Commonwealth had equal Votes, but its power was not great, confirming only what was propounded by the Senate and Cosmi. They had publick slaves, called Periæci, from their inhabiting up and down the Countrey, who tilled the grounds, and paid in a constant Revenue. All, when ripe of age, were commanded to marry for the propagation of legitimate issue: Yet they did not lead their wives to their houses when newly married, but let them stay till they were fit to govern a family. The Boys took their meat altogether on the ground, serving themselves, and the elder sort. They were clothed meanly, and alike, both Winter and Summer; they used bickerings with one another, both with single hand and Weapon on certain dayes, and had those who exercised them also in shooting, and a varlike kind of leaping invented by Cures; moreover in certain Rithms, called properly * Rythmi Cretici. The Cretians had several commendable Laws, as that which severely restrained drunkenness, another commended by Plato, that required an account how publick Corn was distributed and spent. The younger sort were utterly forbidden to make any inquiry into the equity of the Laws, and if the elder were unsatisfied, without their knowledge, they were to have recourse to the Magistrates, and their own equals. But that the Laws might be ingraven in their memories, the boyes were wont when they were taught to read, to get some of them by heart, being put into Verse, together with some Musick Notes.

11. Lycurgus the Spartan Law-giver made this model the pattern of his new Commonwealth, having travelled into the Island, where he had converse with Thales, a man ennobled for his Lavvs, and Lyrick Poems; for we must not suppose Minos the sole Author of the Cretian customs. As the Cretians had their Cosmi, so the Spartans their Ephori, though most probable it is that these were brought in after the death of Lycurgus. As they a Senate, so these also endowd with the like immunities. The Concio, or Assembly of the people in Crete, resolved nothing but what was propounded by the Cosmi and Senate, which was followed by the first constitution of Lycurgus the Senate propounding at Sparta. The Periæci, and Heloti fitly agreed, though the Cretians received lesse damage from the former, because being in an Island there were no Neighbours to hold correspondence with the slaves. The Syssitia of the Lacedæmonians were fetched, as Aristotle proverth, from Crete; and their Phiditia taken from the Andria of that place, as also their education of Children was agreeable to the Cretian. Plato commendeth much the Commonwealth of Crete, and the Legislator for his wisdom and prudence, though he abominateth the immodest love of boyes, and rejecteth his reason for it, which yet Lycurgus so approved, as to put it in his model. Aristotle condemneth it, as also amongst some other things, the Election of the Cosmi, and their too great advantage they had of raising seditions in the State, when they came to be punished. But Polybius affirmeth the two Commonwealths of Crete and Sparta to have vastly differ-

They were, he saith, fraudulent and crafty in their private demeanour, and most unjust in their publick Councils. Though some publick abuses taxed by Polybius, might have crept in in ancient times; yet it appeareth from the testimony of that Verse of Epimenides a Cretian, which St. Paul citeth and confirmeth, Κριτες δει ψευδαι, καυαδ' εμεια, γαστρις αγαροι, that the disposition even of the old Cretians (for Epimenides is found contemporary with Salon) was very naught.

This when Ageus perceived, fearing they might by his means receive some aid and assistance, he procured him to be made away, at which Minos sore aggrieved, came to Athens to demand satisfaction, but obtaining none, is said to have procured from Jupiter a Famine to fall upon all Greece, and especially Attica, which could not be abated, till he received satisfaction. A (b) yearly Tribute then he imposed on the Athenians, of seven Boys and as many Girls, which being unwillingly willing to submit to, they were sore displeased when they came to part with their children, and repining at Ageus as the author of their calamity, at the third time of sending, Theseus offered himself to go amongst the rest. The Fable is, that they were to be devoured of the Minotaure, a Monster, whose upper parts were like to those of a Man, but resembled a Bull in the other. Some thought there might be such a Monster indeed, but most account it fabulous, and it is interpreted to be meant of one Taurus, the Captain of Minos, who might have custody of these children, whom Aristotle will not have killed, but made slaves, till their death. Theseus promising to kill this Minotaure, Ageus with much ado yielded he should go, and commanded the Master of the ship, that, whereas for the sadnesse of the occasion they used black sails, if his Son came back alive, he should change them for white ones, as soon as they came within kenning of Attica.

(b) Plutarch.
ut supra.He killeth
the Minotaure.

13. Theseus coming into Crete by the help of Ariadne the daughter of Minos, (which fell in love with him) got into the labyrinth where the Minotaure was kept (and which was made by Daedalus, who having killed his Sisters son at Athens, fled into this Island) and slew him. It is thought, that when he landed, he offered the Combat to whomsoever would accept of it, and that this Taurus, who bore himself high upon his valour, and was hated by all for his ill manners, was forced by Minos to accept of it. Theseus having killed him, was so admired by the King, that he gave him back the children and remitted the Tribute. Ariadne fell in love with him, whom some say, he carried away with him, but others, that he left her behind, and she hanged her self; several things, one contrary to another being reported of her. Peace now being made, and Theseus returning homewards, they were so transported with joy, that they forgot to set up the white sails; whereupon Ageus despairing of his sons safety, threw himself headlong from a Rock and perished. From this Ageus some would fetch the name of the Aegean Sea. But others, think it was so called from Aga, the Island near Eubœa; others from Aga a town of Eubœa; some from Aga a promontory of Eolis, and others from the Rock Aga, lying betwixt Tenedus and Chios; Again some from Ageus, the name of Neptune in Pherecydes; and others from Ageon, the same with Briareus, and others from a Goat, because by it's turbulency it leapeth like that creature. Possus who deriveth the name also from Ageus, mentioneth other two Originals as probable,

Concerning Aga, Suidas telleth a long story out of Nicocrates, which is refuted by the Scholiast of Apollonius, who concerning this, is to be consulted, together with Serabo and Pliny.

Theseus gathereth the Athenians into one City.

14. Theseus succeeding his Father, set himself all manner of wayes to deserve well of his Subjects; Whereas before they were dispersed in twelve Towns or more, he gathered them into one City, as being more convenient for strength, concord, and dispatch of publick businesse. This being hard to effect, by reason that the people were unwilling to quit their present possessions for new hopes, he went from place to place, shewing them the convenience of the thing, and that he might effectually perswade, he promised them liberty, offering to lay down all power except that of the Generalship, and of keeping the Laws; in all other things to be like them, and the power to rest in the people. The multitude being allured by this promise, he made the chief City, called Cecropia, his regal seat, and built another about it for the people, which he divided into three ranks, of Nobility, Husbandmen, and Artificers, all under the same equality of liberty and Law. But the former sort he appointed to be the fountain of Magistracy; yet so, as elective by the suffrages of the other two. He abolished the several Courts of Judicature belonging to the twelve Towns, and constituted one general Prytanæum in the City. Thus did he divest himself of all royalty in a manner, and brought popular-government into the State.

His exploits.

15. As Hercules had instituted the Olympick Games in honour of Jupiter, so he ordained the Isthmian, and dedicated them to Neptune. He sailed with Hercules into the Euxine Sea (some say, by himself) against the Amazons, from amongst whom he got Antiope his wife, which gave occasion to that sort of women to come against Athens. They sore distressed it by a Siege, till peace was made by Antiope or Hippolyta, as others called her. Some have affirmed, that he was not partaker in any Exploit with any of the Heroes of his time, except in that he helped the Lapithæ against the Centaurs. Others again contend, that hee sailed to Colchos with Jason, and assisted Meleager in killing the Boar; whence came the Proverb, Non sine Theseo: he also performed many brave things by himself, without the assistance of any, hence he came to be counted Aliter Hercules. Having contracted near friendship and alliance with Perithous the Son of Ixion, being now 50 years old, he joyned with him in stealing away Helena the daughter of Tyndareus from Sparta, and when they cast lots who should have her, she fell to him. He carried her to his Mother living at Aphidna, there to be kept till she were ripe for marriage: But having agreed that he who obtained her, should help the other to procure him a wife elsewhere, they both travelled into Epirus, to steal thence the daughter of Aidoneus King of the Molossians, whose wife was called Proserpina, and his Dog Cerberus, he himself by the Fable being named Pluto. When he understood their errand, that they came not to wooe but to steal, he laid hands on them both, and caused his Dog to devour Perithous, kept Theseus in prison, till Hercules desired he should be set at liberty.

Plutarch.

16. Whilst Theseus was absent, one Menestheus the son of Peleus (who was Grand-son to Erechtheus by his Son Orneus) incensed the people against him, and that upon the account of that change he had made in the State, which he would have them believe was intended to enslave them under pretence of liberty: and at this time came down the Tyndarida, Castor and Pollux (some think by his procurement) against Athens in behalf of their Sister. Finding that she was not there, and discovering the place of her restraint, they went to Aphidna, and taking it by force recovered her, and took Aethra the Mother of Theseus, which afterwards accompanied her as her servant to Troy, and at the taking of that Town was set at liberty by her Grand-son Demophon. By means of Menestheus, the Tyndarida were received into Athens, and great honour was done unto them, which thing contributed buted to his design. For when Theseus returned, the Citizens were so wrought upon, that in no wise would they be reconciled, and so was he forced to banish himself into the Island Scyrus, having sent away his children privately to Elpenor the son of Chalcedon into Euboea. One writeth, that sailing towards Crete to Deucalion the son of Minos (whose Sister Phadra he had married after the death of Antiope) he was driven by tempest upon Scyrus, the Inhabitants whereof receiving him with great honour for reverence of his name, Lycomedes their King, out of jealousy, made him away, having led him up to a Rock, as though to shew him the Country, and thence tumbled him down headlong.

Menestheus.

17. Menestheus then began his reign at Athens, in the dayes of Atreus King of Argos and Mycena, and some years after accompanied Agamemnon and Menelaus to the siege of Troy, with 50 ships. During the War, we hear little of nothing of him, but after the City was taken, he honoured the Funerals of Ajax the son of Telamon with a Funeral Oration, which work belonged to the Athenians to perform for those that died in the Wars; but within a while he himself afforded matter for that office, dying in the Isle Melos at his return homewards. After his death Demiophon the son of Theseus, (who together with his brother Achames, (both begotten on Phadra) followed Elphenor to Troy) went to Athens and obtained the Kingdom. As he returned, Phyllis daughter to Sihon and Queen of Thrace, fell in love with him, and wooed him for marriage. He told her he would first go to settle his affairs at Athens, and then come and marry her; but staying somewhat long, she had no patience to wait, and thinking she was slighted, hanged herself. He stole the Palladium or image of Pallas, from the Argives, who brought it from Troy, and in their return with Diomedes made encursions unwittingly into Anica, being driven by night upon Phalerus, and not knowing where they were. He reigned about 34 years, and then left his Kingdom to his son Oxyntes, who after twelve was succeeded by Aphidas his son, who reigned but one year. Then followed Thymætes the fifteenth King, who being a Bastard, is reported to have murdered Aphidas his brother, and after eight years lost the Kingdom, He was the last of the Erechthidae that reigned at Athens.

18. It hapned that the State of Athens had War with the Bæotians about Celana, a place seated in the confines of both Countries, and it pleased the parties that their Kings should decide the quarrel in their own persons. Thymætes declined the combat, and for that was deposed. Melanthius a Messenian, who was then driven from home by the Heraclidae accepted it, and overcame Xanthus the Bæotian King by a stratageme; for when they came to fight he cried out: Thou dost not justly Xanthus, but contrary to our agreement, who accompanied with another person, comest to fight against me a single man, at which he wondering, and looking back to see who should follow him, Melanthius ran him thorow with his Lance. He then reigned in the room of Thymætes, and at his death left Codrus his son his Successor; who willingly offered himself to death for the safety of his Athenians. There were now distasts arisen betwixt the Heraclidae, who held Peloponnesus, and them, for that they harboured the Iones, and other fugitives out of that Country; and at length the Heraclidae intending to make War upon them, consulted the Oracle beforehand concerning their successe, which answered, that they should have the better, if they kept off their hands from the Athenian King, and not otherwise. They gave order to their men to beware of hurting him; but he getting knowledge of the matter, disguised himself, and going into their Army, by blows provoked them to kill him. This being known, they raised their Siege, though some of them had already got into the City, on whom then the Athenians had mercy, and dismissed them without any harm. This happened 486 years after Cecrops, 114 after the destruction of Troy, 35 after the return of the Heraclidae, 293 before the first Olympiad, A. M. 2935.

SECT. 4. give the name of Archon with a diminished power to his Successor, who might be called to an account for what he did, though he kept the principality during life. This was Medon the son of Codrus, whom the rest of his brothers despising, as weak, and lame, led out Colonies of the Ionians, and some others (Attica being now full) into Asia, and there founded the 12 famous Cities of the Ionians, viz. Ephesus, Miletus, Priene, Colophon, Mysus, Teos, Lebedus, Claremena, Erythra, Phocaa, Chius in the Island Chios, and Samus in an Isle of the same name over against Ephesus, which at first being subjected to several petty Princes, at length joyned in one body politick, and became very famous in after-ages. Twelve other Archons succeeded Medon, named from him Medontida, and in this condition the state remained unaltered for 315 years, during which time there is little remarkable, either concerning Princes, or Commonwealth; onely the time of Ariphron the 19th. Archon fell in with that of Sardanapalus, and Alcmaeon the son of Æschylus was the last, who dying when he had scarce reigned two years, the people took another occasion to alter the Government; for being weary of this perpetual power of their Princes, they confined it to the space of 10 years. This change being made about the beginning of the first Olympiad, Charops was the first that underwent it, in whose time Dionysius of Halycarnassus will have Rome built. Six others succeeded him in the power thus qualified, whereof Hippomenes the fourth in order was the last of the posterity of Codrus, being deposed for his cruelty to his daughter, whom being deflowered, he shut up with an Horse that had no meat given him, and so caused to be devoured quick. The last of all the six was Eryxias, who after he had Governed six years, either died, or being deposed for some Crime, opened the Door to a new and greater innovation, after 70 years continuance of the Decennial Government.

20. The people still burning with a desire of greater liberty, abolished quite the power of a single person, and instead of him made nine Archons, to be but annual, a new Election being to be made every year out of those who for birth, wealth, or favour were most considerable in the Citie. The first in order was properly called Archon, as principal of the College, and Eponymus, because he signed the Calendar, and all things that fell out in that year were said to be done, he being Archon. He had the care of their superstition, to him it belonged to take Cognisance of differences arising about inheritances, as also betwixt Husband and Wife, Parents and their Children, and Kinsfolks one amongst another: Moreover, he took care of Orphans, and assigned them Guardians. The second in order had the name of King, who taking care also of another part of their superstition, determined causes, both Civil and Criminal, or referred them to the greater Courts of Judicature. The third was called Polemarchus, who besides the charge of some religious customs, had that of War committed to him (whence he had his name); was General of the Armies abroad, and at home the Judge of strangers. The other six were termed Thesmothes, being keepers of the Laws, or Customs, Judges in several Cases, and had power to commit to prison all suspicious persons. These were their distinct Offices. Altogether they had Authority to assemble the people, as the Kings, and other Archons in former times, and to resolve with them about publick business.

21. Such were the improvements of that liberty, which Theseus bestowed on the people: But though they seemed great, yet were they not arrived at that height as to satisfy the heady multitude offended with the too great power of the Nobler and Richer sort; and which finding it self aggrieved with the many inconveniences that arose for want of Laws (the sentence of the Magistrate, or Judge being the onely Law) many grudges and discords thence arose, which so far prevailed, as that after 50 years, power was given to one Draco, a man honest and wise, but of austere severity, to make Laws. Many he framed, reformed the Court of the Epheta, which he made to consist of 51 persons, not under 50 years of age, who were to judge of murders, and such like Crimes. But so severe were his constitutions concerning manners (judging no less than death to the least offence) that as they were by Demos said to be written in blood, so in procelle of time they grew intolerable, and little, or no relief had the poorer sort against the power of the great ones, with the usury of whom they were even exhausted: Hence grew great disturbances in the Commonwealth, the Commons hated the Nobility, and the Nobility feared the Commons; nothing but desolation seemed to attend the State, some being earnest for a Popular Government, others for an Oligarchie, and others for a middle way. These tempered, and poised the other two parties; but nothing at length seemed to avail, except all the whole power should be put into the hands of one, and a plain Tyranny erected as the only sufficient remedy for these desperate distempers. The common sort were hot for an equal division of the publick grounds now in the hands of the rich, and fit to make themselves an head, and do it by force; but the most prudent sort taking notice of Solon, now very eminent, a man of unblameable life, and unbiassed by the interest of either party; him they besought, having sufficient wisdom, to compose these differences of the distracted Commonwealth; offering him the power and command of all.

Plutarch, in Solone.

Solon.

How he became eminent.

22. A year or two before those great disturbances, hapned that which gave a rise to the eminency of Solon, and as well out of respect to the Commonwealth, as in relation to him, must be recited briefly. The Island Salamine lying not far from Athens, had of late time revolted to the Inhabitants of Megara, and for the recovery of it several attempts had been made with such bad success, that a Law was preferred whereby it was ordained Capital for any man thenceforth to move about it. Solon considering the consequence hereof, counterfeited himself mad, and going into the place of publick meeting, began, as the people came about him, to say a company of odd conceited Verses, whereby he so moved them, that they repealed the Law, and decreed another expedition against the Megarians, ordaining him their Captain therein. Solon sayling towards Colias, where the Athenian women were keeping the Feast of Ceres, sent one to the Megarians, who counterfeiting himself a fugitive should tell them, that now at this place they might easily surprize the women. This being done, he sends them away, and in their rooms and cloaths, left there a company of beardless young men, who being provided of Daggers, stabbed the Megarians when they came to seize on their prey, and so by this plot (which several Authors say was executed by Pisistratus though devised by Solon) the Athenians again recovered the Island. Solon proved it to belong to Athens, for that Phileus the son of Euryaces, and Grand-son to Ajax Telamonius, being made free of the Citie, gave it unto the Athenians; and because that such as were buried there, lay with their faces to the West, according to the Athenian custom, whereas the Megarians buried their dead in a careless manner, not regarding any such position.

23. Solon having got much credit by the success of this enterprise, procured such to be called to an account, as had been guilty of the death of Cylon. This man being famous for his victory at the Olympick Games affected the Tyranny of Athens, and endeavouring to seize on the Castel, failed therein, and fled for refuge to the image of Minerva, whence the Magistrates giving him hopes of life, took him and his companions, and notwithstanding put them to death. This now was accounted a great injury offered to the goddess, and such, as both the actors thereof, their posterity and Countrey were esteemed as contaminate, and lyable to heavy punishment. Solon perswaded them to submit to tryal, and 300 Judges were appointed out of the chiefest persons, who condemned them to banishment. Whilst this was doing the Megarians fell upon the Athenians, took Nisæa, and recovered Salamis: strange sights also appeared, whereat the Citie was affrighted, and their Prophets told them that certain Crimes were committed, which must be expiated. For this cause Epimenides a famous Philosopher (whom some reckon amongst the number of the seven wise-men in the room of Periander) was sent for out of Greece to cleanse the City; a plague having also fallen upon it at this time, as Dionysius Laertius writeth in his life. Several Altars upon this occasion he caused to be made, as amongst the rest one (y) to Contumelie (or Reproach) and another to Impudence. At (z) this time also it is thought that the Altar was erected to the unknown God, they having received no benefit by making addresses to their known ones, but present ease as soon as this Altar and a Temple of the same dedication were made and used. One (a) saith this was the Inscription: To the gods of Asia, Europe, and Africk, to gods unknown and strange; (b) another that it ran after this manner: To the gods of Asia, Europe, and Africk, to the unknown and strange god, in the singular number. But these calamities increasing publick discontents, made the assistance of Solon the more desirable.

24. He feared much to undertake so difficult a task as a settlement; and as for the Tyranny (so then it was termed) he refused it absolutely; though his friends perswaded him that by his moderation and good demeanour he might easily change this odious name into that of a Kingdom. But being elected Archon after Philombrotus, in the third year of the 46 Olympiad, some 93 years after the last change of Government, and in the dayes of Nebuchadnezzar, King of Babylon, he set himself about the work of reformation, and first of all eased the people of the great burthen of their debts, whereby they redeemed their bodies and estates; which act was in Greek called Sisychthea. Some have thought that it was onely of the interest, but others of the principal too, alleging him to have forgiven 5 (some have said 15) talents that were owing to himself. However, he made them more able to satisfy their Creditors by raising the value of money, as of the Attick Mina from 75 drachms to 100. Then for the settling of the Commonwealth; in way thereto, and in the first place he abrogated all Draco's Laws, except that against murder, as too severe. The four Tribes of the people he left as they were ordered by Erechtheus, distinguished into Souldiers, Crafts-men, Husband-men, and keepers of Goats; but for that here was no distinction made according to estates, and it concerned those that had most therein to take care of the Commonwealth, he also divided the people into four Ranks, or Classes, according to their substance, and out of the three first ordered all Magistrates to be chosen, the fourth and last having equal Votes in the great Council, or Assembly of the whole body of the State, in which lay the supreme power. The first was called Pentacosio Medimni, the second was the Ordo Equestris, the third called Zengia, and the fourth Theta. Hereby he gave a right to the common sort to elect, and call to account the Magistrates, to have an hand in making, and repealing Laws, and in the highest Court of Judicature, by which equal temper he suppressed all these factions that had lately risen. And yet, lest the multitude should be too much elevated, besides the Court of Areopagus he instituted a Senate of 400. (100 to be chosen out of each Tribe) through which all things should passe into the great Assembly, wherein nothing was to be debated, but what was offered from this Council, elected a new every year.

A Senate of 400.

25. The College of the nine Archons he left Elective as he found it; but ordained that they should not be admitted to take their Oath, till they had first in the Senate made proof of their descent, and the unblameableness of their life (especially of their duty to their Parents) and then been approved in the great Assembly, after which they were to take their Oath in the Kings Gate, to keep the Laws, and accept of no bribes; or if they should be thereof detected, then to erect at Delphos a Statue of Gold of their own bignesse: and the same Oath they were again to take as they went up to the Castle, Crowned with Myrtle. Unto them severally he assigned their Offices; for the most part as they were before, onely more certain; and for a reward of their good service, if after much, and through examination they were found upright and faithfull, they were to be chosen unto the Senate of Areopagus, the Colledge of the Archons being hereby constituted the seminary of it. To this Council, consisting of most grave, experienced, and upright men, an inspection spection was given into all concerns of State, a power of preserving the Laws and Customs, and also of reforming manners, in which particular they were so severe, that once they condemned a boy, for a custom of pulling out the eyes of Quails, as hereby betraying a bad disposition. They met ordinarily thrice a month on Mars his hill (whence the Council had it's name) but extraordinarily as occasion required, and then in the place called the Kings Gallery. As for the Council of State consisting of 400, it had power also to determine great matters and controversies of it self, and if it saw it convenient, to report them to the people. If the assent of the people was had, then passed it's acts and constitutions into firm Laws; if not, they continued in force one year, and no longer. To this Council moreover it belonged, to provide for such as were grown poor, and were to be maintained by the publick; to call all indebted to the State to an account, and provide for the making of Gallies.

The Assembly of the People.

26. To the great Assembly of the people alone belonged the power of making and nulling Lawes, of Peace and War, sending Ambassadors, and giving the freedom of the City. When they were met together they took an Oath, with a bitter execration, to consult the best they could for the good of the Commonwealth. Those that were above fifty years of age first, and, after the business was thoroughly debated, they signified their pleasure by holding up their hands. Solon ordained that all the Laws should be reviewed once a year, being recited by the Thesmotheta. But when any were to be abrogated, or new ones made, the whole Assembly took not that matter of debate upon it self; but committed it to the care of the most grave and prudent amongst them, chosen for that purpose, and called Nomotheta, amongst which none were admitted, but such as had dealt in the most important affairs. Before them five Orators (called Syndici) pleaded concerning any Law that was to be abolished, which should not be done without mature advice, lest thereby an occasion might be given to sedition and innovation; and what was concluded by these Nomotheta, the body of the people alwaies approved. The Assembly was had ordinarily thrice in 35 days, at the pleasure of the Council of State or 400; but extraordinarily upon occasion called together, either by the same authority, or the Strategi or Generals for War, and sometimes of the nine Archons.

Judicature.

27. For Courts of Judicature, besides the Areopagites formerly mentioned, there was that of the Epheta, founded, as its thought, by Demophon the Son of Theseus, consisting at first of 50 Judges chosen out of Attica, and as many from Argos; but Draco excluding the Strangers, made the number onely 51 Citizens, and after him Solon tempering the rigor thereof, transferred thence the more weighty matters to Areopagus, leaving the Judgment of casual homicide, and lying in weight for life, in some cases to it. The causes brought in thither were reported by the King or second Archon. There was another Court most large and common, consisting of 500, 1000, or sometimes 1500 persons, according to the occasion, chosen by lot out of all the Citizens of 30 years old, and upwards. They judged of many, and often, of the greatest causes; and this was called the Heliastick Council, because they sat in an open place where the Sun shone. A fourth Court there was of Arbitrators, consisting of 220 chosen out of the Tribes, and being equally divided according to the number of them, heard and determined their Causes. A fifth and least considerable there was yet, made up of thirty persons at the first, afterwards increased to forty, going in circuit to the several sorts of people gathered by Theseus into one City, heard and judged lesser matters. As for the Officers belonging to the several Courts, twelve men for imprisonment, and execution, with the Officers of the several tribes, they are scarce to be mentioned by this Work.

Particular
Laws.

28. For particular Laws. Solon knowing what a multitude of people inhabited Athens, took such care for prevention of idleness, that he absolved any son from the duty of maintaining his Father, fallen into poverty, that had not procured him to be instructed in some Trade: and the same liberty he gave gave unto such as were born of Strumpets. He made a Law whereby he gave leave to the people to make Testaments, which they never could do before; all the estates of deceased persons going to the next Heir. He forbade women to have any portions, lest marriages should be made for gain; yet succeeded they in the inheritances of their Fathers, in default of issue Male. Some things about Marriages and Adultery he decreed, which have been noted, and not unworthily, as absurd. He commanded the Court of Areopagus, to take an account of all persons how they lived, and punish those that could render none. He forbade all native fruits, except that of the Olive, to be transported out of Attica. And nothing is more memorable than this, that he deprived of all honour, and rendered infamous those, that, in a time of faction and sedition in the City, joyned themselves to neither party, concluding, that such as were concerned for the good of the Commonwealth, would according to their best apprehensions, side with such as contended for it. His Laws he exposed to publick view, that none should pretend ignorance in them. He swore the People, Magistrates, and Senate, to observe them for an hundred years, and the Archons, if they brake them, to set up a Statue at Dolphos, of their own bignesse. Then to conclude his Work, he reformed the Calender, much amiss at that time, and reduced the year into such a form as was agreeable to the motion of the Sun.

29. The work being over, there wanted not those who would both praise and discommend it. Some would be amending it by addition, others by Substraction or change, so that plainly seeing what stir would be about it, he got leave to travel for ten years; in which time he went into Aegypt, where he conversed with Amesit, and into Lydia, where he had that notable conference with Craesus, before mentioned. But while he was abroad, the City anew brake into factions. There were the Pedians headed by Lycurgus, the Paralians by Megacles, and the Diacrians by Pisistratus, one who was descended from Coarvus the last King. To the later, a company of the poorer sort joyned themselves, such as were most inveterate against the rich, and although they had not much to say against Solon's Laws, yet were they desirous of innovation, hoping to be gainers therein. Things were in this posture when Solon returned home, who being received with much honour, laboured by his authority to take off the ring-leaders of the several factions, and reconcile them. Pisistratus seemed to give ear to him, being a man of deep dissimulation, and so much apter to deceive, in that no man appeared so great a friend to equality as he, and therefore a greater Enemy to the change of the present Government. But Solon quickly found him out; yet prosecuted him not with any open malice, but sought to draw him from his designs by fair means, often professing, that no man was more inclined to Virtue, or to make a good Common-wealth's-man, if the desire of rule and sovereignty were but taken from him.

30. For all this, Pisistratus proceeded, and by his seeming readinesse to patronize the poorer sort against the rich, invaded the Tyranny. He wounded himself and his Chariot-horses, and drove into the Forum, making shew of an escape from great danger, and desired of the people that he might have a guard assigned him to defend his person. He so far prevailed, as to have fifty persons allowed him, though Solon stepping to him, told him he did not well to act Ulysses in Homer, (who, as he counterfeited himself wounded to circumvent his Enemies, so did he the same, that he might cheat his fellow Citizens) and opposed the thing as much as possible. Having obtained the liberty of so many followers, he then took leave to increase their number, and thereby got the Castle into his hands, at which the City was much startled. Solon went into the Assemblée of the people, where upbraiding them with their former stupidity, he earnestly exhorted them yet now to pluck up that tyranny by the roots, which before they might have so easily prevented, but nor at all prevailing, such consternation had seized upon men's spirits, he got him to his house, and laying his weapons before his Court-gate, said, he had discharged his duty towards his Country, and thenceforth kept himself quiet, continuing continuing in the City, though his friends moved him to flee for his life. But such a reverence bore Pisistratus not only to his person, but also to his Laws, that he retained still the most of them in their former vigour. A few he made himself, as one for maintenance of maimed Soldiers (though some attribute this also to Solon, and say, the occasion was given by one Theippus) and another against idleness, whereby he caused the ground to be more diligently tilled, and the City more quiet than usual. By these two he effectually provided for his own interest, obliging the Soldiers by the one, and by dispersing the people into the Country through the other (under pretence of preventing idleness, and keeping up tillage) cutting off from them all occasion of plotting any thing prejudicial to him. For he knew well, that as Theſeus his gathering them all up into one Town, conduced to the preservation of that liberty he meant to bestow on them, so this contrary way tended as much to the keeping up of his arbitrary power.

Expelled.

31. Being seized of the Sovereignty, he carried it exceeding well to People, Magistrates, and Laws, and much adorned the City, of which he held possession about three years. Then Megacles and Lycurgus, with their parties, so prevailed, as they banished both him and his tyranny, and being condemned, his goods were set to sale, of which none but Callias the Son of Phanippus would adventure to buy any. But not long it was, before those that cast him out, became the means of his restitution; for falling out amongst themselves, Megacles, upon promise that he would marry his daughter, covenanted to bring it about, and effected it by a strange and ridiculous wife. There was a woman in the City named Phya, almost four cubits tall, but otherwise of tolerable beauty: her being armed, curiously dressed and seated in a Chariot, they drove into the City, sending some before to proclaim, that the Athenians were to receive Pisistratus, whom their goddess Minerva esteeming above all mortals, now in her own person reduced into her Castle. This being acted with wonderful confidence, the Citizens were so far besotted, as to adore this woman for Minerva, and received Pisistratus as brought by her; whereby he recovered the tyranny about five years after his expulsion.

32. He married the daughter of Megacles, according to agreement; but having several sons already in the flower of their age; and Megacles being supposed guilty of that heinous crime about the death of Cylon, not yet expiated, lest he should put them beside their just expectations, and his family be attainted, he neglected to use her as his wife. She concealing this for some time, at length revealed it to her mother, who told it to Megacles. He took it in great disdain, and reconciled himself to his Enemies, consulting again how he might out him, which Pisistratus understanding, departed of his own accord out of Attica, and went to Eretria a City of Eubœa in the third year of the 54th Olympiad, about ten years after his restitution. Ten other years he continued in exile, at the end whereof, by the advice of his eldest Son Hippias, he laboured again for a recovery of his principallitie. Scraping together all the money he could make, he drew the Thebans and Argives into confederacy with him, and got Marathon a Town of Attica into his hands, whither flocked to him from Athens and the Country round about those of his Faction. He marched then against the City, and put such to flight as came out against him, but fearing they might rally again, he gave order to his Sons to ride after and bid them fear nothing, so they would but get them to their own homes, and be quiet. Thus recovered he the tyranny once more, which then he laboured to establish, not by the shedding of blood (from which he wholly abstained, and therefore hath the best report of any of his condition) but by seeking confederates, making himself a considerable renew, and taking the Sons of those his Enemies, that remained in the City, for Hostages, sending them into the Isle Naxos to be kept. Not long after his restitution he died (for his whole reign including the exile amounted but to 33 years) about the time that Cræsus King of Lydia was overthrown by A. M. 3460. Cyrus, in the second year of the 57th Olympiad, and the 3460th year of the World.

SECT. 5.

23. This onely could be reprehended in Pisistratus, that he had cast the yoke upon his Countrey. For such an one it was as had no great weight in it, more than what lay in the minds of the Athenians, not accustom'd since the dayes of Theseus to stoop to Sovereignty. Though he commanded them to apply themselves to husbandry (contrary to what Theseus had done, who gathered them out of the Countrey into the City) that he might take them off from plotting against him, yet required he no other Tribute than the Tenth of their profit, which had wont to be payed to the former Kings. He killed no man, neither banished any; he made spoil of no mans fortune, or estate, injured none by any contumelious demeanour, abused neither the one Sex nor the other through any libidinous carriage. The Laws of Solon with the order of Magistrates he left as he found; and though he had most cause to be averse to him, yet detained he him in Town when he would have been gone, desiring his counsel and advice for the better Government of the Commonwealth, contenting himself onely in having a power greater than the Laws, in which respect Cicero was wont to call Julius Caesar, who trode in his steps, by the name of Pisistratus. He was as learned as any in his time, & deserved very well of learning, being the first that erected a publick Library. Whereas Homer's Verses before this were scattered abroad and confus'd, he purchased with Gold whatsoever of his works he could come by, and setting on work the ablest Grammarians, put them into that order of Iliads and Odysses, in which they are now found; to which work Solon is said to have contributed his diligence. He had two sons, Hippias and Hipparchus, to whom he left the principality of Athens. They for many years reigned, as lovingly betwixt themselves, so with moderation towards their subjects, till the younger being slain by Harmodius and Aristogiton, upon occasion of some injury suppos'd to be offer'd by him to the sister of Harmodius, the other exasperated hereat grew severe towards the Athenians, and for that was expelled by them four years after his brothers death, and his Tyranny was utterly subverted. But these things falling in with the reign of Darius, the son of Hystaspes, belong properly to another place.

SECT. V.

The most antient Kingdom and Commonwealth of Lacedæmon.

The first inhabitants of Lacedæmon.

1. THis Countrey was most antiently inhabited by a people called (a) Leleges, so named from Lelex their King, said to be an indigena, or a natural of the place, because it was obscure from what Countrey he, and his people came. From him this Region was called Lelegia, and Lelegis. He left two sons, Myles and Polycaon, whereof the former succeeded him in his Kingdom, and the later marrying Messene, the daughter of Tryopas King of Argos, went, and subdued that Countrey, which from her he named Messenia. Myles was succeeded by his son Eurotas, who perceiving the water to stand in the grounds, drew a Ditch from it to the Sea, which draining the earth, continued to be a River, bearing his name. He, dying without issue-Male, left his Kingdom to Lacedæmon, the son of Jupiter, and Taygeta, from which woman the Mount Taygetus took its name. For Lacedæmon married Sparte, the daughter of Eurotas, and when he came first to the Kingdom named the Countrey from himself, and to the Citie which he built gave his wives name; it being ever after most properly called Sparta, when any distinction was made betwixt Countrey and Citie; although it be also sometimes read Lacedæmon, as in (b) Thucydides, and Latine (c) Authors. As for the Inhabitants of both places, those of the Citie are by Herodotus, Xenophon, and Diodorus called Spartians, in opposition to those that lived up and down in the Countrey, comprehended under the name of Lacedæmonians.

The Citie was built in the dayes of Crotopus, King of Argos, and Amphytrion of Athens, 303 years before the destruction of Troy, 711 before the first Olympiad. A. M. 2518. SECT. 5.

2. Amyclas the son, and Successor of Lacedæmon (d) begit three sons, which (d) Pausan. ut are recorded; Argalus, Cynortas, and Hyacinthus, of which the later, as supra. Apollodorus writeth, being for his beauty the delight of Apollo, was killed by him at unawares, when they were at play. Argalus succeeded his father, and left his Kingdom to his brother Cynortas, whose son and Successor was Oebalus, from whence the Countrey was also called * Oebalia, and Castor and * Servius ad Pollux, by Stacius, Oebalida fraires. On his first wife he begit Hippocoon, Georg. 4. and Icarion, and on his second Gorgophone (the daughter of Perseus by Andromeda, and widdow of Perieres) his son Tyndareus. The former and later after his death, contended about the succession, and Tyndareus having the worst of it, was constrained to banish himself for many years, till at length he was restored by Hercules (who slew Hippocoon and his ten sons, with a great number of the Spartans) but on this condition delivered was the Kingdom to him, to keep it for Hercules his own Children, and restore it when it should be demanded. Tyndareus of Leda, the daughter of Thestius an Ætolian, begit Castor and Pollux (called Dioscuri, as the supposed off-spring of Jupiter) and on her, or some other, a daughter named Helena. The two sons being famous in their lives, grew more renowned after their death, having the esteem of gods, and from them was named the constellation of Gemini. Helena was she that made such a broil in the World, being first stolne by Theseus, afterwards married to Menelaus, and from him stolne again by Paris, who kept her till the destruction of Troy, as hath been shewed. Her two brothers dying before their father, Menelaus with her obtained the Kingdom of Lacedæmon, through the special favour of Tyndareus, who from amongst 29 suitors, (all Princes of Greece) made choice of him. Lest those great ones should fall out amongst themselves, he bound them all with an Oath to be Defendants to whomsoever he would give her; which he did by the advice of Ulysses, upon promise to assist him in his suite being one of the number. This we do not find that he did; but in way of requital procured for him Penelope, the daughter of Icarion. A. M. 1809.

3. Menelaus on a slave begot two base sons; but by Helena had onely a daughter named Hermione, which he married first to Orestes, the son of his brother Agamemnon, and again taking her from him, gave her to Pyrrhus the son of Achilles. It's thought that Orestes killed Pyrrhus; for after his death he presently resumed his wife, and Menelaus once dead, he added the Kingdom of Lacedæmon to his other two of Mycena and Argos; for the Lacedæmonians were more willing to receive him as their Prince, than Nicostratus and Megapenthes the bastard sons of Menelaus. Tisamenus his son succeeded him in his Kingdoms, out of all which he was outed by the Heraclida, or posterity of Hercules, as before was shewed, by the help of the Dores; with him the Achaans being also banished, who were Originally of Pthion in Thessaly; for Achaus their Progenitor was the son of Xuthus, Grand-son to Deucalion by his son Hellen. Argos fell to Temenus by lot; A. M. 1901. Crespantes got Messene; and Lacedæmon became the portion of Procles and Eurysthenes the sons of Aristodemus, who was slain at Delphos (for Pausanias judgeth this the most probable opinion) by the fraud of Pylas, when they were preparing for the expedition. Thenceforth the Lacedæmonians were accounted Dores; who, if formerly they were part of the Achaans, and going to Troy, at their return were expelled by those that remained at home, and so forced to seek out new seats, and received the name of Dores from their Captain, as Plato writeth; then had they full as much right to the Countrey as the Heraclida themselves, the title of whom we have formerly shewn. This change hapned 80 years after the destruction of Troy, as Thucydides gathereth; 327 before the first Olympiad, in the dayes of Melancthus, father to Codrus the last King of Athens, the year of the World 2901.

like, as their mother not knowing them asunder, was ignorant which was the eldest, and therefore the Lacedæmonians made them both Kings with equal power: onely because *Eurysthene*s was first washed and fed, he was vulgarly accounted the elder; and though their families were of the same dignity, yet was his accounted something the more honourable. In their minority Theras their Uncle by the Mother's side managed the Kingdom for them, in obeying whom they ever agreed; but in nothing else, though Twins, and so like one another. This difference was in a manner propagated to their posterity, which continued on both sides for many Generations downwards by the names of Eurystheneida and Proclide, and being partakers in what is commonly accounted to bear no corivals, no wonder it is that emulation should be continued, but much that for so long it kept within the bounds of civil concord. After these two followed their two sons: Agis for *Eurysthene*s (from whom the Kings of this family were also called Agida) and Sous for Procles. In their time it hapned that the Inhabitants of Helos (a Town built by Helius the youngest son of Persus) were made slaves (both they and their posterity) to the Lacedæmonian State; for whereas they as well as others had formerly the freedom of the Citie, and were Members of the Commonwealth, Agis took away that privilege, and ordered them to pay Tribute to Sparta, which refusing to do, &c. standing out, they were thus punished; all other slaves to that State, though of what Original soever, being called after them Helots. Agis dying, was succeeded by Echestratus his son; and Sous some years after, left for his Successor his son Eurytion (called otherwise Eurypon, and Euryphon) from whom the Kings of that family were also named Eurytionida. Echestratus was followed by Labotas his son, and Eurytion by Prytanis, in whose reign the first quarrel arose betwixt the Lacedæmonians and Argives: Labotas being dead, Doryssus his son succeeded him the Kingdom, and in like manner after the death of Prytanis, Ennomus his son continued the succession of that family.

5. After Doryssus followed Agelilaus, Ennomus of the family of Procles still continuing, who of a former wife begat Polydectes, and of a later Lycurgus born 150 years before the first Olympiad. Archelaus, the son of Agelilaus succeeded his father, and was accompanied in the Government by Polydectes, who dying without issue left his inheritance to Lycurgus his brother. Lycurgus then governed as King, but not long after his brothers wife proved to be with Child. She sent to acquaint him therewith, and to tell him, that if he would marry her she would make away the infant. He desisting from his heart such Villany, yet returned her no denial, but desired her not to practice any thing upon her self whereby she might come in danger, for when the Child was once born he would take care for the destruction of it: and by this deceit he drew her on till the time of her Travel. When that came he sent some to observe her, with command, if it were a Girl to deliver it to the women, but if a Boy, to bring it strait unto him. As he was supping with the Magistrates, a Boy was born and brought to him, who taking him in his arms, told the Spartans that there was their King, and presently put him in the Royal seat. And, because all men wonderfully rejoyced at so strange a thing, admiring his Magnanimity and Justice, he gave to the Child the name of Charilaus.

Tutor to Charilaus.

6. Then as Tutor to this his young Nephew, he managed publick affairs for some eight moneths; but there wanted not those of the Queens kindred (especially her brother) who reproached him to his face, as intending no good to the Child, which she also now stuck not to say, incensed by his repulse in the matter of marriage. He took this in very ill part, and fearing that some inconvenience might follow these suspitions that were begotten by his adversaries in the breasts of several persons, resolved to cut them off by Travel, wherein he purposed to continue so long, till his brothers son should come to maturity, and had begotten an Heir for his Kingdom. He went first unto Crete, where he made observations of the Laws and Customs of that Commonwealth instituted by Minos (which afterwards he made his pattern) and and whence he sent Thaletas an Eminent Lyrick Poet of those times, by his charming Verses to stir up the Lacedæmonians to Love and Unity. From Crete he passed over into Asia (that he might compare the luxury thereof with the Cretean severity, and as good Phylick make up a temper out of both) where he found Homer's Verses, kept as it seemeth by the Sons of Crocophylus (the Poet being dead not above thirty years before) which he then copied out, and bringing them home, first made them publick in Greece, though in great disorder; in which they continued till the dayes of Pisistratus. The Egyptians reported that he came down into their Countrey, and there learnt the distinction of Military men from Artificers, and those of other callings. But whilest he thus improved himself abroad; he was much wanted at home; and often earnestly sollicitied to return, by all parties.

7. For great need there was of his presence to heal the distempers into which the State was now fall'n, the heady multitude having by its desire of loose liberty brought all things into confusion. The first Government till the coming in of the Heraclidae, for any thing that can be found, was meerly absolute, and afterwards we do not find that the Regal power was diminished, till Eurypon, or Eurytion most imprudently let loose the reigns of Government. This gave occasion to the Rabble to fly high in disobedience, and contest with his Successors when they endeavoured the recovery of their old Authority. Many great tumults and seditions were hence raised, insomuch that Ennomus the Grand-son of Eurypon, father of Lycurgus, and fifth from Procles, was murdered in one of them with a butchers knife. These distempers increasing, and the Kings not being strong enough to rule the dissolute Rabble, nothing but absolute ruin and destruction was expected, when Lycurgus returning home (of whose prudence and integrity they had had formerly large demonstrations) alone seemed able to give any hope of better things.

Plutarch.

At his return
he anew mo-dell'd the State.

8. He thought this opportunity was not to be neglected, now that all were in so good a mind, and resolved to use his utmost endeavour for an alteration. Herein this was the scope he aimed at, to make Provision for equality, which he thought to be the best Nurse of Concord, and the Bulwark of all societies. To accustom the People from their tender years to obey the Laws and Magistrates, and hereby to render them more inclinable to live justly and frugally, to bridle all corrupt affections, endure labour and hardship, refuse no danger for the publick good, nor dearth it self if the case required. Having therefore a design to make a full evacuation of all bad humours, as he accounted them, and knowing how full of difficulty and danger this might prove to the body polittick, mens minds much loathing so violent a Purgation, he considered that they were apt to be led by a shew of Religion, and having learnt how Minos pretended to have received his Laws from Jupiter, with whom he conversed in a Cave, he resolved to go to Delphos, and make use of that Oracle to the same advantage. There was he received with encouraging words, saluted, Beloved of the gods a god, rather than a man, and received in an Oracle the frame of a Commonwealth, which bringing home, he called Rhetra to gain the more Authority to it. At his return he first consulted with his intimate friends, and drew others on by degrees, till having made a party he ordered thirty principal persons to go Armed into the Market-place betimes in the morning, that they might thereby strike a terrour into their Adversaries. Charilaus at this much affrighted, as thinking it some plot against himself, fled to Chalcicum (the Temple of Minerva much spoken of) where he took Sanctuary; but understanding how things were, came forth and joyned himself to his Uncle, being of a most sweet and mild disposition.

9. The Rhetra according to which he framed his Model was of this renour. Let him build a Temple of Jupiter Syllanius and Minerva Syllania: Let him divide the People into Phylæ and Obæ, ordain thirty

SECT. 5. Senators, with the Archagetræ: then let him call together the People betwixt Babyces and Cnacion, so let him propose concerning matters, or null them. Gamodan, Gorian, &c. In these words of the Oracle, saith Plutarch, Oba, and Phyla (that is Tribes) signifie certain parts, into which the People was to be divided: the Kings are called Archagetræ, as Captains: and to assemble the People, is in Greek expressed by apollazein, for that he attributed the beginning and cause of the Commonwealth to Apollo Pythius. Babyces and Cnacion is at this day called Oenans. Aristotle writeth, that Cnacion is the name of the River, and Babyces of the Bridge. In the middle betwixt these the Concio was assembled, though there was neither Gallery nor any other accommodation, because he thought, that those things conduced nothing to Council, but rather hindred, for that Statues, Pictures, the attiring Rooms of Theatres, and withdrawing-rooms of the Court, being too curiously adorned, made those that met light and vain, diverting them with toys and idle thoughts. The multitude being assembled into one place, power was not granted no any of the People to propose: they could onely enact what the Senators and Kings had propounded. But in after times the common People perverting and wresting their suffrages, Polydorus and Theopompus then Kings, added this to the Rherra: But if the people resolve upon any bad thing, let it be lawfull for the Senators and Kings to dissent; that is, saith Plutarch, let them not ratifie it, but forthwith dismisse the Assembly; seeing the People depraveth the Decree, and altereth what is best. As for Gamodan and Gorian, Plutarch doth not interpret them, and it cannot be understood what they mean. Another Rherra was this; that they should use no written Laws: another concerning expences, commanded, that the roof of every house should be made with Axe onely, and the doors with a Saw: and a third ordained, that War should not be often made upon the same Enemies: lest learning to defend themselves, they should thereby be made warlike: which afterwards was laid to the charge of Agessians in behalf of the Thebans.

The Kings.

10. Having prepared all things for his purpose, he dissolved the Government of his forefathers. For though he left two Kings as he found, with the same right of succession, yet took he away almost their whole power, instituting a Senate to restrain them, and be an equal poise betwixt them and the People, to reduce both parties into order. Without the Authority of this Senate the Kings could not decree nor undertake any thing of consequence. He ordered they should sit in the chiefest places as Members of the Senate, first speak their minds, and give their suffrages; but conclude nothing without consent of the Major part. All Magistrates, till the impudent Ephori took so much upon themselves rose up to, and did them reverence. Their employment was to take care of Sacrifices, to command the Pythii, whereof two constantly attended them, to be sent to consult the Oracle of Apollo Pythius at Delphos; they took care of Ambassadors and other Strangers, of the causes of women that were Heirs; adoptious also they had charge of, so as none could be made without them. They gave answer to Ambassadors, and looked to the repairing of high-ways. This was their condition at home, which amounting to no more than titular Royalty, after that the present Kings had either given away their just right (as Plutarch telleth us, that Charilans joyned with his Uncle) or were deprived of it by the treason and violence of Lycurgus and his party; the attempt of some men is as ridiculous as seditious, who taking it for granted that the Popular Villains, the Ephori, were 120 years after this set up by the People to restrain the Kings (which yet cannot be granted, though most have so thought) thence would draw a precedent to the disadvantage of true Royal Majesty. For these Kings were not real Kings as to Prerogatives of Majesty, being scarcely so much as a Duke of Venice.

Abroad they were the Generals of Armies, which were left to their ordering, or disposal; so as no Council of War, or any in Commission could thwart their Commands; they onely receiving orders from the State, for their expeditions and returns. They had Judges to accompany them, a General of the Horse, four Polemarchi, besides Colonels, and other inferiour Officers, whose advice, as well as help, in the War they might use, but were at their own disposal, and obnoxious to none of them. And what is here spoken of a King, is to be extended to his Protector, Guardian, or Tutor in his minority, by the Lacedæmonians called Prodicus. Such were chosen to this trust and charge, as were nearest of kin by the father's side, to the Orphans, and consequently the next Heirs, that whose was the hope, his also might be the burthen. This appeareth by several examples of Lycurgus himself, Aristodemus, and Pausanius, to be related in their due places; which though it be not admitted in other Commonwealths, and perhaps with good reason, yet these Prodicti having all in their power, scarcely ever any of them was found to have plaid false, or, by treachery towards their Pupills, gone about to make way for their own preferment.

The Senate.

12. The Senate consisted of 28 persons, besides the Kings, not under 60 years of age. The first were such as had assisted Lycurgus, and been helpfull to him in the settlement, whom he ordered to continue for life, except they committed any offence worthy of seclusion, conceiving it not safe for this his Commonwealth, to have a frequent change of Senators, which the Kings might improve to their own interest. Into this second rank of dignity, were none to be admitted, but such as had well deserved of the State by good Service or eminent virtue; that so it might be a reward to old men, and an encouragement to the younger sort, to be conformable to the Laws. They had in effect the whole executive power in their hands. They had the Supreme power of Judicature, wherein they proceeded not rashly, but with great advice and delay, deferring judgement most commonly for some dayes, till they had heard both parties, and received the testimonies of witnesses: yet it was lawfull afterwards to appeal from them to the people. They were not liable to be called to an account for whatsoever they did; which immunity, as exceeding the moderation of a Commonwealth, (together with their suing to the people for their places, whereas able and honest men should be sought for) amongst other things is taxed by Aristotle.

13. A Reverend and most Learned man observeth, that whatever the Kings lost, the People got little by the alteration; being left out of all employment in affairs of State, and forced to yield obedience unto thirty Masters, whereas before they had but two. For the Kings and Senate assembled, and dismissed them when they pleased, and propounded to them what they thought convenient. For the People so assembled it was not lawfull to propound any thing to be debated or determined, nor to deliver their opinion in the point propounded: there being nothing left to them but to testify their assent to the Propositions made, either by the Kings or Senate. But the cunning flattery of the Ephori in after times much enlarged the power of the People. By the appointment of Lycurgus it met at the River Cnacion (afterwards called Oenuns) by the Bridge Babycas. Sometimes onely the Spartans, or Inhabitants of the Citie met together, and then it was called the Lesser Assembly; but otherwhiles the whole body of the Lacedæmonians gathered together out of all Laconia, that was free of the Commonwealth, which went by the name of Greater Meeting or Assembly, called then simply Ecclesia.

An equality of possessions.

14. Having reduced the Government to this Antimonarchical passe, he rightly judged it could not subsist without levelling. He therefore attempted a thing most difficult, and even beyond all hope of attaining. Many that had got much wealth in the late turbulent times, he perswaded to part with most of it, and to an equal division of the grounds, urging, that no inequality was to be amongst them, but what vice and virtue made; and what by arguments drawn from convenience, as others from necessity that lay upon them from the indigent and displeased multitude, he brought his design to perfection.

Plutarch. in vita Lycurgi. Et in Compar. Lycurgi & Numa. Et in Agide & alibi.

SECT. 5. tion. Then divided he the grounds into 30000 lots, or equal portions, whereof 9000 he laid to the Citie of Sparta it self, (the number of Citizens amounting to so many) and distributed the rest to the other Lacedæmonians inhabiting the Countrey. Each portion contained so much as to maintain a family in a frugal way, and no more. To the Kings a larger quantity was assigned for the mainenance of their degree, so much as might serve with moderation, and not make them abound in riches.

Iron money.

15. That he might take away coverousnesse, and the desire of hoarding up wealth, he forbade the use of Silver and Gold Coin, putting in the room thereof Iron money, of which a great quantity amounting but to little value, no considerable payment could be made, without the help of an Horse or Waggon. Hereby it came to passe, that they were unfit to Traffick with other people, no Merchandize being imported, which he herein aimed at, as well as by another Law made expressly against the continuance of strangers in the Citie; fearing more the contagion of the mind in his people than that of the body. And eitherwayes to prevent Luxury, he forbade that any man should eat at home by himself, or with his family, or to make any private feasts, without some special occasion; but ordered them to sup together in common, without any distinction of Dignity or Fortune, by fifteen together. Each one sent in his Provision monethly; as Meal, Wine, Cheese, and Figs, with a little money to buy other victuals. If any had killed Venison, or offered Sacrifice, whereby any flesh was gotten, the ancient men left that to the younger sort, and contented themselves with Broaths, of which a black sort was most used, of no pleasant taste to such as were not accustomed to eat it. As for fish, and all kinds of delicate acates, they were utterly forbidden. None were to eat or drink beyond such a proportion as sufficed nature: the Kings indeed were allowed a double Messe, but this was, that they might have opportunity to pleasure and countenance others with part of it. All came to these publick meetings (which first were called Andria after the name of those of the Cretians, from whom Lycurgus borrowed this constitution, afterwards Phyditia and Sysitia) with their Arms, and after Supper were to go home without Torch or Candle, though never so dark, that they might learn, if need should be, to make the same shift when they lay abroad in the field. All stately buildings he forbade, and all Trades that tended any way to the mainenance of Luxury or Excesse.

16. But to have these customes durable, it being highly necessary to breed up the youth in suitable Discipline, he also provided for that in ample manner. The first thing previous to education was very unnatural and cruel; for the Infant as soon as born, was carried to the most antient of that Tribe to be viewed; and if it was found any way deformed, weak, or sickly, whereby might be judged that it would rather prove burthensom than beneficial to the Commonwealth, then was it to be exposed upon the craggy places of the Hill Taygetus, there to take such quarter as wild beasts, fowls, hunger, and cold would afford it. But if it seemed strong, lusty, and worthy to live, then was it restored to its Parents to be nursed. And nursed it was very harshly, not used to any delicate, or costly feeding, and so used to darknesse and solitarinesse as not to be afrighted at them. When the Children were seven years old they were not committed to any mercenary School-masters, after the custom of other people, but to the care of the publick, being distributed into several Companies, over which some that were most fierce, hardy, and prudent amongst them were set as Captains, who governed them in their sports and exercises, and to whose correction they submitted. There were also most commonly some men present at their exercises, who would rebuke and chastice them, observing which had the most notable spirits; Lycurgus leaving it in charge to the Lacedæmonians to take care of other mens Children as of their own. All manner of wayes were they inured to labour and pains. Their hair was cut close to their heads, they went bare-footed from their Infancy, fought with one another naked, with as much earnestnesse as might be, and after a certain barbarous and cruel manner, were once a year whipped at the Altar of Diana Iaurica, (to which goddess sacrifice could not be offered without man's blood) till the blood ran down in great abundance, their Parents beholding the sight. They would bear it with admirable patience and emulation, cheerfully, (nay, many times with great delight which they took in excelling one another in patience) enduring the strokes unto death itself.

17. When they were past their Childhood, at twelve years of age, their labours and exercises were but increased, lest vice together with years should grow upon them. They were to be content with one Coat, both Winter and Summer, and slept by Companies together upon coarse, and uneasy beds. The ancient men also oversaw them upon occasion, but the charge was committed to one of the principal, called thence Pedonomus, who had power to gather them together and correct them. Over several companies certain young men of twenty years of age, called Irens, were set, who, if no men were present, had command over them, exercised them in watches, lying in ambush, and other crafts of War, wherein if any were caught they were severely punished to make them the more wary for the future; as also if they were taken in theft, stealing with them being lawfull, and encouraged as an exercise for War, but to be surprized therein was punishable. The same Irens supping with them would make some sing, and others propose questions, in answering which they exercised their wits, accustoming them to make a short, clear, and witty answer, in the dexterity whereof the Lacedæmonians excelled all others; Orators with their long-winded speeches being utterly forbidden. When the Iren corrected them, there were men standing by to take notice of it, and if it was not rightly done, nor upon good grounds, he had the same punishment inflicted on him. Those boys performed several sorts of exercises; but amongst the rest those called Platanista (from the place thick set with plain Trees) were most eminent, in which with hands and feet, teeth, and nails, they fought in good earnest, to the putting out of eyes, and sometimes to the danger of life itself, none giving over, or shrinking one jot, than which no disgrace was esteemed more hainous. Such strict, and constant discipline underwent they all their minority, till they arrived at 20 years of age (before which time they married not, went not out to war, neither exercised any Office) so that the greatest trouble in the field afterwards seemed much more easie to be undergone.

18. The education also of young women was agreeable to this of the other Sex, that by vigilancy, industry, and enduring labour, they might be furnished with courage and resolution against all evils, being married with more ease undergo the pains of Travel, and bring forth Children of the same constitution. According to their age they had exercises of sundry sorts; most of which they performed in publick, naked, and that not onely in the sight of Kings and Senate, but the young men also; which yet because of the Lacæmonick modesty and temperance, with the custom of it, was not judged at all to contribute to vice, but rather to an innocent, and harmlesse emulation, and honest love. Their diet was such as might nourish them, and not any ill disposition in them. Such were their Cloaths, and all things else about them, as long as Lycurgus his constitutions were in force; and therefore the too great power of the women, their Luxury, and the many great inconveniences that thence arose to the State, objected so much by Aristotle, is to be ascribed to the married sort; & probable it is that this corruption crept in, in after-times, it being well nigh as easie for him to reform the women as to make this great alteration in the Commonwealth, though the contrary be asserted by the Philosopher, who as it seemeth was much satisfied in the wilfulness of that Sex. The set time for marriage of men was at 30. for women at 20 years, before which it was unlawfull; but if a man within some reasonable time after, be took him not to that estate, he was publickly disgraced by command of the Law-giver. Women had no portions; yet the Heirs carried with them their father's inheritance. No plurality of wives did he allow; and yet as for adultery it was not heard of in that Citie, against which neither did he make any Law, having already provided sufficiently against it by such strict constitutions.

The Cryptia.

19. As he provided against the flocking of strangers to Sparta, so he forbade any Citizen, or Member of the Commonwealth to Travel, (except in any expedition of War) lest he should bring home with him the dissolute and effeminate customs of other places. Merchandizing was esteemed a base employment, as merely practiced for getting of wealth. Drunkenness they rendered more abominable to Children by making their slaves drunk, that then they might behold them in that beastly condition. He that had been so unthrifty as not to be able to bear the charge of the Phiditia was excluded from all trust in the Commonwealth. To keep them vigilant, he commanded that the City should not be walled, they having sufficient leisure to look carefully to it: this being even their whole calling, with their heads and hands to attend publick affairs; the drudgery of Tilling their grounds, and gathering their fruits, being imposed upon the Hilota, or publick slaves, with other servile and Mechanick affairs. Those slaves it was not lawfull for any one privately to manumit, or sell out of Laconia, whereby increasing to so great a number, that they equalized, or exceeded that of their masters, they sometimes afforded occasion of great danger; upon which account this constitution is taxed by the Philosopher. For the lessening of their numbers a course was taken not altogether clear from a note of cruelty: Certain young men being sent about into the Countrey, who lying hid in the day time (whence this practice was called Cryptia) by night killed as many of them as they could light on.

20. Such was the form of the Commonwealth instituted by Lycurgus, which saved him the labour of erecting any other Courts of Justice than what have been already mentioned. For Gold and Silver being taken away, and the use thereof forbidden upon pain of death, controversies and suits most commonly thence arising naturally fell of themselves. He forbade his Laws to be written in Tables, because he would have them rooted in the minds of the people, to which he thought the strict Discipline he erected might sufficiently conduce. After the thing was done, as it hath hapned usually in this kind, he was but ill rewarded; for such as had parted with their Silver, Gold, or Luxury, were so enraged as to throw stones at him, which to shun he was glad to betake himself to his heels, and looking back had an eye struck out by one Arcander, who yet afterwards repented him of the deed, and was very observant of him. * One telleth us he was cast out by publick rage; but he who hath handled the subject of his life with greatest industry, hath recorded, that when things began to be settled, and he saw the Commonwealth thus constituted able to support it self, he calling the people together, told them, that indeed all things were so already settled as to provide for virtue and happiness, but one thing, and that of greatest consequence was yet behind, which was not to be enacted before first he had consulted the Oracle at Delphos. Wherefore he desired them to keep the Laws already made, and change nothing in them till his return with such answer as the Oracle would give him. All consenting, he took an Oath of the King's, Senate, and people, and began his journey. At Delphos he enquired whether the Laws already made, and established, were not sufficient for the virtue and safety of the State. It was answered they were, and that it should continue most glorious so long as it would stand to them. This answer then he sent to Sparta, but, resolving never to loose them from their Oath, he there made an end of himself by abstaining from all sustenance. Some have said that he died in Crete, and that he ordered his body to be burnt, and the ashes thrown into the Sea, lest his Relicks being brought back to Sparta, they should account themselves freed from the Oath. But * Tertullian writeth, that he famished himself, because the Lacedæmonians went about to alter his Laws.

presently set at liberty, upon his oath never to fight more against them, which he but ill performed. After this they overthrew divers Cities, on which the Acheans had seized, some whereof made their peace, as Pausanias telleth us, and departed out of Peloponnesus. The Colleague of Charilaus (or Charillus) for some time was Teleclus, whose death gave one occasion to the famous Messenian War. Charilaus was succeeded by Nicander his Son, and Teleclus by Alcamenes. In * the 34th year of Nicander, was celebrated the first Olympiad, after the restitution of those Games by Iphitus, in which Corabus a Cook of Elis got the Prize in the Course. These solemnities being of so great consequence in the knowledge of times, must not be passed over without some observation.

The renewing of the Olympick Games.

22. These exercises had in former times been held by divers others, as Hercules (both the Idean and the son of Amphytrion, as some think) Pelops, Endymion, Nelus, Pelias, Lycurgus, and others. After the descent of the Heraclide into Peloponnesus, Oxyus the Æolian also (who as we said, was chosen their guide, and according to agreement, had the Country of Elis given to him) renewed the Games; but they were interrupted as formerly, or seldom observed, for about 300 years, till Iphitus the son of Praxonidas, and Nephew of Hæmon, descended from him, and one of his Successors, again restored them; after which they never intermitted, but were kept up for many generations. But the occasion of the last restitution was this. Greece being almost ruined by seditions and pestilence, Iphitus inquired of the Oracle at Delphos, how those evils might be redressed: and it was answered, that it was expedient for him and the Eleans to restore the Olympick Games, whereupon he proclaimed them, and for the better celebration of them, procured a Truce to be made. The place whence they had their name was Olympia, a City situated in the territories of the Piseans, upon the River Alpheus, upon which account the Piseans contended a long time with the Eleans about their interest in them. There was a Temple dedicated to Jupiter Olympius, and a place for races and all sorts of exercises, filled with many goodly buildings which resembled another City. Near to the Town was also a place where the Eleans sat and judged of the controversies arising about Victories, to which Crowns were given. As long as the Eleans continued under a Monarchical Government, their Prince, of the posterity of Oxyus, was sole Judge; but afterwards there were two, chosen by the votes of the people, which were after increased to the number nine, then to ten, and last of all to twelve. This Solemnity was held once every fifth year beginning, so that from the commencing of one to the beginning of another, passed four entire years, by some mistaken for five, because of the commencement of the Games. The time was at the full of the Moon, the change whereof immediately preceded the Summer solstice, in the month by them called Hecatombaon.

23. Upon this occasion meetings and consultations were had, concerning the affairs of all Greece, besides the Inhabitants of which, many flocked from other Countries. Care was here taken concerning the form of the year, for the intercalation of a day at the end of every fourth. Charge was given to the Priests of the Temple, to take notice of every new Moon, especially of that wherewith the month Hecatombaon began, and to proclaim it: they were also not onely to register the names of the Victors in the several sorts of Games, with other things that concerned them, but also whatsoever memorable thing occurred in the intervals. The account of time henceforth never failed, and the affairs of Greece, and other Countries, were known in a most certain order. And here the second interval of time amongst three reckoned by * Varro, received it's period. The first began with the beginning of things, and ended at the Deluge, called by him unknown; the second began where the first ended, and concluded with this restitution of the Olympiads, which he termed Fabulous, because the storie thereof is mixed with Fables; and the third commencing with the first Olympiad, reached to his own time, which he name Historical, for that things done therein, were truly and War was drawn out in length, the Kings because they were employed abroad, chose some of their friends to administer Justice, whom they left as their Deputies over the people: and those were called Ephori from their inspection. Being at first no other than Assistants to the Kings, by little and little they assumed power to themselves, and, no body aware of it, constituted a peculiar Office. Hereof, he said, a sign remained at that day, for that the King being called by the Ephori, refused to come once, and again; but at the third call came to them: besides, Asteropus, who first enlarged the bounds of this Office, was Ephorus many ages after.

Their power.

26. The power of those Magistrates, for what end soever constituted (as of others in other places) was moderate at the first, but in proceſſe of time, as the ambition of them, and the confidence of the people thereupon increased, it exceeded the due and just bounds, and made the Government almost degenerate into a Democracy. They not onely consulted with the Kings and Senate, resolved about the affaires of State, and judged of controversies amongst the people; but afterwards grappled even the whole power into their hands, doing all things themselves that were of moment. They governed the Assemblies of the people, proposing and gathering suffrages, they made and disannulled leagues, ordered what forces were to be sent out, for which they also made provision, they rewarded or punished, according to their pleasure, other Magistrates, calling the very * Kings to account for their lives; insomuch that, as the Philosopher observeth, they obtained a kind of tyranny: the onely remedy was, that their Office was but annual, and being five in number, the designs and indeavours of one or two, were crossed and overthrown by the contrary party, nothing being done without the consent of the whole College. They rose not up, as other Magistrates, in presence of the Kings, with whom they mutually sware every moneth; the Kings that they would rule according to the Laws, and they in the name of the people to preserve their rule thus ordered, safe and entire to them. With their entering into their Office, the year began (constantly in Winter, as we learn from Thucydides) and from one of them as principal, the year was named (who thence was called Eponymus,) as from the Archon at Athens. At their first entrance they were wont to publish an Edict, that the men should take off all the hayr from their upper lips, and observe strictly all the Laws, lest they should be constrained to punish them, requiring obedience in a little, thereby to inure the people to it. In the Wars two of them used to go out with the Kings, to assist them in their Councils. They were wont to proclame open war against the publick slaves or Helots, giving liberty to kill them, and thence is to be derived that cruel custom of the Cryptia, rather than from any constitution of Lycurgus, as Aristotle thinketh. The cause thereof, as Plutarch judgeth, was the conspiring of these slaves against their Masters, during the Messenian War.

The Messenian
War.

27. In the second year of the ninth Olympiad this War began, though the ground of the quarrel had been partly laid several years before the bringing in of the Ephori. In the dayes of Teleclus Father to Alcamenes now King, there being a Temple of Diana in the borders, to which both the Lacedæmonians and Messenians constantly resorted; it hapned that some Spartan Virgins, going thither, according to the custom, were abused by the Messenians, and Teleclus indeavouring to prevent the injury, was there slain: moreover, the Virgins for very shame and grief destroyed themselves, as the Lacedæmonians told the story. On the contrary, the Messenians pleaded, that at this Temple Teleclus lay in wait for the principal of their City, by sending thither young men, disguised in the habit of Virgins, with Pomards under their clothes; that hereupon the Messenians coming in to help their friends, slew Teleclus, and the counterfeits, for which at that time, the Lacedæmonians found not themselves so much concerned as to stir. However it was, grudges hence arose, or were rather heightened betwixt them; for the Lacedæmonians often complained, that in the division of the Territories obtained by the Heracleidae, *Eurysthene*s, and Procles, their Kings, were cheated by their Uncle

SECT. 5. Cresphontes, of the far better grounds, for which now they envied the Messenians, thinking themselves far worthier of them, as being the much more considerable people.

28. Animosities being raised upon these accounts, another thing hapned which increased them to that height as they brake out into open War. There was one Polychares a Messenian, who had got the victory in the course at the celebration of the fourth Olympiad. He let out some Cows to one Evaphnus a Lacedæmonian, on this condition, to have part of the profit. Evaphnus sold the Cows, and then coming to Polychares, told him that they, and their keepers were stolne from him; but while he was labouring to gain credit to his tale, some of the Herdsmen (who, as it seemeth, with the consent of Evaphnus, were taken away by force) escaped from the Merchants, and acquainted Polychares with the fraud, which now the other not able to deny, asked him pardon, told him for how much the Cattel were sold, and promised to send the money, if he would let his son accompany him to Sparta. He sent his son accordingly, but when they were come together into Laconia, Evaphnus most perfidiously murdered the young man, with the horridnesse of which fact Polychares grievously moved, came several times to Sparta, complaining bitterly, and with many rears to the Kings and Ephori, but found no Justice; insomuch that growing into a great rage against all Lacedæmonians in common, he killed them as enemies wheresoever he could meet them.

Pausan. ut supra.

29. The Lacedæmonians, finding themselves concerned herein, sent to the Messenians, demanding Polychares. At that time Androcles and Antiochus, the sons of Phinias reigning at Messene, promised they would report the matter to the people, and know their minds therein. The multitude being called together, Androcles was much for the giving up of Polychares, but on the contrary Antiochus urged how unjust, and lamentable a thing it would be for him to be tormented before Evaphnus, and the contention grew so hot betwixt the brothers, that it came to blows. Antiochus his faction prevailing, Androcles with the chief of his party lost their lives. Antiochus then reigning alone wrote to the Spartans, offering to refer the business to the Argives, who were of the same stock with them both, or to the publick Council of the Amphyctiones; or else, if neither of these liked them, to the Senate of Arcopagus. They returned no answer by the Messenger, and within a few months Antiochus died, and his son Euphaes succeeded him. Neither then did they send any message, nor yet renounced amity with the Messenians, but entring into secret consultations provided for the War, and bound themselves with an Oath never to return home till they had subdued Messenia.

Paus. Polybius l. 6.

30. Being bound with this Oath, and having all things in a readinesse, under the conduct of Alcamenes, the son of Teleclus, they went out by night and fell upon Aruphea, a Town upon the Borders, which by the suddennesse of the onser, no Watch being kept, but the Gates standing open, they easily took, and finding it a place for situation, and convenience of water fit for their purpose, put all to the sword, intending to use it as a Receptracle, and chief Fortresse in the War. After this they made excursions, and rather practised robberies than carried on a War, the Messenians declining the fight through the perswasion of Euphaes. But after four years, when they were now well exercised, and exceedingly incensed against the Lacedæmonians, he gave them leave to make inroads into Laconia, where they wasted all about Taygetus. He then lead down his Army into the Borders to fight, which opportunity the Lacedæmonians imbraced, and ingaged with the horse, and chose foot that bare the light Armour. But Euphaes having provided matter for making a Trench, caused the place where his other Souldiers lay to be fortified (in them consisting his chief strength) so that, seeing they could not fight with them, and being unprovided to besiege the Camp, they returned home, where they had but cold welcom, because of this retreat made contrary to their solemn Oath.

Idem ibid. A.M. 3262. Olymp. 9. 11. 1. V.C. 11. 1. Iothami. 16.

31. The year after, for that the elder sort exceedingly upbraided them, they they returned into Messenia under conduct of both the Kings: Theopompus, the son of Nicanor, and Polydorus of Alcamenes, now dead. There they were received by the enemy, and entertained in a great and bloody battel, wherein both parties with much earnestnesse and contention demeaned themselves. The Spartans as they surpassed the other in skill, being trained up in exercises from their Childhood, so exceeded them also in numbers; but desperation and necessity made the Messenians valiant, as they abundantly shewed it, many breaking their Ranks on purpose to come to hand-strokes with the enemy. In the main battel the victory continued doubtfull a long time; in the right wing Euphaes put Theopompus to flight, and in the left Polydorus did as much by the Messenians, and neither party would give the chase; Euphaes for that he thought he had already done enough, and Polydorus because the Lacedæmonians were deterred from it through their ignorance of the place, being in an enemies Countrey: so that fighting on even terms they were parted by the night. The day following neither side would fight, nor had the confidence to erect a Trophy; but made truce so long as to bury their dead.

32. After this battel none other succeeded for several years. The Messenians, for that their Countrey was the seat of War, were pressed with many difficulties. Their Garrisons had cost them so much money, as now they were rendred unable to pay their Army: their slaves fled daily to the Lacedæmonians, and a certain disease not much better than the plague, seized upon them, which though not exceeding deadly, yet joyntly with the other difficulties, caused great trouble and perturbation. After a serious debate concerning the main of their affairs, it was resolved, that most of the Towns lying upon the Sea should be dismantled as far remote, and Ichome, a Mountain as large as any within the Isthmus (whereupon stood a Town more ancient than great) was to be fortified because of the natural strength thereof. When they had here settled themselves, they sent to Delphos to enquire concerning the event of the War. The Oracle (agreeable to the disposition of the enemy of mankind) required a Virgin of the stock of Aegyptus to be sacrificed; whereupon all that belonged to that family were subjected to the lot, and the daughter of one Lyciscus was taken. She being to be offered, the sooth-sayer forbade it, alleging that she was not the daughter of Lyciscus, but brought in under-hand by his wife that was barren, and whilst he was thus perswading the people, Lyciscus fled away with her to Sparta. All hereat exceedingly startled, Aristodemus, another of that family, voluntarily offered his own daughter; but a young man there present that was in love with her, and shortly intended marriage, stiffly impugned it, and contended she was not in her fathers power, because betrothed to himself. Nor herevith prevailing he affirmed he had lien with her, and that she was with Child, whereat Aristodemus was so enraged, that he killed her with his own hand, and ripping up her belly, shewed plainly to all that there was no such matter. Yet the sooth-sayer avouched her death could not at all profit the State, and commanded some other to be offered; but Euphaes perswaded the people that the Oracle was already satisfied, and required not the life of any other.

The Lacedæmonians make War upon the Argives.

33. That rest which the Lacedæmonians had in this interval was presently turned into action with the Argives about Thyrea, a Town situate in the Borders of both Commonwealths. This fell out in the reign of Theopompus, whereat yet he was not present, partly by reason of his old age, and also for grief taken at the death of his son Archidamus. The controversie was brought before the Amphyctiones, who ordered that 300 on each side should decide it. Of the Argives two persons survived the Combat; but on the Spartan party onely one, by name Othryades, as good as many, who lived no longer than to make use of broken spears instead of Crutches to sustain his body, then to gather together the Targets of the slain, and to erect a Trophy therewith, whereon he made an inscription with his own blood. Because of this Trophy the Amphyctiones decreed the Town to the Lacedæmonians;

renewed.

34. The offering up of Aristodemus his daughter seemed to the Messenians to have done some good, the affairs of Lacedæmon appearing to be in a declining posture, and that State slower in its Enterprizes than formerly. But in the sixth year after the departure of Lyciscus, and the eighth from their removal to Ithome, the War was again renewed against them. Another battle was fought, but with the same success as formerly. In the midst of the fight was the hottest contest, the most valiant on both sides betaking themselves thither, where Euphaes also venturing further, than either stood with his dignity or safety, against Theopompus, received many, and deadly wounds. Herewith being so weakened as he fell, the Lacedæmonians strove to take him, and a great conflict ensued; but one Anander so far resisting as to lose his own life in the quarrel, Euphaes was brought off, and died a few days after, having reigned 13 years, all which time he spent in the War against the Lacedæmonians. He dying Childless, a great controversy arose about the succession, for that several of the family of Ægypius stood for the Kingdom, amongst whom was Aristodemus, who, though it was objected that having polluted his hands in the blood of his daughter, he was not capable, was preferred before all others through the favour of the people. After his Election he sent Presents to the chief of the Arcadians, Argives, and Sicyonians, whom he engaged to his party. Assisted by some Arcadians he made encursions, and the Lacedæmonians did the same, proceeding to no greater extremity; but at length, in his fifth year, another battle was fought near to Ithome, wherein the Messenians were assisted by the three States ere now mentioned, and the Spartans by no other Peloponnesians than those of Corinth. The dispute was very sharp, and the event doubtful, till the Messenians, having the upper ground, at last put their enemies to flight, of whom it is credible, as Pausanias onely writeth, that many miscarried.

35. The Lacedæmonians, after this, almost despairing of success, both parties sent to enquire at Delphos, concerning the issue of the War. The Messenians received an answer so ambiguous as could not be interpreted: that to the Spartans plainly signified, that as Cresphontes had obtained Messene by a wile in ordering the lots, so by wiles it was to be recovered. Several then they invented, but all were discovered, by the vigilancy, and cunning of Aristodemus. But the 20th year of the War approaching, the affairs of the Messenians began exceedingly to relapse, and the Oracle again consulted, answered, that whosoever could first dedicate a hundred Trestles (or three-footed stools) to Jupiter of Ithome should obtain Messene. The Messenians having the Temple within themselves, doubted not but to be able to do this first; yet the answer being brought to Lacedæmon, one Oebalus a crafty man there made roo of Clay, and while the Messenians were busie about others of Wood (for their purses were not able to reach to brass) disguised himself in the habit of a fowler, and carried them into the Temple. This struck the Messenians with great consternation, who were straightly besieged by this time, and hindered from getting in any provisions. Aristodemus was also tormented with sad dreams about his daughter, whereat sorely moved, and exceedingly afflicted with consideration that he should kill his Child for his Countrey's good, which notwithstanding was desperate, he slew himself at her Monument.

36. With this sad accident the Messenians were more grievously struck, and so despaired as to have thoughts of making their applications to the Lacedæmonians; but as yet not able to stoop, they made no overtures, though almost oppressed with famine: they chose them Captains in the room of Aristodemus, preparing to sallie out, and fight it out to the last man for their lives and fortunes. Yet at length distrusting their ability to do any thing that way, and considering themselves urged hard with the want of all necessities, they left Ithome, and yielded in the fifth moneth after the death of Aristodemus, the 28th year of the War being almost finished, in the first of the fourteenth teenth Olympiad, the Medonidae at Athens yet enjoying the power for ten years, in the dayes of Hezekiah King of Judaah, and the time of the deportation of the ten Tribes. The Conquerours utterly demolished Ithome, and, having gotten easily the other Towns of Messenia into their power, imposed what Laws they pleased upon the Inhabitants, who were commanded to till their grounds, and send one half of the profits unto Sparta; to bind themselves by oath, to remain in perpetual fealty to the Lacedæmonians, and both men and women, when the Kings and Nobles of Sparta died, to attend upon their Funerals in mourning weeds; which things were enjoined them upon pain of death. As many as would not endure those hard conditions, and had hope of entertainment with the Arcadians, Argives, and Sicyonians, went thither, and such as were Priests to Eleusine: all the rest of the multitude departed every one to his own seat, and so the first Messenian War ended.

The Parthenia.

37. Whilst the Lacedæmonians were abroad, and lay under the obligation of their oath, never to return till the War should be finished, fearing, either through the suggestion of their wives, or their own recollection, that their posterity might fail, they chose out of their lustiest young men fifty in number, who coming out under age, were not liable to the oath, and sent them to Sparta to lye with their Wives and Virgins (or the Virgins onely) in a promiscuous manner, whence arose a generation called Parthenia, as the Sons of Virgins. But after that the war was finished, and the Spartans returned home, they looked upon them as a spurious brood, and as such contemned them; which these youths apprehending, and how they could not inherit any thing in the Commonwealth, entred into conspiracie with the Hilots, and made one Philanthus their Captain, whose Father Aracus had given the advice, to send the young Men to the Virgins. This plot being revealed by some of the slaves, they were expelled, and forced to seek out new seats; so that departing into Italy, they drove out the Barbarians and Cretians, who inhabited about Tarentum, and seizing upon that place, therein planted themselves.

The second
Messenian
War.

38. The Messenians thus brought under the yolk, endured it, though with much repining, for 39 years; but then, besides their most hard and servile condition, wearied with the insolency of the Spartans, in the fourth year of the 23 Olympiad, a little after the nine Annual Archons were constituted at Athens, in the 40th after the taking of Ithome, they revolted, at the instigation of Aristomenes especially, a young man of a most active and courageous spirit, who had before hand solicited for assistance the Arcadians and Argives now being jealous of the power of the Lacedæmonians, and at open enmity with them. At this time Anaxander the Nephew of Polydorus, by his Son Eurycrates, and Anaxidamus the Son of Zenxidamus, and Grandson to Theopompus, by his Son Archidamus, who died ere he came to reign, were Kings at Sparta.

39. Aristomenes managed the whole businesse for the Messenians, being of extraordinary abilities both of body and mind. He first ingaged with the Spartans at Dera, a Village of Messenia, where he is said to have behaved himself above the capacity of a man, and seeing he was of the Family of Aegyptus, was chosen King by the people. Refusing this title, he was created General, with absolute authority, and afterwards, at the Monument of the Boar, (a place in Messenia, where Hercules made a league with the Sons of Nileus) by the assistance of the Arcadians, Argives, Sicyonians, and Eleans, overthrew the Lacedæmonians, terrifying all where ever he came. In the pursuit he lost his Target, which whilst he was seeking, they had opportunity to escape. After this, he took and plundered a Town of Laconia, named Phara, whence retreating with much booty, he also overthrew Anaxander the King, who pursued him, and having in his intentions to march against Sparta it self, is said to have been deterred from it, by the apparitions of Helena, and her two brothers Castor and Pollux.

40. The Lacedæmonians much startled at this losse, thought to have put a period

SECT. 5. period to the War, but were again encouraged by the Verses of Tyrtæus, who perswaded them to fill up their armie with the Helots. A year or two before this, sending to consult the Oracle about the War; they had answer, that they must send to Athens for a Counsellor. The Athenians were unwilling in the least to promote their affairs, being jealous of their growing power, yet fearing also to do any thing crosse to the Oracle, they sent to them this Tyrtæus a School-master, lame on his feet, and not very sound in his brain. In the third year of the War, another battel was fought, at a place called the great Diich, wherein the Messenians having no other associates than their friends of Arcadia, these also failed them at this time, through the treachery of their Captain; so that, left to themselves, and compassed in by their Enemies, most of them were slain, though Aristomenes omitted nothing worthy of a General, or common Soldier. Having gathered up the reliques of his Army, he perswaded the people to quit all inland Towns, and fortifying onely Pylus and Metbone upon the Sea, to secure themselves in the hill Ira. Here they were presently besieged, and issuing out for booty, made depredations, both in Laconia and their own Country, which drew out an Edict from the Lacedæmonian State, that the borders of both Countries should, during the War, be left desolate; whereupon a dearth ensued at Sparta, and thence a Sedition, which Tyrtæus with his Poetry had work enough to suppress.

41. Aristomenes in the mean time, like some fierce and greedy Lyon, with 300 choice men at his heels, to the great fear of all men, ranged up and down the Country, and made continual excursions into the Enemies Country. At length he was taken and carried to Sparta, where condemned to death, he was thrown into a deep dungeon; the ordinary way of punishing capital offenders. Coming safe to the bottom, though others were killed by the fall, he perceived a Fox feeding upon some dead carkeises, whereat considering that this creature must have some hole to creep in at, he caught it by the tail, and defending himself from it's teeth by the other hand, it led him to the hole, which being but little, he so enlarged with his hands, as contrary to the belief and expectation of all men, he returned safe to his Companions. Presently after his return, he fell upon the Camp of the Corinthians, who assisted the Spartans in the Siege, and lay carelessly, without any watch, and killing the Captains, plundered their Tents. Not long after a Truce was made for fourty dayes, during which, he wandring abroad too carelessly, was entrapped by some Cretians, who assisted also in the Siege, and being bound with the thongs of their quivers, was carried into a Village, to the house of a certain widdow. This woman, understanding who he was, cast in her head how to deliver him, which she effected, by giving his Keepers so much drink, that they falling asleep, with one of their daggers he cut the thongs. Being loosed, he stabbed the Cretians and escaped; and afterwards, to requite the womans kindnesse, married her to his Son Gorgus.

42. Ten years the Siege of Ira continued, the Messenians enjoying the grounds at the foot of the Mountain, as far as the River Neda, thereby being better provided for to hold out. But in the eleventh, when Aristomenes was renderd by a wound incapable of taking such care about the watch as he had been wont, in a rainy and dark night the sentinels, secure of him, betook themselves to their own homes. Amongst those there was one, whose wife in his absence entertained a certain Herds-man as a Lover, who belonged to Emperamus a Lacedæmonian now at the Siege. He being hid by his Parimour upon her husband's coming, heard the man tell the Story, how he and his fellows had forsaken their charge, and slipping away, therewith acquainted his Master. Both the Spartan Kings were absent at this time, but Emperamus, unwilling to let slip so fair an opportunity, led the Army thither, and got into the Fortresse before he was discovered. When the matter was perceived, a great contest there was betwixt the parties; but Aristomenes seeing there was no hope of doing any good, and willing to save what was left of the afflicted Messenians, obtained liberty to depart; and so Ira being taken taken the War ended, after it had lasted sixteen years ; in the first of the 28th Olympiad, when Ausosthenes was Archon at Athens, A. M. 3337.

43. When the Arcadians understood of the taking of Ira, they desired of Aristocrates their King to be led out, either to restore their friends, or die with them ; but he having formerly betrayed them at the great Ditch, was now also corrupted with money, and refused to do it, alleging there was none left to whom they could give assistance. Yet when it was clearly known that they were alive, they sent some before to comfort them, then met them with clothes, and meat, as far as the Hill Lycaus, and kindly invited them to live amongst them. Aristomenes boiling with hatred and revenge against the Lacedæmonians, chose out of the Company 500 men, whom he knew to be no whit desirous to outlive the fortune of their Country, and asked them in the hearing of Aristocrates (not knowing any thing of his treachery) and the Arcadians, whether they would venture their lives with him. Upon their answer that they would, he acquainted them with his design, to march straight for Sparta, which if he could surprize, now that all it's strength was employed in the plunder of Messenia, then should he make an even exchange with the Lacedæmonians ; but, if not, death would be the worst that could happen. Besides the Messenians, 300 Arcadians gave their names to this Expedition ; but being stayed by reason that the entrails of the beast were not propitious, Aristocrates had time to give notice of the design to Anaxander King of Sparta. The treachery was discovered after the return of the Messenger, by some that suspected it, and the letter sent back from Anaxander, was read in the Assembly of the Arcadians, wherein thanks was given to Aristocrates, as well for the help he afforded the Lacedæmonians at the great Ditch, as for this timely notice. Hereat the multitude was so enraged, as they stoned him out of hand, cast him out unburied, and erected a monument to his infamy, with this note, that Perjury cannot escape God. They exhorted also the Messenians to throw stones at him, who looked upon Aristomenes, as expecting directions from him ; but he onely fixed his eyes on the ground and wept.

his treachery.

44. The Messenians desired of Aristomenes to lead them out, to seek some new place to inhabit ; but he denied it, resolving to spend his dayes in doing as much mischief as he could to the Lacedæmonians : onely his son Gorgus and Mantichus he offered to them. Those that had kept Pylus and Methone, with others which lived on the Sea-coasts, went by ship to Cyllene, the haven of the Eleans, to seek out the rest. The following Spring several places being proposed to go to, Anaxilas who then reigned at Rhegium, and was descended of one Alcidamidas a Messenian (that after the taking of Ithome in the former War, betook himself thither) sent some to convey them into Italy. After their arrival, he told them he had continual War with the Zancleans, a people of Sicilie, that inhabited a fruitful and pleasant Soil, which if they would help him to conquer, he would put it into their hands. He then besieged them by Sea, and the Messenians by Land, whereby being distressed, and the greater part of the wall now cast down, they fled to the altars of their gods. Anaxilus would have had them slain, and their wives and children sold ; but the other unwilling to commit such cruelty against any Greeks, (for such they were, the Town being first inhabited by Rivers, and afterwards by others from several parts of Greece) gave them liberty to continue, and incorporating themselves into their body, changed the name of the place from Zancle into Messene. Aristomenes for some time continuing in Greece, married his daughters very honourably, whereof Demagetus, Prince of Rhodes at that time, took the youngest to wife, having been advised by the Oracle, to make choice of that man's daughter who was the best in all Greece. He carried his daughter to Rhodes, whence he intended to go to Ardys the son of Gyges, then reigning in Lydia, and thence to Ecbarane, to Phraortes King of the Medes ; but death prevented him, and he finished his dayes in that Island, being found in the number of those few, that lived and dyed in great glory.

SECT. 6. 45. Messenia thus subdued by the Lacedamonians was rilled by the common slaves, amongst whom such of the inhabitants as there still remained were inrolled, and became a proverb for their hard bondage; being worse used than any, because, as some think, the War was carried on with them, not for glory and Empire, but for life and safety, not with a contention which people should rule, but whether should be preserved. The accession of this Countrey to their demesnes very much increased the power of Lacedemon, and so they held it for two hundred years, till an opportunity was offered for the old inhabitants, in despite of them, to return. This thing being brought to passe long after, must be referred to another place: as also (because what further hapned betwixt the Arcadians, Argives, and this Commonwealth, is not very material) whatsoever we have further to observe concerning the Lacedemonians.

SECT. VI.

The most antient Kingdom of Corinth.

Corinth first called Ephyra, and built by Sisyphus.

1. THIS Citie, seated in the Isthmus of Peloponnesus, had first the name of Ephyra, and was built by Sisyphus (whose posterity reigned here some 428 years) in the dayes of Cecrops, the first King of Athens, and a little before Deucalions Flood, about the 2486 year of the World. He married Merope, the daughter of Atlas, by which he had four sons, Glaucus, Ornytion, Thersander, and Almas; was accounted a very wise, and prudent man, feigned also to have returned to life again, that he might chastize his wife for not having performed what was due to his memory. After he was once got up he would not return of a long time to Hell, where he is also said by the Poets to roll a great stone up an Hill, which continually rumbling down again keepeth him in constant toil, having this punishment inflicted on him for discovering to Asopus his daughter stolne away by Jupiter. Glaucus his eldest son was the father of Bellerophon, and first celebrated Games in the Isthmus. Ornytion begat Phocus, who led a Colony into, and gave name to the Countrey called Phocis after him, and Thoas a younger son that continued at Corinth. Thersander had two sons, Coronus and Haliarbus, who being adopted by Athamas their Uncle on the father's side, then reigning in Boeotia, (after he had lost his own two sons Phryxus and Helles, and his daughter Ino with her two sons) gave name to two places in that Countrey. Almus (called otherwise Halmus and Olmus) the youngest son of Sisyphus had part of the Countrey of the Orchomenians bestowed on him by Eteocles the King, and from him Almon, or Olmon, a place of Boeotia, was so named.

2. Bellerophon, having committed man-slaughter at Corinth, was forced to fly thence, and went to Præus King of the Argives, whose wife Sthenobæa enamoured of his beauty tempted him to lie with her; but he had the modesty to deny her, wherewith she was so incensed as to accuse him to her husband of an intended rape. Præus taking it in great disdain to be so used by his Guest, yet would not kill him, but sent him to Iolas, King of Lycia his wives father with Letters, wherein he desired him to make the bearer away. To fulfill his request, Iolas first caused him to fight with the Chimæra, a Monster that vomited fire, not doubting of his destruction thereby; but he mounting the horse Pegasus, slew the Monster. Then he sent him against the Solyms and Amazons, whom he Conquered; then caused some of the strongest young men he could procure to ly in ambush, and fall on him, which also he having slain, Iolas admiring his valour gave him his daughter Philonoe to wife, and when he died, left him his Successor in the Kingdom of Lycia. Concerning this Chimæra, what should be meant thereby is scarce discernable. (a) Some have understood by it a Mountain in Lycia, the top whereof vomited forth fire, the middle part had Pastures full of Goats, and the foot, or bottom, abounded with Serpents. 'Tis conceived he might make this Mountain habitable, and thence be said to have slain the Chimera, which had a mouth like a Lion, middle parts as a Goat, and the hinder parts like a Dragon. (b) Others again say that Bellerophon gave occasion to this fable by killing one Chimerus a Sea Captain, who infested the Lycians with piracy, the story being thence raised, for that Chimerus his ship had a Lion painted on the prow, and a Dragon on the deck, and Bellerophon's Vessel called Pegasus, might have a winged horse for its sign. A third (c) sort think three kinds of enemies to be signified by this Monster: the Solyms, Amazons, and Lycians; the former being for their valour compared to a Lion, the next for their nimbleness in climbing of Rocks to a Goat, and the last to a Dragon, for their craftiness in ambushes. Lastly, a (d) modern, and most learned Writer judgeth the three gods of the Solyms, whom Bellerophon overthrew, to have been painted in their Ensigns; resembling a Lion, Goat, and Dragon, like the three heads of the Monster, as 'tis described by Hesiod.

Aletes the son of Hippotes (son to Antiochus, and Nephew to Hercules) came down and subdued the Kingdom. The Heracleide having, before this, obtained Peloponnesus, reserved this part for him, who consulting the Oracle of Jupiter at Dodona, was answered, that he should then obtain it, when a clod of Earth should be given him.

Vide Simsonium ad A.M. 2914.

At his return this was fulfilled; for begging some meat of an Herds-man, he, having nothing to give him, offered him a clod, which he gladly accepted, saying, Aletes accepteth of a clod, which became a proverb. Who gave the name of Corinth to the Citie is uncertain; but however, Aletes out of gratitude to the Oracle, named it Corinth of Jupiter, which gave occasion to the multitude to believe that Corinth the King that built it, was the son of Jupiter, wherein they so gloried, and so often vaunted of it, that nothing became more ridiculous, and they were laughed at for it throughout Greece. After Aletes the eldest of the family succeeded for several Generations. The first was Ixion, who reigned

The Bacchiads.

37 years, the next Agilaus, who ruled as many, Prumnus 25. and * Bacchis full so many, who was so famous, that where as he, and all his Ancestors were called Heracleide, his Successors from him had the name of Bacchiads. The first after him was Agelas, who governed thirty years, the next Eudomis, who reigned 25. then came Aristomedes, who having ruled 25. left a Child behind him, which his brother Algemon, whom he had appointed Guardian, deposed, and held the Kingdom himself sixteen years. After him followed Alexander for 25. whom Telestes the son of Aristomedes slew, and obtained his fathers Kingdom, which he held twelve years. He was also slain by Arieus and Perantas his Kins-men, and then Automenes reigned one year, which being expired, the Bacchids, more than 200 in number, seized on the Kingdom, and Governed in common; onely every year they created a Prytanis out of their own body to be in the room of the King, and so they continued 90 years in the way of an Aristocracy.

Colonies of the Corinthians.

4. During this term, in the fourth year of the eleventh Olympiad, the Corinthians being powerfull at Sea, sent out a Colony into the Island of Sicily under conduct of Archias, one of the Heracleide, which, expelling the Siculi out of that quarter, founded the Citie Syracuse. More people flocking thither out of Peloponnesus, this Citie grew, and increased exceedingly; so that it became not onely the principal of all in Sicily, but the greatest, and most beautifull of all Greece, as Cicero witnesseth, and in its due place will be further discovered. Much about the same time was there another Colony sent into the Island Pheacus, lying nigh to Epirus, at a little distance from the Continent, conducted thither by Cheriferates another of the posterity of Hercules. Homer in his Odys. Maketh this Island inhabited in the Trojan

SECT. 6. times, by the Phaeacians a most noble people, over whom reigned Alcinous: the son of Nausiklous, who received Ulysses after his long wanderings, and helped him in his journey home to Ithaca. He mentioneth his Royal seat, called Scheria, (which Pliny from him affirmeth also to have been the name of the Island, as well as Phaacia) and saith, the inhabitants were much given to Navigation, and most skilfull therein. In the soyl of this Scheria, the old inhabitants being expelled, this new Colony planted it self, which taking the name of Coreyra, the whole Island came thence to be so called. The Citie, much befriended by the Commodiousnesse of the Haven, and the conveniency of the place for Sea matters, grew in a short time to be very considerable; so as it founded of it self two Cities, viz. that of Epidamnus, as we have it from Thucydides, (by the Romans called Dyrrachium) and Apollonia, as Strabo writeth; both of them seated in that part of Illyricum, inhabited by the Taulantians. The form of this Commonwealth was (agreeable to the constitution of all Colonies) like to that of Corinth the Metropolis, which then was Governed by the Bacchiade in an Oligarchical way. When Corinth was afflicted by Tyrants, Coreyra felt also their influence upon its infancy; but at length it grew to that height, as to renounce such obedience as the other challenged, whence great and tedious Commotions were produced in Greece.

5. The Bacchiade neither communicated the Government nor marriage to any other person than of their own family, till one of their women being lame, and upon that account despised by them all of her own stock, had thereby an occasion given to break the custom. She (named Labda) married Eetion (the son of Echecrates, and Nephew to Antassus of the Petresan Tribe) who, having no Children by her, or any other, went to Delphos, and inquired of the Oracle concerning issue. He received an answer to this effect; that he should have a son, who like a stone would fall upon the Oligarchy, and breaking it in pieces, amend the State of Corinth. This coming to the ears of the Bacchiade, who had an Oracle before much to the same purpose, though under general terms, they resolved to hold their peace, and kill Eetions Child as soon as it should be born. And as soon as his wife was delivered, they sent ten of their Company to destroy it, whom the mother presented with a sight of the Babe, thinking they had come to Congratulate her husband about its birth. They had agreed amongst themselves, that whosoever first came at the Infant should knock out his brains, but the Child smiling in his face, who first took it in his Arms, he was so moved with compassion, as he would not kill it, but delivered it to one of his fellows, who touched with the same compassion gave it to another, till it passed through all their hands unhurt. Being gone out, and standing at the door, they blamed one another exceedingly, especially the first, whose part it was to kill it, and in they returned now to do the deed; but the mother, hearing their discourse, hid the Infant under a Bushell, or such alike instrument of measuring Corn, so that not finding it they returned, giving out they had done their errand, and so the Child thus preserved was named Cypselus, from the measure under which he was hid, in the Greek Κυψέλην tongue called Cypsele.

6. When he was come to man's estate, relying upon another Oracle (whereby he was plainly bidden to be King of Corinth, and his Children after him, but not his Nephews) he invaded the Tyranny, which to establish, many he deprived of their estates, but many more of their lives. He first lulled the people asleep with good language, and thereby getting all into his hands, made himself Lord of the Citie; his power he preserved by removing those out of the way whom it most concerned; but once established he grew exceeding mild and fair, with good words, and no ill deeds, drawing the people into such a respect of him, that all his time he stood not in need of any Guard; a rare thing in men of his condition, which Gelo at Syracuse onely imitated. This change hapned at Corinth in the 2 year of the 31 Olympiad, in the dayes of Phraortes, King of the Medes, and Ardys Grand-father to Crasus, King of Lydia, 20 years after the second Messenian War, and 30 after after the nine Annual Archons were established at Athens, A. M. 3350. Upon his seizing the power, Demaratus, a man eminent amongst the Bacchides, and very rich, fled into Italy, and seated himself in Hetruria, where, of a woman of that Countrey he begot two sons, Aruns and Lucumon, the later whereof became King of Rome, by the name of Tarquinius.

7. Cypselus having enjoyed the principality of Corinth and Corcyra the space of thirty years, then died, and left it to his son Periander. He was much unlike his father, of a cruel disposition (if we believe Aristotle rather than Soficles in Herodotus) inasmuch as not trusting the good will of his people, he got a guard of 300 men about him, and would rather be feared than loved of his Subjects; yet being hardy and warlike, he held the power longer than he. Herodotus, out of Soficles relateth, that at first he was very mild and courteous, till by acquaintance with Thrasibylus the Tyrant of Mileus, he altered his humour; for sending to him for his advice, how he might best order his affairs in Government, he returned no answer to the Messenger, but carrying him out into a plot of Corn, fell a plucking off the tallest and most eminent ears, till he had well nigh marred the whole plot. The Messenger returning told Periander what he had seen, who easily guessed, that the most eminent and powerful Citizens were to be removed out of the way; but * Aristotle maketh him the author of this counsel to Thrasibylus. Laertius saith, he grew more cruel after it was known that he lay with his Mother Cræta.

8. He married Melissa the daughter of Procles (or Patrocles) tyrant of Epidaurus, on whom he begot Cypselus and Lycophron, whereof the elder was very blockish and stupid. At the instigation of his whores, he afterwards killed his wife, kicking her when she was great with childe, then lay with her when she was dead, and calling together the Corinthian women, as well adorned as possible, to celebrate the feast of Juno, caused his guard to strip them all naked, and made a parentation to Melissa of all their clothes and ornaments. Lycophron his youngest son, who onely was capable of Government, moved by Procles his Grand-Father, grew exceeding froward and refractory because of his Mother's death; inasmuch as, differences and distasts increasing, Periander banished him, first his house, then forbade all his Subjects to speak to, or comfort him, and at length forced him into Corcyra. But after some years growing old, infirm, and unfit for business, he sent for him home, offering to passe over all to him; but by no arguments or intreaties could he move him to return, till he offered to change places, and devest himself of all power. Now, when this was agreed on, the Corcyreans fearing above all things to have Periander come amongst them, to prevent it, killed the young man. Periander to be revenged, took away from them 300 of their choicest Boyes, which he sent to Haliates King of Lydia his friend and allie to be gelded; but they being driven upon the Island Samus, the Inhabitants took such pity both on them and their relations, as to send them home safe, and disappointed the Tyrant. This so vexed him, now almost eighty years old, that he dyed of grief, though by some he be reckoned amongst the seven Wise Men of Greece. Suidas out of most ancient Authors delivereth this character of him; That he was an harsh and cruel Tyrant, very martial, scarce being ever out of War, very powerful at Sea, having so convenient Havens both upon the Ionian and Aegean Gulfs. He reigned nigh forty years, and dyed in the fourth of the 48th Olympiad, seven after the establishment of Solon's Laws, A. M. 3420.

After his removal the power of one man was laid aside, and the people put themselves into a Free-State, which continued as long as the liberty of Greece it self. Oligarchy

SECT. 7. Oligarchy than that of tyranny; the power of the multitude being more bounded. Yet, for certain, the Government was popular, things of greatest consequence never being resolved on, without the consent and decree of the people, (which kept those of highest concernment in its own power) and, if any other in the World, was a friend to Antimonarchical liberty, and an utter enemy to Monarchy, where ever it was found in Greece. For this City undertook many times great Wars for this very cause, and not out of any ambitious design, as is clear in the case of the Syracusians, and others; so that a Captain out of it was most desirable upon such an occasion; as may hereafter be discovered.

SECT. VII.

The antient Kingdom of Thebes.

1. Bœotia had on the West Phocis, on the East the Eubœan Sea, on the North the Eastern Locri, and on the South Attica and Megaris. The chief seat and Metropolis of this Country was Thebes, the builder of which is not certainly known. Calydnus is reported first to have reigned here; whence by a Poet of Chalcis, it is called the Tower of Calydnus, and in Hesychius, Calydnean is the same with Antient. After him was Ogyges, or Ogyrus, from whom Thebes by the Poets is called Ogygian, and that great Ogygian Deluge is named, which is said to have happened in his time, 1020 years before the first Olympiad, in the dayes of Phoroneus King of Argos, (as Africanus gathereth) and so overwhelmed all the region of Attica, that it made it inhabitable for 200 years, as Pererius noteth. Pausanias writeth, that he was King of the Eleena, the first Inhabitants of Thebais, and that from his son Eleusine a famous Town in Attica took both Original and name, as some were of opinion. These Eleena are reported to have been consumed by Pestilence, whom succeeded the Hyantes and Aona, that continued in those parts, together with the Temmices (who came from Sanium) and the Leleges, till Cadmus coming to Greece, made himself Master of this place, in the dayes of Corax King of Sicyon, and Danaus of Argos, 347 years after the beginning of Ogyges.

2. This Cadmus, according to the tradition of the Greeks, was son to Agenor the brother of Belus, Uncle to Danaus and Aegyptus, who coming out of Egypt into Phœnice some 36 years before, on his wife Telphassa begat three sons; Cadmus, Phœnix, Cilix, and a daughter named Europa. This Europa, Jupiter stole, and carried over Sea into Crete, in the likenesse of a Bull, where he begat on her Minos, Rhadamanthus, and Sarpedon. Asterius King of the Island afterwards married her, and having no children of his own, adopted her sons. Herodotus telleth us that some Greeks (Asterius perhaps, or some for him) in revenge for what the Nation had formerly suffered from the Asiaticks in stealing away Ino, went to Tyre, and thence stole Europa the Kings daughter, bringing her away in a ship, whose ensign was a Bull, whence occasion was given to feign, that she was carried over upon a Bull's back.

3. Agenor sent out his three sons to seek their Sister, charging them never to return without her into Phœnicia. Cadmus sailed first into the Island Callisthe, (lying betwixt Crete and Callisthe) where he left a Colony, and thence into Thasus (so named from Thasus one of his Companions, and head of another Colony left here) and at length into Greece, where, in Bœotia, being past all hope of finding his sister, and consequently of returning into Phœnicia, by the command of an Oracle he founded Thebes; or re-edifying what was formerly built by Ogyges, anew laid the foundation of the Castle, which, ever after, from him retained the name of Cadmia. The Hyante beaten by his Forces, fled the night following into Phocis; but the Aona, upon their submission, were suffered to continue and imbody themselves selves amongst the Phœnicians. Here he married Harmonia the daughter of Mars and Venus, agreeable to which alliance, the gods are said to have come down unto Cadmœa to the wedding. Out of Phœnicia he first brought Letters into Greece, giving them their peculiar names and characters, fitted for the language of the place, and thence they were called Phœnician, though afterwards Pelasgian, because the use of them was, after they were brought over, first made known to the Pelasgi.

4. Of Harmonia, Cadmus begot Polydorus his son, and four daughters, Semele, Ino, Antiope, and Agave. On Semele Jupiter enamoured begot Dionysus, or Bacchus, who found out Wine and Ale, and travelled throughout the then known World, to reduce men to civility. This he did with an Army both of men and women, and after an Expedition of three years returned out of India, first triumphing upon an Elephant. Ino was married to Arhamas the son of Æolus and grand-son of Hellen, to whom she bore Actœon that was devoured by his own Dogs. Agave became the wife of Eetion, to whom she bore Pentheus. After Cadmus had reigned some time at Thebes, he was called by the Encheleæ, who had Wars at that time with the Illyrians, and were bidden by the Oracle to send for him and Harmonia to be their Captains. He left then the Kingdom of Thebes to his son Polydorus, and having subdued the Illyrians, reigned over them, and begot another son called Illyrius, who either gave or took name from that people. The Poets feigned Cadmus and his wife, to have been turned here into Snakes, because they seem to have forgot their former civility, and learnt barbarism.

Apollod.

Polydorus.

What the Sidonians said of Cadmus.

5. This is the sum of what the Greeks have delivered concerning Cadmus. But, though they, for their own credit, made him the son of a King, yet the Sidonians, whose Country-man he was, denie this, alleging that being their King's Cook, he fled away with Harmonia, a certain minstrel. His time, as it is computed, falleth in with that of Joshua, so that he seemeth to have led into Greece a Colony of those Canaanites, or Phœnicians, who were outed of their habitations by the Israelites. His family may be gathered to have been that of the Kadmonites, mentioned by Moses, who were the same with the Hivites, and called Cadmonim, or Orientalis, because they possessed Mount Hermion, the most Eastern part of Canaan, taken for the East, as Thabor for the West. Hence came it to passe, that Cadmus his wife was called Harmonia, or Hermione, and apparent why they were feigned to be turned into Snakes, because an Hivite in the Syrian language signifieth a Serpent. That he first brought letters into Greece is most probable, 1. Because the ancientest Greek letters, in most things, are like to the old Phœnician, which the Samaritans at this day use. 2. Their names are plainly Phœnician, or Hebrew, as may be intinced in Alpha, Beta, &c. of which the Greeks were not ignorant, as appeareth out of Varro. For Crates the Philosopher, disputing in Greece about some points of Grammar, demanded why they said not Alpha Alphatos as well as Gramma Grammatos, to which the Grecians answered, that the names were not theirs, but barbarous; and Plutarch rendered this reason, why Alpha is set before the rest by the Phœnicians, because they called an Oxe by that name. 3. The Greeks kept the same order of letters as the Phœnicians did, being most antient, as appeareth by some acrostick Verses of David and Jeremiah. Cadmus brought over the Rites of Bacchus into Greece, and thereupon is feigned to be Grand-father to him, who lived many Ages before, and indeed was Nimrod. To this City built or re-edified by him, he gave the name of Thebes, of which name there was a place in Canaan mentioned by the Book of (a) Judges, and by (b) Josephus also written Thebe, in the plural number; so that an end may be put to that controversie about the original of the word, which betokeneth mud or dirt. But concerning all this, Bochartus is to be consulted, in the first Book of that admirable Work intituled Canaan.

came at age, he * left to the tuition of his father-in-law. Nycteus had another daughter, Antiope by name, which Epopeus King of Sicyonia stole away, whence a War ensued, wherein both of them received mortal wounds, and Nycteus dying, left the tuition of the young King to his brother Lycus. After Labdacus came at age, Lycus restored faithfully the Kingdom to him, wherefore the King dying also not long after, and leaving his son Laius a Child but of one year old, having experience of his faithfulness, he committed him to his protection. Afterwards Amphion and Zeibus, the sons of Antiope, invaded Thebais in revenge for their mother's hard usage and Captivity, she having been taken by Lycus in Sicyon, or delivered up to him by Lamedon King of that Citie, when he led down thither an Army, at the desire of his dying brother, to revenge him upon her and Epopeus, as we before shewed. Lycus meeting them in the field was slain in battel, Thebes lost, and the Child Laius had miscarried, but that some well-wishers to his stock withdrew him out of the danger, lest the posterity of Cadmus should be utterly extinct. Amphion then and Zeibus obtained the Kingdom; said by Homer to have built Thebes, which must be meant of the lower Citie distinct from Cadmia. Amphion was so excellent a Musician, that he is said to have made stones to follow him, wherewith he built Towers about the Citie. He married Niobe, the daughter of Tantalus, and sister to Pelops, which brought him many Children, but boasting her self more fruitful than Laius her self, procured the destruction of them all. For Apollo was commanded to kill the Boyes, and Diana the Girles, whereat she was struck with such stupidity, as she is feigned to be turned into a stone; and Amphion with all his family at length died of the pestilence. Zeibus having his young son killed at unawares by the mother, pined away for grief; so that both brothers being dead, and their families ruined, the Thebans restored the Kingdom to Laius the son of Labdacus.

7. Laius married Jocaste, the daughter of Menaceus, but was admonished by the Oracle to beget no Children, because else he should be killed by his son; which punishment Pelops had prayed might fall on him for stealing his son Chrysippus, begotten on a Concubine. Notwithstanding this he had a son, but as soon as he was born he thrust his feet in Iron fetters, and exposed him as a prey to wild beasts. Yet, either by those that had this charge, or others that found him, he was carried to Polybus, King of Corinth, who caused his feet to be healed (from the swelling of which he had the name of Oedipus) and brought him up. Many years after when he was grown, Laius, either hearing some rumor concerning him, or carried by natural affection, went to enquire of the Oracle what had happened to his son, and at the same time it chanced that Oedipus, having heard of some design against himself, went thither also to enquire who were his true Parents. They met in Phocis, where Laius bidding the other somewhat imperiously to give way, Oedipus moved with choler killed him, being utterly ignorant who he was.

Oedipus.

8. Laius being dead, Cron the brother of Jocaste (called also Epicasté) seized upon his Kingdom, and kept it for some time, till Oedipus explained the riddle of Sphinx. This Monster, which the Bæotians also called Phix, is feigned to have had an head and face like a woman, the hinder parts like a Lyon, and wings as a Bird, and keeping upon the Hill Phicion, or Phiceon (so named from her) she proposed riddles, which whosoever could unriddle should have Jocaste in marriage with the Kingdom; but if nor, she presently devoured them. Her riddle to Oedipus was this: what is it that which goeth both on two Legs, three, and four? Many having lost their lives for a misinterpretation, he expounded it to be meant of a man, who when an Infant creepeth on hands and feet, when arrived at ripeness of age goeth upright on legs, and when he cometh to be old useth a staff. Some think her a deformed, and savage kind of woman, that living on prey used to lie in wait for passengers. But Pausanias writing that she was the bastard daughter of Laius, others judge her to have been for her wisdom preferred to determine the pretences of such as claimed the Kingdom, and that those who

9. Oedipus then married Jocasta his own mother, not knowing what she was to him, and obtained the Kingdom of Thebes. Diodorus telleth us that he had two sons by her, Eteocles and Polynices, with as many daughters, but others say he had them by Euryganea, the daughter of Hyperphus. At length all came to light; both that he had killed his father, and married his own mother, whereupon she presently hanged her self, and his sons kept him up close for the filthinesse of the thing, as some say, though others will have him driven from Thebes, and that going to Theseus King of Athens, he there died a little after. Polynices, while his father was yet living, went to Argos, where he married Argia, the daughter of Adrastus; but after his death returned to Thebes to succeed him in the Kingdom. The two brothers then agreed to reign by turns; but Eteocles, having the first course refused to yield up his power at the time prefixed; so that Polynices was glad to return to Argos. At the same time there happened to be with Adrastus one Tydeus, the son of Oeneus, who having killed a man in Aetolia, fled also to him: both these he kindly received, and by direction of the Oracle making them his sons-in-law, promised to restore them to their Countreys and Estates. Beginning first with Polynices, he sent Tydeus in Ambassage to Eteocles, who caused fifty men to lie in wait for him by the way, but he killed them all, and returned safe to Argos. Adrastus, to revenge the injury, made all possible preparation for a War, and invited all the best Souldiers from all quarters to the expedition. Seven Eminent Captains gave their names, whereof Amphiaraus, who had married Eriphile, the sister of Adrastus, was Chief, though of so ancient a thing as this Theban-war, there can be little certainty.

10. Having each of them his several Army (or Company rather) they marched to Thebes, which they besieged, and divided themselves according to the Gates of the Citie. Eteocles made all preparations for defence, assigning to every Gate its Officer, and consulted Tiresias a Prophet, then blind, concerning the event of the War. He answered, that the Thebans should overcome, if Menaceus, the son of Creon, would devote himself as a sacrifice to Mars, which he presently did, killing himself before the Gates. The Thebans then made a sally, but were beaten back to the Walls, which, when the Argives approached, Capaneus, one of the seven Captains, first of all others set to Ladders, and mounted; but he being killed, the other retreated, and many of them were slain in the pursuit. After this it was agreed that the two brothers, in a single Combat, should decide the quarrel, and so doing they mutually fell by the hands of each other: then followed a very sharp fight wherein all the Captains that followed Adrastus were slain, and he onely escaped by the swiftnesse of his Horse Arion. Yet this victory cost the Thebans so dear, that being themselves almost ruined, hence Cadmea victoria became a proverb. This War fell out 28 years before that of Troy.

Ten years after the War, when Laodamus was now grown up, the sons of those Captains that had been slain, called Epigoni, made an expedition against Thebes to revenge the death of their fathers. Consulting before-hand the Oracle of Delphos about the successe, they were bidden to chuse Alcmeon, the son of Amphiaraus, for their General, which having done, and marching into Thebais, they wasted all the Countrey round about the Citie. Hereupon the Thebans made a sally, and a sharp conflict ensued, wherein Laodamus slew Agialeus, the son of Adrastus, and was himself killed by Alcmeon, though Pausanias saith he escaped out of the fight, and fled to the Illyrians. After this the Citie was taken, and with other plunder, Tiresias the Prophet was sent as a present towards Delphos; but drinking by the way presently died.

This is he, who is said to have experienced both Sexes, and lived seven Generations; even from the dayes of Cadmus to this time. The Beotians chose Peneleus for their Captain, because his son Tisamenus was then but young, and he was also slain in the War by Euryphylus, the son of Telephus, who after the death of Achilles, brought Auxiliary forces out of Mysia unto Priamus.

12. Peneleus being dead, Tisamenus, the son of Thersander, reigned at Thebes. His son Antefion left this place, and went to the Dorians; wherefore Damafichthon, the Nephew of Peneleus, and son of Opheltas, was chosen in his room. After him followed Ptolomeus, and then Xanthus the last King of all, who was slain by Melanthus the Messenian in a single Combat, in behalf of the Athenians, about Celene, a place situate upon the Borders, as we have * already shewed. This hapned 56 years after the destruction of Troy, 24 before the descent of the Heraclide, 57 before the death of Codrus the last Athenian King, 252 before the first Olympiad, A. M. 2877. After his death, together with the possession of Celene, the Thebans quitted the Government of Kings, it seeming good to them no longer to be Governed by a single person, but by many, as Pausanias writeth, from whom yet it appeareth not what kind of rule was erected; whether an Oligarchy at first, or the whole power was assumed by the people, which we know assuredly exercised it in after times, in a Democratical way. Such was the Government when the Persians had obtained the Empire of the East, and Greece it self most flourished; at which time, in the entire History of this Countrey we shall hear further of the Thebans.

The Original, and Kingdom of Rome, Contemporary with the Babylonian Empire.

SECT. I.

The Original of the Citie of Rome.

The ancient inhabitants of Latium.

1. THe Citie of Rome was seated in Latium, the Western tract of Italy, upon the River Tiber. The soyl, for as much as can be known, (saith Dionysius) was first inhabited by the Siculi, who held many other places of that Countrey. These were expelled by the Aborigines, who being the posterity of the Oenotrians (who seized upon that Tract lying near Tarentum) were consecrated first to the gods, & according to the custom of the Countrey, then sent out to seek them new seats, and fortunes. The Oenotrians came out of Lycaonia (afterwards called Arcadia) to seek a more commodious habitation under conduct of Oenotrus, the son of Lycaon, from whom they received their name. These Aborigines here settled, were forced to admit of some Pelasgians to live amongst them that fled from Hemonia (since called Thessaly) where, for some time they had continued, and afterwards certain Arcadians who followed Evander, son to Mercury, and the Nymph Themis, from a Town of that Countrey called Palantium, which name they gave to an Hill on which they fixed, afterwards reckoned amongst the seven belonging to the Citie. Not long after, the Greeks will have Hercules come into these parts, as he was returning home from his expedition into Spain, and the Western Regions, and here to have left some Peloponnesians, who settled themselves upon the Hill called then Saturnius, and afterwards Capitolinus, at what time Faunus reigned over the Aborigines.

Picus.

2. The Father of Faunus is said to be Picus the son of Saturn, who flying out of Crete from his son Jupiter, came into this Country, and here hiding himself, gave occasion for the Region to be called Latium. Some say the Father of Picus was rightly called Sierces, and surnamed Saturn, from whom the Laurentine Kingdom took it's beginning, named from Laurentum the Town, and that from Laurus or Laurel. Picus had this name from the Bird Picus (a Wood-pecker) which he used, by it's flying to foretel things to come, as Festus noteth out of Verrius. Plutarch saith, that he was by the forceries of his wife changed into this Bird, in the likeness of which he gave forth Oracles, and answered questions; and agreeable hereto, Dionysius of Halicarnassus compareth this Bird with the Dove of Dodona, as performing that to the Aborigines, which it did to the Ibesprotes. But Servius thinketh all this feigned, because Picus was a Soothsayer, and observed the flying of this kind of Bird; and Bochartus telleth us, that Picea in the Phœnician dialect signifieth a Seer or Prophet; whence, as Phix amongst the Bœotians was taken for a cunning woman, so he for his skill in such matters, might, according to the termination of Latin words, have the name of Picus. This man, who in Suidas hath the name of Jupiter, (except Jupiter of Crete, that stole Io, was called Picus) begat Faunus or Fatuns, and a daughter named Fauna, and Fatua, which being in a furie would also foretel things to come; whence such as were thus taken, were said Fatuari. Being killed by Faunus her brother and husband, as it seemeth, she was worshipped as a goddess; and called Bona Dea, because she was so modest, that never any man saw her except her husband. Dionysius maketh this Faunus the son of Mars. He is feigned to have served under Bacchus in his Expedition into the East; and this is their reason, because indeed he was the same with Pan, the constant companion of Bacchus. (a) One writeth that he was called also Sylvanus Inuus, and Pan by some. (b) Another saith, his name in Latin was Inuus, and in Greek Pan. So that his reigning in Latium was a meer Fable, invented by some who knew not that he was the same with Pan the Arcadian, whose Worship was brought into Italy by Evander.

3. After him reigned Latinus, as the story goeth, whom Festus maketh his son, but others, as we have it from Dionysius, fathered on Hercules, who begat him on a certain Hyperborean Virgin, which having received as an Hostage from her Father, he kept untouched till he came into Latium, and afterwards gave her in marriage unto Faunus, therefore accounted the Father of Latinus. Fifty five years after the departure of Hercules, and in the 25th of the reign of Latinus, Æneas with his wandring Trojans arrived at Laurentum, not far from the Mouth of Tiber. Livie saith, it is most certain, that Troy being taken, the Gracians raged against the other Inhabitants, but obtained from Antenor and Æneas (the son of Anchises, who was son to Capys, and grand-son to Affaracus, the brother of Ilus King of Troy) both for the friendship which had past betwixt them and their families, and because they were ever for peace and the restitution of Helena. But Dionysius relireth out of Hellanicus, that the lower part of the City being taken, Æneas with his associates that came from Ophrynyum and Dardanus, to the aid of Ilium, timely perceiving it, retired into the Castle, where were the Idols and much treasure, protected by the most valiant Soldiers. Higher also becook themselves such as escaped the fury of fire and sword; and they easily repelled the force of the Enemy; but Æneas considering that the City could no way be preserved, resolved to quit the Castle as might stand with the safety of the Company. He therefore sent out with a guard the aged an infirm, in the mean time diverting the Enemy, and then marched out in order of battle, when Neoptolemus and the Achaans had now taken part of the Fortifications. Whilst the Greeks were busied in plunder, they all escaped to the Mount Ida, where, fortifying themselves, the same night others flocked to them out of Dardanus, Ophrynyum, and the rest of the Trojan Towns, expecting till the Enemy satished with the destruction of Ilium, would draw off and return into his own Country.

A. M. 2821.]

SECT. I.

4. But the Achaean having wasted the City, and lesser Towns, provided also to storm the Hills; when a Treaty was desired by the Trojans. It was there agreed, that Aeneas and his Companions, with such things as they had, should depart out of the Country under safe conduct; whereupon he first sent away his eldest son Ascanius, with part of his associates (whereof the greater number was Phrygians) to the Lake Ascanius, for that he was desired by the Inhabitants of that Country to be their King. He continued not long with them, for the Scamandride, with others of the family of Hector, now dismissed out of Greece by Neoptolemus the son of Achilles, coming to him, he returned with them to Troy, and restored them to their Father's Principality. Aeneas with the rest of his children, Anchises his Father, and his household, passed over the Hellepont into a Peninsula called Pallene, whence he sailed to to the Island Delus, thence to another named Cythera, over against Peloponnesus. Touching at the promontory Cinethium (so called for that Cinathus a Trojan was here buried) they renewed their friendship with the Arcadians their kinsfolk, and passed on to the Island Zacynthus, which was so named from Zacynthus one of the sons of Dardanus. Thence they came to Atium, and so to Ambracia, from which Bay Anchises directed his course towards Batrosus an Haven of Epirus, and Aeneas by land went two dayes journey to the Oracle of Dodoria, which having consulted about new Seats, in four dayes he came to the Navy at Barroius. From this Haven sailing towards Italy, they touched upon some parts thereof, but passing into the Straights of Sicilie, they fell also upon that Island, where leaving part of their Company, they passed over and landed at Laurentum, the place appointed to put an end to these wanderings. This account Dionysius giveth us, as most probable, amongst others which he briefly toucheth. Alexander the Ephesian, as he is cited by Aurelius Victor, wrote that Ilium being betrayed by Antenor, Aeneas took his Father upon his back, with his gods, and his little son in his hand, and thus loaded made towards Ida, whither being suffered to come by the Greeks (who were much moved at his piety) he there built ships, and by the advice of an Oracle came into Italy. The piety of Aeneas is much spoken of, and commended by many; and amongst others, by the pen of Xenophon, that Antick Muse; but some wrote that he joyned with Antenor in betraying the City.

5. The Trojans landing at Laurentum, there pitched their Tents in the place called Troy from this occasion, distant from the Sea about half a mile. Taking their dinner on the ground, some laid their meat on Parsley, that there grew, or, as some said, on crusts of Bread, which afterwards they did also eat up, and then understood that they had fulfilled the Oracle, which bad them go so far Westward, as till they should eat up their Tables, and then take the conduct of a Sow, which they should follow, till she lay down, and in that very place build a City. Now was Latinus busie in War against the Rutuli his neighbours, as some wrote, he was first overcome by Aeneas, and then made peace with him; but others say, he first sent to expostulate the injury offered him by these strangers in the invasion of his Kingdom, and then, understanding who they were, agreed to give them all the ground lying five miles about the Hill where the Sow lay down, upon their ingagement to assist him in his War against the Rutuli. This accord made, and Hostages delivered on both sides, they soon utterly subdued the Rutuli, and then built up the Trojan City which was called Lavinium, as the Romans said, from the daughter of Latinus. Virgil too much indulging his Poetick fancie, in imitation of Homer, bringeth Aeneas into Italy not till the eighth year after the destruction of Troy. But Dionysius and Solinus (out of the Annals of Cassius Hemina) write, that he arrived at Laurentum in the second year, and the later saith, with no more than 600 followers.

6. Aeneas in the third year after his departure from Troy, and the second of his abode in Italy, reigned onely over the Trojans, but the next brought him also the Kingdom of the Aborigines, by the right of his wife Lavinia, daughter to Latinus now deceased, and the favour he had purchased of this people, people, by his conduct against the Rusuli. For they had again revolted through the procurement of a certain fugitive named Turmus, who being the Nephew of Amata, Latinus his wife, out of indignation that a stranger should be preferred to the marriage of Lavinia, before him, at the instigation of Amata and others, revolted to the Rusuli with a party of men which he commanded. Livie maketh him King of the Rusuli, and to have made War upon Latinus, because he had first made him a promise of his daughter. The Aborigenes had the victory, but lost Latinus in the battel. Dionysius saith, that Turmus was now also slain with many others, but Livie will have him again to renew the War, and to call in Mezentius King of the Hetruscans, who was already jealous of the growing power of the Greeks. Aeneas, to oblige his new Subjects, caused both them and his own Country-men, to be called by the common name of Latini; but engaging in another great and bloody battel with Mezentius, which night onely interrupted, he was never seen more, by some thought to be taken up to Heaven, and by others drowned in the River Numicon. This happened to him in the fourth year of his reign over the Latines, and the seventh after the destruction of Troy. He was honoured by a Chapel dedicated to him, under the title of Jupiter Indiges.

Ascanius.

7. Ascanius his son succeeded him, who before was called Enryleon, till his name came to be changed in their flight from Troy, as Dionysius writeth. Some thought him the same with the eldest son of Aeneas by Crensa, and called Iulus, from whom the family of the Julii took it's name; but others accounted him younger. Mezentius grew very high upon the death of Aeneas, and besieging Lavinium, forced the Latines to submit themselves; but requiring all their wine to be yearly sent as a tribute into Hetruria, they would not endure so harsh terms. and encouraging themselves, fell upon their Enemies at unawares, and, killing Lausus the King's son amongst many others, forced him to submit to equal conditions. Thirty years after the founding of Lavinium, Ascanius led out a new Colony, and built another City called * Alba Longa, whither he betook himself, leaving the old to his Mother Lavinia, who, if his own Parent, managed the Kingdom for him in his nonage. He died in the 28th year of his reign, and was succeeded by Sylvius, whom some make his son, others his brother, saying, that Lavinia being left with child by Aeneas, for fear of Ascanius fled into the Woods, and there was delivered of this child, who from the place of his birth had the name of Sylvius. Iulus the eldest son of Ascanius contended with him for the Kingdom; but the people conceiving it to belong to him of right, as the Nephew of Latinus, gave the Priesthood to the other, in whose family it thenceforth continued. From Sylvius all his Successors were surnamed Sylvii; whereof the first (after he had reigned 29 years) was Aeneas Sylvius his son. Aeneas having reigned so many, left Latinus his Successor, whom after 51 followed Alba for 39. After Alba, Capetus reigned 26 years, Capys 28, Calpetus, or Carpenus, 13, and then Tiberinus eight, who being drowned in the River Albula, bestowed on it the name of Tiber. After him Agrippa reigned 24 years, then Alladius (called also Aremulus and Romulus Sylvius) 19, who was very wicked and tyrannical, insomuch that he would counterfeit Thunder, desirous to be accounted a god by his Subjects, and justly perished by Thunder and inundation through excessive rains. Aventinus succeeded him, who gave name to one of the seven Hills, and after 37 left Procas Sylvius his Successor.

8. Procas the thirteenth King of Alba left two Sons, Numitor and Amulius, whereof the later and younger violently thrust his brother from the Kingdom, and that he might have no posterity to revenge the injury, caused his son to be made away in a pretended hunting, and his daughter Rhea to be devoted to the service of Vesta, and a single life. In the fourth year of her Priesthood, as she was going to fetch water for the service of the goddess, she was light upon by some one and ravished: some said by one of her lovers, others by Amulius himself, who came disguised upon her, rather out of desire desire to make an occasion against her, than for any affection; but for credit of the cause the fact is laid upon Mars, in whose grove it was committed, and who came to her as 'tis said in a terrible manner with Thunder and Lightning. Rhea (called also Sylvia and Ilia) conceived with two boyes, and when they were born, she was either put to death, or condemned to perpetual prison, and they were thrown into the River. At the fall of the water they were left upon the dry ground, and a Wolf moved with their cries came and suckled them with her teats, till they were taken notice of by Faustulus the King's Herdsman, who brought them home to his wife Acca Laurentia, that had been newly brought to bed of a stillborn Child. Some thought that Numitor, aware of his brother's intention to make them away, caused other two to be brought in their rooms, and gave his two Nephews to be nourished by this Faustulus. Others write that this Acca Laurentia was but the Paramour of the Herdsman, and for the naughtinesse of her life called Lupa (Lupanaria amongst the Romans signifying brothel houses, and Lupa a Strumpet) whence the fable arose that the Children were nourished by a Wolf. Their names were Romulus and Remus.

Remus

9. The boyes grown up proved active and couragious suitably to their birth, but being educated as was agreeable with the fortune and employment of their Foster-father, they had occasion to fall out with the Herds-men of Numitor, and Remus being taken prisoner was carried before the King. Now did Faustulus reveal the whole matter to Romulus concerning their Original, who got together a company of Herds-men, and therewith falling upon the Palace slew Amulius, and restored their Grand-father to the Kingdom. After things were settled at Alba, the young men had a desire to build a Citie in the place where they had been brought up, which their Grand-father well approving gave them the ground, with such of his subjects as he knew to be of his brothers faction, and all others that of their own accord would willingly go out in this new Colony. Most of the Trojans gave their names (whereof continued to the time of Dionysius almost 50 families) the inhabitants of the place also as many as were left about Palantium and Saturnia were taken in, and the multitude divided into two parts, that by emulation the work might proceed with greater expedition. But what was intended for a laudable contention grew to a greater inconvenience; for hereby were two factions made, which preferring the brothers each before the other raised in them ambitious desire of preheminance. This soon appeared in that they could not agree about the place; Romulus would have the Palatine Hill (or Palatium) to be taken in, and Remus contended for Remuria, though on the other they were educated. The matter was brought before their Grand-father, who advised them to go apart, and observe the flying of Birds; and to whom hipped the most lucky flight, he should be accounted the Author of the Colony. Romulus went to the Palatine Hill, and Remus to the Aventine near adjoining. Remus first had six vultures come flying by him; but Romulus his flock doubled the number, so that both of them were saluted King, and neither would give place to the other.

Remus killed.

10. The contention grew so sharp as to proceed to a fight, wherein Remus had the worst of it, and was slain; which Dionysius thinketh the most probable opinion. Others write that he scoffed at the lownesse of the Wall which his brother had made, saying, it would easily be passed over by Enemies, and therewith leaped over it himself, for which he was presently killed by one Celer, who oversaw the work. Romulus compassed in the Palatine Hill, and made that the Rudiments of the Citie, with an Heifer and a young Bullick joyned together plowing up a furrow where the Wall should be reared, which use was afterwards observed by the Romans, both in the building, and riving of Cities. This is the most common, and received opinion about the Original of Rome, which some make built at another time, and by other founders. Cephalon Gergithius a most ancient Historian wrote that it was built in the second age after the Trojan War, by Romus, one of the four sons of Enneas; with whom many other Authors agreed. Others made the founder

ning the founder of it to be Aeneas himself, whom they will have come in company with Ulysses into Italy. Aristotle the Philosopher wrote, that part of the Achaens themselves, in their return from Troy, were by Tempests driven upon Italy, and forced to plant themselves in Latium. Callus the Historian, who Recorded the Acts of Agathocles, mentioned a Trojan woman, called Roma, that being married to Latinus, King of the Abrigenes, bore to him two sons, Romus and Romulus, who building the Citie, named it Rome after their mother. Xenagoras reckoned up three sons of Ulysses by Circe; Romus, Ascius, and Ardea, all which built Cities of their own name. Dionysius of Chalcis, with others, would have this Romus to be the son of Ascanius; some of Emethion, and some of Italus by Eleitra the daughter of Lasinus. Besides these, many other Greek Authors dissented about the founders of the Citie.

11. Neither have Roman Writers agreed amongst themselves. Some of them would have the sons of Aeneas to be founders of the Citie, v. z. Romulus and Romus; others, his Nephews by his daughter, which he gave up as Hostages to Latinus, King of the Abrigenes. Some write how Ascanius being left Heir by his father, divided his inheritance with Romulus and Romus his brethren: he himself built Alba and other Towns, Romulus Capua, so called from Capys his great Grand-father, Anchisa from Anchises his Grand-father, and that place afterwards called Janiculum, which he named after his father Aeneas; then lastly, Rome after his own name, which being afterwards desolate, the Albans repopled by a Colony led thither by Romulus and Romus. According to this History, this Citie should have been twice founded: First, not long after the Trojan times, and then again in the fifteenth age after; but more than this, Antiochus of Syracuse mentioned a third Rome that must have been before the War of Troy, writing, that from Rome came a certain Sicilian fugitive to Morges, the son of Italus, King of Italy. By reason of this uncertainty of the founders, some, whose prejudice against the Empire of the Citie moved them with envy, accounted it no other than a receptacle, and fortress of Barbarians, Fugitives, and Vagabounds, and were ready to call into question the History of Romulus, as a meer invention made to hide the despicable Original of so great a Commonwealth.

12. Whether it was a new Plantation, or reparation of an old Town, there is great variety of opinions concerning the time thereof. Timaeus the Sicilian made its foundation contemporary with that of Carthage, and the 38 year before the first Olympiad: But of those which seem to approach nearer to truth, some place the foundation of it in the sixth Olympiad; whereof Velleius Paterculus assigneth the first year, others the third; and Varro, from the opinion of Tarentinus a most excellent Mathematician, the fourth: which opinion is followed by many Authors of great note (besides Augustus, Claudius, Severus, and Philip, Emperours in their Secular Games) as Plutarch, Tacitus, Dio, Gellius, Censorinus, Onuphrinus, Cesar Baronius, Torniellus, Joseph Scaliger, and Jacobus Cappellus. Solinus will have Pomponius Atticus, and Cicero, to reckon from the third year of this Olympiad; but as Pliny, Paterculus and Livy, so Cicero varieth, sometimes counting from the Calends of January of the foregoing, one while of this, and another of the following year. M. Porcius Cato knowing that Rome was built something before the seventh Olympiad, not standing upon minute and scrupulous deductions, began the Era of the Citie from the first of January that fell in the first year of that Olympiad; and so the year of his own Consulship he said to be the 758 year of the Citie. This Era is followed by the Fasti Capitolini, Solinus, Eusebius, Dionysius of Halicarnassus, (who taketh pains to prove the account good) Polybius, Sigonius, Pipinus, Occo, Goltzius, Isaacus Casaubonus upon Polybius, and others. Fabius Pictor wrote that Rome was built in the eighth Olympiad, the reason whereof, as Cappellus thinketh, is, because Romulus might then have finished the Wall and Ditch; some deriving the Era of a building from laying of a foundation, and others from the finishing of the structure. Lastly, L. Cincius, as Dionysius informeth us, held that the Citie was built in the second year of the twelfth Olympiad. In this great variety of opinions we have rather more reason to approve that of Varro the most learned of all Romans, which placeth the beginning of Rome in the fourth year of the sixth Olympiad, the sixth of Jotham King of Judah, and the seventh of Pekah King of Israel, about the time that the Ephors were made at Sparta, in the dayes of Charops the first Archon at Athens for ten years. The founding of Rome.

1. Romulus being 18 years old, laid the foundation of the Walls on the (a) eleventh day before the Calends of May, (which answereth to the fourth of October, after the Julian account) betwixt the hours of two and three, The Sun being in Libra, and the Moon in Taurus; Jupiter in Pisces; Saturn, Venus, Mars, and Mercury in Scorpio, according to the Computation of Tarrutius the most noble of Mathematicians. (b) Varro, (c) Ovid, and several others write that Rome was founded on the Parilia, or Palilia. Festus telleth us that Parilia were so called a Pariendo, from bringing forth; those Stars in the head of Taurus, (or which make up the head of themselves as Gellius criticizeth against Tiro) named Hyades, and under which Rome was founded, being also called Parilicium, and Palicium Sydus. Servius noteth that Pales was the Roman Goddesse of fodder, to whom a solemnity being observed on the eleventh of the Calends of May, it had the name of Palilia. Cappellus thinketh that according to the mind of Tarrutius, the first year of the Citie commenced from the first of January, and Capricorn, in the new Moon, three moneths after the foundation was laid.

The number
ny.

2. The number of the Colony amounted scarce to 300 horsemen, and 3000 foot, wherewith Romulus (which some make but the diminutive of Romus his true name) planted this new Citie, called Rome after himself. To increase the number of his Citizens, he opened a Sanctuary to all malefactors, and discontented persons, which then resorted to him in great numbers from the Countreys adjoyning. Setting about the frame of the Commonwealth by his Grandfathers advice, he remitted it to the choice of the people what kind of Government they would have, whereby obtaining the Kingdom in way of gift his power became the more plausible. He divided the people into three Tribes, every Tribe into ten Curia, and every Curia into ten parts or Decuria, over all which he appointed Officers. According to the number of the Curia he divided the grounds into thirty parts, onely excepting one portion for publick use, and another for superstitious Ceremonies. He made a distinction of his people according to honour and dignity, giving to the better sort the name of Patres, either for that they were elder, had Children, for the Nobility of their stock, or if detractors may be heard, he therefore named these Patricii, because they alone could shew their fathers, the other multitude being a rable of fugitives that had no free and ingenuous parentage; wherefore when an Assembly of the people was called by the King, the Patricians were by a Cryer cited by their own, and fathers name, but the inferior sort, or Plebeians, were gathered together by the sound of Ox horns. Having distinguished his subjects into these two ranks he ordered what each should do. The Patricii were to take care of superstition, bear Offices of Magistracy, administer Justice, and Govern the Commonwealth together with the King: The Plebeians till the fields, feed Cattel, and exercise trades; lest by their meddling in the Government, and by mutual contention of the poorer and richer sort, such seditions might arise as were too visible in other Commonwealths.

the Plebeians, whom they should protect and countenance; liberty being given to the common sort to make choice of whom they would for their Patrons. This custom of Patron and Client was very ancient in Greece, especially amongst the Thessalians and Athenians, where yet the Clients were very imperiously used, their Patrons imposing on them services ill befitting freemen, and bearing them like slaves, if they disobeyed their commands: The Athenians called them Thete for their service, and the Thessalians Penestæ, upbraiding them with their fortune. But Romulus refined the use of Patronage, rendering it profitable unto both. Patrons by him were ordered to advise their Clients concerning Law, of which they were ignorant, and take care of them as well absent as present, as their own children, in what concerned money and contracts, undertaking sures for them when oppressed, and procuring them quiet both as to publick and private business. On the other hand it was the duty of Clients, to help their Patrons with money in the marriage of their daughters, if need should be, and redeem them, or their sons if taken captive: to bear the charges of private sures, or publick fines, and that at their own cost in way of gratitude; to assist them with their purses in defraying the charge of Magistracy, or honourable employments. This was common to both: that neither ought to accuse the other, to give any testimony or suffrage, or to be reckoned amongst his Enemies: which if any one did, he was held guilty of treason by Romulus his Law, and it was lawful for any one to kill him. Hereby, for many Ages, this Patronage continued in force, and was as effectual for love and mutual help as consanguinity or alliance: it was the glory of the Nobility to have many Clients devolved upon them from their Ancestors, and obtained by their own virtue. But not onely the Plebeians in the City found themselves secured by this Patronage, but in proceſſe of time all Colonies, associate Cities, and such as were subdued by war, had their Patrons, to whom many times the Senate would remit such controversies as were brought before it from the said Cities, or Commonwealths, and ratifie their judgement. Lastly, such firm concord followed this constitution of Romulus, that, for 730 years, as Dionysius reckoneth, though many and great contests arose betwixt the Nobility and Commons about the Commonwealth (as is usual in all both great and little States) yet it never came to blood or slaughter, but, mutually yielding and granting, all controversies were composed by civil expostulations; till Carus Gracchus, Tribune of the people, overthrew the peace of the City; after which, they neither spared to kill and banish one another, nor to commit any other wickedness, whereby they might compass Victory and their own devices.

4. After this, Romulus resolved to chuse a Senate, which should assist him in the Government, and from amongst the Patricians selected 100 after this manner. Out of them all he first made choice of one particular man, to whom, when he was constrained to be absent in the wars, he committed the Government of the City: Then he commanded every Tribu to chuse three men, such as were eminent for birth and wisdom; and every Curia to elect three out of the Patricians. This number he called a Senate, either for their age, or virtue; or because, as Festus will have it, nothing was done without their permission, the Senate being named a Senendo. Perceiving after this, that he stood in need of a Guard for his own person, he caused the Curia by their suffrages, to chuse him out 300 young men, (ten out of each) whom he called Celeres from their readinesse to execute his commands, as most have written, or according to Valerius Antias, from their Captain, whose name was Celer. Under him were three Centurions, and other inferiour Officers: this Company with their Spears defended the King in the City, and received his orders: in battels were the first leaders and the keepers of his body, beginning the fight first, and retreating last of all; which custom Dionysius thinketh Romulus to have taken from the Lacedæmonians. Things being thus appointed, he limited unto all their work and honours. The King's duty was to take care of their superstition; to look to the preservation of the Laws and Customs, either natural or written; to decide the most weighty causes betwixt

He was to call together the Senate, assemble the people, first to speak his opinion, and raise what was approved by the major part. This was the King's work at home, who in the Wars had absolute authority. To the Senate this honour and power was given, to debate and resolve about such things as the King propounded, which were decreed by the greater number of voices, as agreeable to the constitution of Lacedæmon, as our Author observeth. To the People he committed three things: to create Magistrates, make Laws, and resolve about War what was propounded by the King; yet so, as that the authority of the Senate interposed. All the whole multitude together gave not their votes, but the Curia apart, and whatsoever seemed good to most, was referred to the Senate, which custom was afterwards changed, when the Senate did not confirm the Decrees of the People, but the People the resolves of the Senate.*

Laws in reference to marriage.

Parents and their Children, &c.

5. For the increase of the City, besides the opening of a Sanctuary (which Dionysius ranketh after this settlement of the civil policy) he forbade, when any Town was taken, that prisoners of ripe age should be slain or sold, or their grounds left untilld; but commanded a Colony to be sent from Rome, to which part of them should be assigned, and some of the strangers to be admitted to the freedom of the City; which device our Author esteemeth of great weight and consequence. He made many good and profitable Laws, whereof most were unwritten. He ordained in reference to marriage, that the wife should be partaker of all that was her husband's, when chaste and modest. If he died intestate, she was his absolute Heir, and if he left children, equally with them. When she offended, she was left to his disposal for punishment, who admitted his kindred to judge with him concerning the fault, if she either violated chastity, or drank wine, which Romulus utterly condemned as an incentive to wantonness. So effectual became this constitution to the preservation of the conjugal knot, that for 520 years there happened not any divorce in Rome, till in the 137th Olympiad, when Marcus Pomponius and Caius Papirius were Consuls, Sp. Carvilius an eminent man, put away his wife; and then, though he swore to the Censors, that he did it onely to provide for posterity, yet was he ever hated by the people. He gave to Fathers absolute power over their Sons, and that for all their lives, either to imprison, beat, carry away bound to rustick labours, or kill; although the son bore the greatest Office in the Commonwealth, or publickly commended and honoured. By virtue of this Law, some eminent Persons making Oration to the People in opposition to the Senate, in the midst of popular applause, have by their Parents been pulled down from their seats, and led away to be punished according to their pleasure: and as they passed along the Forum, none could deliver or rescue them; nor the Consul, Tribune, nor multitude it self, which they had flattered. And because of this absolute paternal dominion, several valiant men have been put to death for their valour shewed in some way against the Enemy, contrary to the direction or command of their Fathers.

6. He compelled parents to educate all their male children and their eldest daughters: he permitted a child younger than three years to be made away, if it was born defective in some member or monstrous; and yet then was it not to be exposed without approbation of the five next neighbours. If any one broke this Law, he, besides other punishment, forfeited half of his goods. The Father was permitted by the Law-giver to sell his Son, and that three times over, if it hapned that he recovered his liberty: a greater power than was had over slaves, who if once made free, thenceforth so continued. All sordid Arts, and such as were subservient to luxury he forbade, which being left to slaves and strangers, for a long time the Romans scorned to meddle with. Two courses of life onely he enjoined them, Warfare and Husbandrie, allowing a Market once in nine dayes. He divided equally to them the grounds, slaves, and money, taken from the Enemy. Concerning injuries, he presently decided all controversies, or referred them unto others, inflicting flitting punish next according to the crime; and seeing the people to be by fear best retained in order, he set up his Judgment-seat in the most conspicuous place of the Forum, where his guard of 300 Cæres, and twelve Sergeants, or Lictors, carrying rods and axes, and in the view of all men, either bearing or putting to death Malefactors, made a terrible shew. This is the form of the Commonwealth, as Romulus first established it, much admired by Dionysius above all the constitutions of his own Country-men the Grecians, whose Religion also (as giving occasion to the vulgar sort to condemn their gods involved in such misfortunes, or to abstain from no iniquity and filthiness to which they heard that their deities were also obnoxious) he esteemeth vain, frivolous, and dangerous, in comparison of that which was instituted by the Roman Law-giver.

The Rape of the Sabine Virgins.

7. Romulus, considering that there were several powerful Nations round about him, which with evil eyes beheld the growth of his City, berought with himself how he might contract amity with them. Concluding, that affinity was the onely means; by the advice and consent of the Senate, he resolved upon a course to provide wives for his Subjects. He caused at the suggestion of his Grand-father Numitor, a Solemn Feast, and exercises in honour of Neptune, to be proclaimed throughout the Country, to which many flocking with their wives and children, upon sign given, his men did hold on such Virgins as were come to see, and violently carried them to their houses. The number of them amounted to 683, for which Romulus chose out so many husbands, and married them after their own Country Rites, making them covenant a Society or Communion of fire and water, which custom continued for many Ages. Some write that this happened in the first year of Romulus, but others assign the fourth of his reign for it, which scarce could be done till matters were something settled. Some delivered, that scarcity of women was the cause of this rape: others thought, that by it an occasion was onely sought for War; but a third party will have, that by this violent act an affinity with the neighbouring Cities was endeavoured.

wars.

8. Some were grievously moved, and others put a good construction upon the business: but at length the matter brake out into a manyfold War, of which that with the Sabines was most grievous. The Cities Canina, Antemna and Crustumium first began, after they could not persuade the Sabines to joyn with them. The two former, inhabited by the Abrigines, Romulus presently subdued, and afterwards the later also, which was a Colony of Alba; the grounds were divided betwixt some Romans, sent thither to plant, and the old Inhabitants, of which such, as would, were made free of the City, and without loss of their former estates, reckoned amongst the Tribes and Curia, to the number of 3000: so that now, the Roman footmen were increased to 6000 men. Upon the Victory over Canina and Antemna, he first triumphed, and designed a plot for a Temple to Jupiter Feretrius (so called from Romulus his bringing home in triumph the spoils of Acron the King of Canina, whom he slew: The spoils were named by the Romans Opima Spolia) The plot of ground was about 15 foot long, and this was the original of the Capitol. Having obtained a great name for his valour and clemency, many eminent men went over to him with their families, amongst whom was Calus, who give name to a hill in the City: and some whole people committed themselves to his protection (having taken example from the Medullini) and received Colonies from Rome. This success the Sabines sore repined at, laying now the blame one upon another, that they had not withstood the beginnings of the Roman greatness: wherefore they resolved to correct their former carelessness by double diligence, and assembling together at Cures, their Metropolis, decreed War against Rome for the spring following, and made choice of I. Tatius their King to be General. Romulus made all possible provision for resistance, fortifying the Capitoline, and Aventine hills. Lucumo from Solonium, a City of Hebruria, brought Auxiliary forces, and Numitor was not wanting to the assistance of his Grand-son.

9. The Sabines having demanded restitution of their Virgins, and to have the authors of the injury delivered up (that they might have a more specious pretence for their actions) received no satisfactory answer, and therefore both parties drew out into the field. The Sabines brought 25000 foot, and almost 1000 horse, and the Roman Army contained 20000 foot, and 800 horse, a very great number for a new builded City. Tatius pitched his Tents betwixt the Quirinal and Capitolian hill, where seeing all places strongly fortified, and small hopes for him to attempt any great matter; as he despaired of doing any good, one Tarpeia, the daughter of Tarpeius who kept the Capitol, called to his men from above, and covenanted with them to betray the place into their hands. Concerning the wages she was to receive, several stories, or fables, are related. It is said, that she required to have what they wore on their left arms, meaning their bracelets, but when she let them in, they threw their Targets which they carried on their left arms upon her, and therewith pressed her to death. Being Masters of the Capitol, they had thereby great advantage to continue the War at their pleasure, and first some light Skirmishes ensued; but at length they resolved to do their utmost on both sides, and for several dayes continued the fight, so long as till night severed them, for the most part with equal success. This made the Sabines seriously berhink themselves, whether they had best carry on the War or retreat; and the Romans were rather more to seek how to hold out; yet neither party would stoop to desire a Treaty. Whilst they remained in this anxious condition, those Sabine women that were married to the Romans, and the cause of the War, through the perswasion of Herfiliæ, one of the principal amongst them, became mediators, and made peace betwixt these Fathers and Sons in Law, after the War had lasted six years. The conditions were, that Romulus and Tatius should reign at Rome, with equal prerogative: that the City from Romulus should be called Rome, but the Citizens Quirites from Cures the native place of Tatius. Such of the Sabines as would, were made free of Rome, and a respect was had of those Matrons that procured the peace, that they which would live with their husbands, should be exempted from all work and service, besides spinning and making of Cloath.

Tatius killed.

10. Some write, that from thirty of these women which undertook this reconciliation, to perpetuate their memories, the Tribes were named; but Terentius Varro denied it, alleging that they had names before, and that by this honour given to thirty the rest of the women were not passed by and discouraged. For five years the two Kings reigned peaceably together, and jointly subdued the Camerini, a Colony of the Albans; but in the sixth, it hapned that some of Tatius his friends plundering the Lavinians, and by him being protected, notwithstanding Romulus and the Senate judged they were to be given up: moreover killing the Ambassadors sent to demand them, wherein they were also born out by him; when he went to Lavinium to sacrifice, or perswade the injured persons to be quiet, the friends of the Ambassadors fell upon and knocked him in the head. Romulus to his great contentment thus freed from his partner, made satisfaction to the injured, and burying Tatius at Rome very honourably, subdued Fidene, a Town five miles off, which had seized on provisions coming to Rome in a time of famine. Thither he sent some of his own to inhabit, according to his custom, and then punished the Crustumini, who had killed those Planters which hee sent amongst them; and over them he obtained his second triumph. The Veii, a most powerful people of Heururia inhabiting a City no lesse than Athens, situated upon a craggy Rock, at some twelve miles distance from Rome, found themselves concerned in what the Fidenates suffered, and by an Embassie required the Romans thence to remove their Garrison, and restore the Inhabitants to their whole demesens. This being denied, they met at Fidene, and there fought two bloody battels, wherein Romulus had the better, and triumphed the third time. Plutarch writeth, that the Veientes ridiculously challenged Fidene to belong to them, and receiving a scornful answer from Romulus, divided themselves into two parts, whereof with one they fought the the Fidenata, and with the other went to meet Romulus, who slew of them above 8000, with the losse of 2000 of his own men. In the next bartel he is fabulously reported to have killed 7000 with his own hand, being half the number that was slain. The Vcientes now betook themselves to intreaties, and entred into a League with the Romans for an hundred years, on these conditions: to quit a great part of their grounds, with the Salt-pits near the River, and give up fifty Hostages of their most considerable families. Romulus triumphed over them on the Ides of October, leading with him their Captain an aged man, who had badly performed his office, for which he was afterwards personated by an old man in all Triumphs.

Romulus
grown tyrannical,

Is made away
by the Senators.

Called Quirinus.

11. This was the last War managed by Romulus, who being grown exceeding high and tyrannical upon his succeſſe, enlarged his prerogative beyond those bounds he had formerly set to it, and made use onely of the Senate to ratifie his commands. Hereby hee contracted the hatred of that Order, (though the Soldiers loved him) which brought him to an untimely death. Some think he was torn in pieces in the Senate house, and the Senators by peece-meal carried out his body under their gown, so that it was never seen. Others wrote, that having drawn out the people to the place called Capra Palus, and there making an Oration to them, a sodain darknesse and Tempest hapned, wherein he vanished and departed from amongst mortals. The Senators took occasion from the secrecy of their fact, and concealment of his body, to perswade the multitude that he was taken up amongst the gods; and Julius Proculus, a man of prime Nobility and credit amongst the Patricians, put all out of doubt, by swearing most religiously, that he appeared to him in the high-way, and told him, that it pleased the gods, from whom he came, so long to let him continue amongst men, till he had founded a City, whose Empire and glory should excel, and then again that he should return to heaven. He bade him farewell, and tell the Romans, that if they did but use temperance and valour, they should in power excel all mortals. And he would be a propitious god unto them, under the name of Quirinus. He lived 55 years, and reigned 37, in which space he much advanced the Sate of the City, which who first planted with him, were not much above 2000 foot, and scarce 300 horse, but when he died, he left of the one kind 46000, and almost 1000 of the other sort. After his Grand-fathers death, he succeeded in the Kingdom of Alba, which he governed by Deputies, continuing his residence at Rome. The day on which he died, was the Nones of Quintilis (afterwards called July) which answereth to the 26th of May, as the Callendar was reformed by Julius Caesar. It was named Nona Caprotina, from the place where he vanished, and Fuga Populi, because the people astonished at the King's death took them to their heels. Tarrutius the Mathematician observed, that the life of this Prince was signalized by three Eclipses of the Sun: one at his conception, which is also the first that is observed by Authors; another the same day he founded Rome, and the third on the day of his death; concerning which, for that the calculation of the former is rather founded upon Astrological than Astronomical Principles, Jacobus Cappellus is to be consulted.

An Inter-regnum for a year.

Numa.

12. Romulus dying childlesse, the Senate for a years space retained the power in their own hands, which is called an Inter-regnum. They governed by their courses, each man five dayes; but the People murmuring, and giving out, that for one tyrant they had got an hundred, at length they resolved that a King should be chosen. The Sabines thought it reasonable he should be of their Nation, not having had any since Tatius, and the other were averse to a stranger, being desirous he should be some one of the Patricians; but at length the Fathers fixed upon Numa Pompilius a Sabine, a man of almost forty years of age, and the most considerable for knowledge and ability of that time, who by consent of the People was advanced to the Government. At first he excused himself; but solicited by his Father, and Marcus his kindsmen, not to let slip so fair an opportunity of his own and Countrie's preferment, he accepted of it. He thought it policy to raise that City by Laws, and religious customs which had been founded by force and Arms, and to often the Genius of it by diversion from warfare, it being as necessary to employ a people well at home as exercise them abroad. He built a Temple to Janus, which was to stand open in time of War, and be shut in peace, as it continued all his reign. But it only hapned so to be twice from his time to that of Iberius Caesar. The first occasion was in the Consulship of Titus Manlius, and Marcus Atilius, after the ending of the first Punick War; and the second in Augustus his reign, after he had subdued Antonia and Cleopatra, at what time there was an Universal peace. Numa disbanded the Royal Guard of the 300 Celeres, as standing in no need of them. To the two Flamines of Jupiter and Mars he added the third of Remulus. To him is also ascribed the bringing in of the Pontifices, whereof he himself was one, and the Original of which name is so much controverted. He also ordained the Festivals Nuns, and the Feciales a sort of Priests which judged concerning the equity of War, and denounced it. His religion much suited, in the manner and strictness thereof, with that of the Pythagoreans, which caused the report of his being Contemporary, and conversing with Pythagoras; although this Philosopher was born 100 years after his death. The reason of this mistake, besides the ignorance of the times, was his familiarity with Pythagoras a Lacedaemonian, who gave him advice concerning the ordering of his Kingdom, travelling in Italy in the sixteenth Olympiad, the third year of which was the beginning of Numa's reign, according to Plutarch.

13. As Pythagoras taught that the principle of all things is not to be perceived by sense, or lyable to motion, but invisible, immortal, and to be apprehended by the understanding alone, so Numa forbade the Romans to use the Image of any God which represented him after the form of a man, or any other living Creature. Neither in these ancient times was there any painted, carved, or molten image amongst them: but for the first 170 years, though they built Temples and Sacred places, yet had they no image at all, because they thought it wickedness to liken more excellent things to those below them, and thought God no otherwise to be perceived than by the mind. Numa divided those grounds amongst the poorer for which Romulus had gained in his Wars, causing his subjects to apply themselves to husbandry, to cultivate their minds as well as the earth; and that he might take away the distinction of Roman, and Sabine, which threatened the State with endless emulation and prejudice, he distinguished them all according to their trades and occupations, making every Art a particular Company and Fellowship. He abated the rigour of that Law made by Romulus, concerning the power of Fathers over their Children, ordaining it should not be lawfull for them to sell such sons as by their leave had married, because it was unjust that a woman which had married a free-man should be constrained to live with a slave. He reformed the year which in the time of Romulus was quite out of all order: some moneths had fewer then 20 dayes, some had 35. and some above; the variety of the several courses of Sun and Moon was not understood; but onely this aimed at, that the year should consist of 360 dayes.

14. Numa considering that a Solar year exceeded the Lunar by eleven dayes (the one consisting of 354. and the other of 365) doubled these eleven dayes, and every other year, inserted a moneth after February, consisting of 22 dayes, and by the Romans called Mercedonius, because at that time wages were wont to be paid. He changed the order of the moneths, assigning to March (formerly the first) the third place; to January the first, and February the second; whereof this was the last, and the other the 11th in the dayes of Romulus. Many have been of opinion, that Numa added January and February to the rest of the moneths, and that formerly the Romans had but 10, which appeareth by the name of December, the last moneth, and because the fifth and sixth moneths from March were called Quintilis and Sextilis. Thus March must have been the beginning of the year, which Romulus so named from Mars his supposed father. The second was April,

so called from Venus, as some thought (because her superstitious worship was performed in it, when the women were Crowned with Myrtle as they washed) or, as others gathered, from the opening of Plants at that time of the year. The third was May, named from Maia, and sacred to Mercury; the fourth was June from Juno as some thought, others deriving the names of these two from Majores and Juniores, the Elder and younger. The rest had their names from their order, as Quintilis, Sextilis, September, October, November, December. Afterwards Quintilis was from Julius Caesar called July, Sextilis August from Augustus. September and October, the Emperor Domitian changed into his own names, but presently after he was killed they recovered their former. Only the two last ever retained their first appellations. Of those months which Numa either added, or ranked, February was so called from the expiations which used to be in it, signified by the word Februa: then they were wont to make parentations to the dead, and celebrate the Lupercalia, certain Sacrifices and Games in honour of Pan, much like to the Sacrifice of Expiations. January was named of Janus, which Numa seemeth to have set before March, because he would shew that Civil vertue is ever to be preferred before what is exercised in War: For Janus was accounted one of the most ancient Gods, or Kings, (from whom reigning in Italy, some make the Romans descended) very studious for civil society and humane converse, and who changed the course of mans life from brutish and savage to an humane and gentle kind. He is therefore feigned to be double faced, because he brought in another fashion of life than what formerly had been, and had a Temple built by Numa with two doors, that were shut in peace, and open in war as was before said. These things Plutarch relateth in the life of Numa.

15. But Livie, and other considerable Authors, (a) Solinus, (b) Macrobius, and (c) Censorinus, write that the first Roman year consisted but of ten months and 304 dayes; six of the months having 30 dayes, and the other four 31 apiece. But this account differing from the course of the Sun, Numa, to make them agree, added 51 dayes to the year. That he might make up the twelve months; from the six, consisting of thirty dayes, he took one day apiece, and therewith made up 57. which were divided into two months, whereof the one contained 29. and the other 28 dayes, and so the year began to have 355. Of this opinion, besides Junius Graebanus and Fulvius, both Varro and Suetonius were, as appeareth out of Censorinus. Yet Licinius Macer and Lucius Peneffella, by the same testimony, (two ancient Writers of Annals) delivered that the first Roman year consisted of 12 months, agreeable to the former opinion related by Plutarch. This a noble pair of modern Criticks prove to have been the truer opinion, affirming that January and February were not added by Numa, but transferred from the end to the beginning of the year, and endeavouring to shew that they who would have the year but to consist of 10 months make it no shorter than they that are for 12. distinguishing it not so much in number as placing of dayes; for the Romans in Romulus his time filled up the year, either by assigning more dayes than thirty to the months, or adding so many in the end thereof as seemed to be wanting. But it sufficeth to have touched these things for the direction of beginners.

16. Numa, to gain credit and obedience to his constitutions, feigned that he had converse with the Goddesse Egeria. He married Tatia, daughter to Tatius the King, by which he had a daughter named Pompilia. Some said he neither had any other wife nor any more Children: but others both as to wife and children dissented from them. He lived above 80. reigned 43 years, and at his death was buried with great honour. His body was not burned (which he forbade) but buried in a stone Coffin under the Janiculum; and the Books of his Ceremonies laid by him in another, which being twelve written in Latine, and as many in the Greek tongue, were 400 years after, when Publius Cornelius, and Marcus Reginus were Consuls, by water brought out of the earth, and for that it was thought wickednesse to have such things discovered vered to the multitude, (from which he also kept them, after the fashion of the Pythagoreans, not communicating discipline by writing but onely by word of mouth) burned by command of the Senate. He kept the State in constant peace, and his ability herein contributed to the general quiet of Italy; so that, by the example of his reign, Plutarch judgeth that saying of Plato to be verified: that the onely means whereby men should be made happy, would be, to have a Philosophical mind, and regal power concur in a Prince, who would make virtue superiour to dishonesty. But the fortune of the succeeding Kings added to the lustre of his glory: For of the five which followed, the last was cast out, and died in exile, and none of the rest obtained a natural and quiet end, according to Plutarch.

Tullus Hostilius.

17. Numa being dead, and the Government devolved upon the Senate, after several Interreges, at length Tullus Hostilius was created King, by the Universal consent of the Citie. His Grand-father was that Hostilius, who most gallantly behaved himself against the Sabines at the Citadel, and married of that Nation the daughter of Herfilius. After much valour shewn he was slain in battel, and left a young son, who at ripeness of age, of a noble Matrone, begat this Tullus Hostilius the third King of Rome, whose beginning, according to the account of Dionysius, was in the second year of the 27th Olympiad wherein Eurybates the Athenian was Victor, when Leostatus was Archon at Athens, in the 83 year of the Citie, and the 31 of Manasses King of Judah. At his first beginning he purchased the favour of the poorer sort by dividing unto them, man by man, that portion of Land which the two former Kings had kept to bear their charges, saying, that his own inheritance would suffice for his own expences. Lest these should want room he took in the Hill Calius, where such as wanted habitation, and now had gotten grounds, built them houses, and he also dwelt himself. He was not onely of a different temper from Numa, but as Livie describeth him, more fiery than Romulus, being as well moved by his proper inclination as the glory of his Grand-father, so that he sought, and greedily imbraced all occasions for War. It was not long ere one was presented from the Albans, who made depredations in the Roman Territories, and were again robbed by the Romans. At that time Caius Cluilius Governed Alba, who envying the growth of Rome, sought to stir up division, and raise War betwixt the two Cities. Dionysius writeth, that for this end he privately procured some to prey upon the Romans, knowing they would revenge the injury, and when they did so upon such as they could take, he perswaded the Albans that they had received a great affront, and excited them to take up Arms.

His War with the Albans.

18. Ambassadors were sent to Rome to demand restitution, and such as had been Authors of the injury to be given up into their hands. This Hostilius being aware of, and knowing that they who first refused to make satisfaction would bear the Odium of the War, caused some of his friends kindly to entertain the Ambassadors, pretending he was by necessary occasions hindered from giving them audience, till he first sent some of his own to Alba to demand restitution. They received a sharp repulse from Cluilius, whereof Hostilius having notice, then gave audience to the Albans, told them how those that he sent, had already received such an answer as argued the league quite broken; whereupon he denounced a just, and necessary War against the Albans, which he would carry on not onely with his domestick forces, but by the aid of his other subjects and dependents. Both parties then made all possible preparations, and drew out their forces to a place afterwards called the Ditch of Cluilius, some five miles distant from Rome. When they expected suddenly to decide the quarrel, Cluilius was found dead in his Tent, whether by some secret practice upon himself, by grief, or any other means is uncertain. Into his place was chosen Metius Sufferius, a man of a turbulent spirit, and scarce able for warlike matters, but thought fit for the place because as great an incendiary as his predecessor. Yet sensible of danger that hung over his head from the Fidenates, (who gaped after the destruction of both) he drew out the War in length, and fearful to lose all, was inclinable to a present composure. Hostilius was now also not averse to a determination of the business, being desirous to punish the Fidenates and Veientes, who, formerly overcome by Romulus, had submitted to the obedience of Rome, and in the dayes of Numa taken occasion of his peaceable Government, to provide for the absolute shiking off of the yoke. This time they thought to present them with a fit opportunity; for gathering together at Fidena they were ready, when the Albans and Romans should in battel have weakened each other, to fall upon both.

19. This plot discovered, wrought so upon both the Captains, that they came to a conference, wherein much being alleged for the justice and right of both parties, at length it was agreed, that three persons on each side should by combat decide the quarrel, and that City, whose Champions should have the better, obtain preheminance and command over the other. Whiles every Officer desired to be one of the three, Suffetius bethought himself of two ternions of brothers that were most fit, as he thought, to take it upon them. One Sequinius of Alba had two daughters, whereof one he married to Curatius his fellow Citizen, and the other to Horatius a Roman. It hapened that both being with child at the same time, brought forth, each of them three sons at the first birth, which their Parents educated as the hope of their Families: to these it was that Suffetius thought the Combat concerning Principality was to be committed, being of equal years, strength, and courage. The motion was embraced by the parties, who dispensed with their private affection (no whit unsuitable to their consanguinity) now that the honour and welfare of their Country was concerned. In the Combat two of the Horatii were slain first, and the third left to deal with three adversaries, spirited afresh by the great advantage they had of him; but warily retreating, so as he might have but one upon him at a time, he slew them all, and Rome in him remained Conqueror. As he returned into the City, he was met by his Sister, that fell upon him with chiding and outrageous words, for imbruing his hands in the blood of his Cousin-germans, whereof one was contracted to her. Now elevated by his succeſſe, and transported with a certain kind of Ecstatical love to his Country, he killed her in the place, as one that preferring private respect before publick good, was unworthy to live. Hereof he was accused, and Tullus neither thinking it seemly to quit or condemn him, as some say, created the Duumviri for capital Judgement, who condemned him; but, if so, there lying appeal from these Officers to the People, the multitude granted his life to the tears of his Father, who not onely took not ill his daughters death, but esteemed it an heroick act, and gave her an ignominious burial.

20. Hostilius dealt moderately with the Albans, but Metius Suffetius their Dictator, or King, thinking his credit much impaired by the event of the Combat, sought how he might betray the Romans, and wrest the power out of their hands. He dealt therefore underhand with the Fidenates and Veientes, who now called to account for their double-dealings, brake out into open rebellion, and by promise of assistance, encouraged them in their enterprize. And when the Romans and the other came to ingage, he resolved to stand neuter till he saw wick party had the better, intending then to cloze with it. The Romans were discouraged to see their friends stand aloof, suspecting the treachery, which Tullus also apprehending, gave out, that it was by his order, as meaning by some stratagem to surprize the Enemy, upon which report the Fidenates and their companions were discouraged, and at length by the Romans, who resumed their courage, put to the rout. After the Victory, he called the Albans together, and laying open the treachery of Suffetius (which favoured the more of Treason, because he had trusted him as his inward friend, and kept him three years in his place) caused him to be pulled in pieces; having beforehand sent Marcus Horatius to Alba, who rased the City, and translated the Inhabitants thereof to Rome, after it had stood about 437 years, according to the account of Dionysius, which is to be preferred before the other of Livy, or that of L. Florus, an Author Alba destroyed.

21. To this end came Alba through the power of it's own Colony, having flourished with riches, numbers of Inhabitants, and been the Mother of thirty Latin Towns. After this, Tullus, having brought fully under the Fidenates, moved War against the Sabines, for robbing such Romans as used to traffick into the Country, and refused to make restitution of the goods: he overthrew them at the Wood called Malitiosa Sylva, and forced them to beg peace. Now also the Latines and Romans fell out, because they refused to yield obedience to these, who challenged it as due to their City, which had conquered the Metropolis. The War was managed for five years, with great moderation; onely, besides continual depredations, Hostilius punished Medallia for an example, which in the time of Romulus had received a Roman Colony. Otherwise no battel was fought, nor any Town taken and plundered, which made both inclinable to peace. But at this time Tullus Hostilius died, having reigned 32 years; some say by Lightning, with his whole Family, for neglect of the Religion instituted by Numa; but most believed him taken away by the practices of his Successor, though Dionysius holdeth their opinion to be improbable.

22. After the death of Tullus, the state fell into an Inter-regnum, according to the custom, and, by the Inter-rex and Senate, Ancus Marcius was elected King, who being confirmed by the people, began his reign in the second year of the 35th Olympiad, wherein Spherus the Lacedemonian was Victor, at what time Damafias was annual Archon at Atheus. He (who according to what Festus writeth, had the Sirname of Ancus from his crooked arm, which he could not stretch out in length) was Grand-son to Numa, by his daughter Pompilia. She was married to Marcus, the son of that Marcus, who being the kinsman of Numa, came with him to Rome, after he had earnestly perswaded him to take upon him the Kingdom, being elected into the Senate, after the King's death, stood in competition with Hostilius for his place, and missing of it laid violent hands on himself. Marcus his son marrying Pompilia the daughter of Numa (whether by Tatia or Lucretia, is uncertain) begot on her this Ancus Marcius, who was five years old at the death of both his Grand-fathers. Ancus considering that much of the superstition brought in by Numa was neglected, set himself to restore the use thereof, alleging to the people, that the diseases, Pestilence, and other innumerable calamities, which had lately fallen upon the City, together with the disastrous end of Hostilius, proceeded from neglect of their gods. He advised them to return to Husbandry, and other peaceable employments, neglecting violence, and the profit that cometh by War. The State being thus restored, he thought as his Grand-father had lived, so to passe his time free from all War and molestation; but he found his expectation crossed, for that he was compelled to be a warrior against his will, and was never free from peril and tumult. Scarce had he began to reign, and had modelled the Commonwealth, when the Latines contemning him as a sluggard, and unfit for military employment, made depredations upon the Roman Territories. Making preparation for War, Livie writeth, that he first denounced it, sending to the Latins beforehand, and now constituted the Office of the Feciales, the Rules whereof he took from the Equicoli an ancient people.

23. He surprized Politorium a Town of the Latines, the Inhabitants of which, he translated to Rome, where, (for that the ancient Romans inhabited the Palatine, the Sabines the Capitoline, and the Cælian had been given to the new Denizens of Alba) to them was granted the Aventine hill to inhabit, other neighbours being added, when, within a while, Tilene and Sicania were taken. The Latines much concerned at this losse, conspired against him for the Spring following; but at several times he defeated their united powers, and forced them to ask peace; so did he the Fidenates, Volscei, Vei-entes, and such Sabines as, not yet having felt the strength of Rome, sorely repined at the successe of an upstart City. He laid a wooden bridge over the River

River Tiber, and fortified the Janiculum on the other side with a wall, having by a bridge united it to the City: and in the middle of Rome he made a prison for Malefactors. Neither did he onely extend the Pomarium or Area of the City, but enlarged it's dominion. For having taken from the Vesentes the Mesian Forrest, his Territories reached to the Sea, upon which, at the mouth of Tiber, he built a Town called Ostia, to secure the profit of Navigation unto his Subjects; for thither Commodities being brought by Ship, were in lesser Vessels conveyed to the City. Ancus Marcus reigned 24 years, coming behind the commendations of none of his Predecessors, either for the glory of Peace or War.

Priscus.

24. Ancus being dead (of a natural death, as should seem by Historians, save that Plutarch, as was said, included him in the number of those four that came to untimely ends) the Senate received power from the People to order the affairs of the Commonwealth, and created certain Inter-eges, who holding the Assemblies for election, L. Tarquinius was chosen King, and began his reign about the second year of the 41th Olympiad, wherein Cleonidas the Theban was Victor, Enochides being Archon at Athens, the 139th of the City, and the 30th of Josiah King of Judah. This man being of foreign extraction, what his Originall was, why hee came to Rome, and how he attained to the Kingdom is to be considered. There was a Corinthian, Demaratus by name, of the race of the Bacchiadae, who trafficking much into Hebruria, changed his Merchandise for Tuscan Commodities, and thereby growing very wealthy, when troubles arose at home by means of Cypselus his Tyranny, with all his goods sailed from Corinth, and fixed himself at Tarquinius a City of Hebruria, where marrying a noble Mitron, of her he begat two sons called by the Hebruscan names of Aruns and Lucumon. Aruns died without hope of issue. Demaratus for grief followed him not long after, so that Lucumon possessed of the whole Inheritance, began to elevate his designs, and to look after some place of Magistracy in his Country. Here he received a repulse, not being able to procure any mean Office, at which sorely disdainig, he heard that Rome received strangers with great courtesie, and gave them free admission unto honours. He then resolved to remove thither with his goods and friends, and after his arrival, was much made of by Ancus, to whom offering his Patrimony for the publick good, as exceeding that of a private man, he received freedom of the City, for himself and followers, with ground to build houses, and for their sustenance. Now he changed his name from Lucumon to Lucius, and his wife from Tanaquil to Gaia Cecilia, and from the place of his birth superadded that of Tarquinius. During the reign of Ancus, who chose him into the Senate, he flourished in great esteem with him, and in the favour of the people; in War no man shewing himself more hardy, nor in Council more dextrous, prudent, or successful; and his integrity seemed such unto the King, that he left him Guardian to his two sons, whereof both were under age, and one but yet an infant.

He obtaineth
the Kingdom.

25. He took advantage at the minority of the eldest, as yet scarce fourteen years old, whom sending out of the way, under pretence of hunting, he made a Speech to the People, saith Livie, wherein he plainly begged the Kingdom, drawing to his private interest the example of Tatius and Numa, whom being meer strangers, they had chosen to reign over them; whereas he was not absolutely such, having lived a good space in Rome, and been trained up both in civil and military affairs, under Ancus: He urged then his liberality towards them; which things not being merely pretended, he obtained his end, and was the first that came to the Government through his own ambitious seeking. His first War was with the Latines, from whom he took several Towns, and amongst the rest Collatia, over which he placed Governour his Nephew Aruns Tarquinius, the posthume issue of his brother, and surnamed Egerius from his poverty (having no Patrimony) and Collatinus from this place, which Surname continued to his Posterity. Having forced the Latines to beg peace, notwithstanding their supplies out of Hebruria, he turned his Armes

SECT. 3. against the Sabines, whom after he had also forced to submit, all Hetruria combined against him, because he retained such prisoners as he had taken of the Auxiliaries sent by them to the Sabines. It was decreed amongst them, that what Town soever refused to joyn against him should not be accounted of their body, and they presently possessed themselves of Fidene a Roman Colony. But he so ordered the matter, that overthrowing them in sundry batrels, and preparing for another expedition, they were humbled; to purchase peace owned him for their Prince, and as tokens of fealty, and allegiance, sent him the Ensigns of Sovereignty wherewith their Kings had wont to be adorn'd. These were a Crown of Gold, an Ivory Chair, a Scepter on the top of which was an Eagle, a Coat of purple wrought with Gold, and a purple Gown pinked; like to the Roabs of the Lydian, and Persian Kings, save that it was not four-square, but of a semicircular figure. Some write also that they sent 12 Axes for so many Cities, it being their custom for every Magistrate in his own Town to have an Axe with Rods carried before him, and in a common expedition twelve to be born before their General. Others contended that Romulus used these Axes and Rods as a Badge of his Authority to punish Offenders; but Dionysius replieth, that Romulus might learn this custom of the Hetruscans, and if not, yet might Tarquinius have these sent to him, seeing the people of Rome afterwards used to send Diadems, and Scepters to such Kings as they confirmed; which these Princes received, although they had worn the same Ornaments before.

26. In nine years he finished the Hetruscan War, and then fell again upon the Sabines (who alone contended with the Romans for superiority) a warlike Nation, possessing a large and fertile Countrey not far distant from Rome. Over them he obtained his third Triumph, and providing for another expedition they prevented him by their intreaties, giving up themselves fully into his power, whom he received on the same terms as formerly he had done the Hetruscans. These were his military actions. At the beginning of his reign, that he might bind the people to him, he chose out an hundred of the Plebeians, who for valour, or wisdom, were most eminent, and added them to the Senate, which now first consisted of 300. Romulus at the beginning chose an 100 out of the first planters, then added an 100 more of the most noble of the Sabines, which with these of Tarquinius were called Patres conscripti, and the list Patres minorum gentium. Zonaras agreeth with Dionysius concerning the number of Senators made by Romulus, adding, that Tatius and he at first consulted with their Senators apart, but at length they were joyned together; so that those are not to be heard, who will have but 200 in all during the time of the Kings, and 100 afterwards added by Brutus. He increased the number of the Vestal Nuns from four to seven, adorned the forum, built the Walls of the Citie (before patched up in haste) with 4 square stones, whereof each was a Cart-load. He caused the common sinks to be made for voiding the filth of the Citie into Tiber; a work so admirable, that Dionysius thinketh, from the magnificence of it, as from the Aqueducts, and the high carried wayes, the amplitude of the Roman Empire appeared: and this is manifested from what C. Aquilius wrote, that those sinks being once stopped, the Censors spent 1000 Talents in cleansing of them. In the Circus Maximus (a place dedicated to the beholding of Games, and exercises, betwixt the Palatine and Aventine Hills) he caused seats to be raised for spectators, whereas before, all stood; and he distinguished their places according to their dignity.

27. Tarquinius intended to add three Centuries of horsemen, named after himself, and his friends, to the former three instituted by Romulus. That King first chose 300 out of the three Tribes, or Legions, and, after the taking in of the Sabines, increased the Legions, so that each contained 4000. (whence it was called Quadrata, as Festus observeth) yet afterwards a Legion comprised full so many men as were found convenient for the service of the Commonwealth. But he was forbidden by Attius Nevius to change the constitution of Romulus, and therefore, without increase of the Centuries, doubled the

the number of the men. This Nevius was the most famous Augur that Rome ever knew, and so well versed in his Art, as he never missed in his predictions. Tarquinius on a time, to try him, asked if that was possible to be done which he had in his thoughts, who answering yea, he laughed him to scorn, saying that he had thought of cutting a Wherstone with a Razor which he held in his hand; but Nevius still replying he should do it, and bidding him to strike hard, he cut thorow it. This much inanced the reputation of his skill, and he flourished thenceforth with great honour, till at length he was suddenly missing, and his body never could be found, which turned to the disquiet of Tarquinius. For the sons of Ancus Marcius, now grown men, grudged him their fathers Kingdom, and often thought of thrusting him out, expecting much from martial men, who generally bore love to their fathers memory. Now they accused him to the people of having made away the Augur (because he had contradicted his devices) and created him some trouble, till Tullus his son-in-law answered the objections, and cleared him of the Calumny. Missing of their design this way, they counterfeited repentance; and being easily reconciled to the old man, out of respect to their father, cloaked their malice for three years. Then they cloathed two of their companions like Shepherds, who going to the Court, and pretending to be slain out, did beat each other, and called loud upon the King for Justice, having at their backs other Conspirators apparelled also in rustick vveeds, who offered to give Testimony on both sides. Being called in to the King they wounded him to death, and betaking themselves to their heels were caught, confessed who were authors of the plot, and received their just reward. To this end came Tarquinius (surnamed Priscus, after his Grand-son of the same name had obtained the Kingdom) about 80 years old, when he had reigned 38 years, and done many and great good Offices for the Commonwealth.

28. Tarquinius Priscus being dead, Servius Tullius his son-in-law succeeded him in the fourth year of the 50th Olympiad, wherein Epitides the Laconian was Victor, when Archestratides was Archon at Athens: concerning whose Original, and private life, something is first to be spoken. A certain man of Corniculum, a Town in Latium, of Royal blood, was slain when Tarquinius took the place, and left his wife Ocrisia big with Child, which woman Tarquinius gave to his Queen Tanaquil. Ocrisia then was delivered of a son in the Kings house, named Tullius, and surnamed Servius by her in remembrance of her bondage. When being an Infant he lay in the Cradle a flame of fire is said to have appeared, and encompassed his head, which raised great expectation of him in Tanaquil a woman skilfull in the mysteries of her Countrey. She brought her husband into a great opinion of him, so that he was educated by them, and answering what had been conceived of him at length was made their son-in-law: then abroad he had Command in the Army, and at home managed publick Affairs for the King when grown old, in all things behaving himself with such integrity, valour, and prudence, as purchased him the love of all the people. Now whereas Tarquinius had at his death no sons (as Dionysius maketh most manifest) but left two Grand-sons both Infants, Tanaquil having a desire that Tullius should succeed him, kept his death private for some time, till he had procured the people to banish the Marcii, giving out that the King, dangerously wounded though not dead, had referred all businesse to him according to his custom. Being secure of the faction of the Marcii, he then carried out Tarquinius to be buried, as newly dead, and as Tutor to the young Children, executed the Office of King, which Tanaquil out of the window had told the people, was her husband's will, when yet she feigned him to be living. But the Patricians grudging Tullius this honour, conspired how, the next time he assembled the Senate, they might constrain him to leave off all the royal ensigs, and then go to an Election according to the usual manner.

SECT. 2. Hereby retaining the power under the notion Guardian; The Patritians were sore agrieved thereat, but the wisest sort thought it not good to stir, though they plainly saw the Authority of the Senate much infringed. For they considered, that if they should make a King of their own body, the people would not approve the choice, and if it were referred to the multitude, Tullius would assuredly be the man: wherefore they thought it more wisdom to suffer him to reign in an unlawfull manner, that so they might ever have some just pretence against him, than by stirring in the matter to procure him a legal Title. But he prevented this their design, going with his mother, mother-in-law, and all his kindred in mourning habits unto the Forum, where he shewed the people how lamentable his condition was through the plots of the Patritians against him, which he deserved no otherwayes than by his good deeds towards the commonality: he laid to their charge that they would call in the Marcii that had murthered Tarquinius, and expose his posterity, who had so well deserved of the State together with himself, to the same cruelty, and in conclusion, offering to lay down all, if such was the pleasure of the people, and undergo any hardship rather than be troublesome, he offered to descend from the Tribunal. A great clamour then arose mixed with prayers and tears of those that besought him to retain the Government, and presently some that were provided before and began to cry out that he was to be chosen King, and the Curia were to be called to the Vote, which thing was instantly resolved by the multitude. He gladly took hold of the opportunity, thanked them that they were mindfull of the benefits received from him, promised larger if he were elected King, and appointed a day for the Comitia, or Assembly, whereof he intended to have present those also that were abroad in the Countrey. At the day appointed for the Assembly of the Curia (called Curiate Comitia) he was chosen King by the suffrages of them all, and so in despite of the Conscript Fathers, who refused to confirm the choice, as the manner was, obtained the principality.

30. Presently after his settlement he accomplished his promise concerning the division of the publick Land to such as were forced to preserve themselves by dayly labour in other mens grounds; and in the Curiate Comitia preferred fifty Laws concerning contracts and injuries. He added two Hills to the former five: viz. the Viminal and Esquiline, in the later whereof he lived himself, and was the last man that enlarged the Pomaria of the Citie, the Wall whereof was never any further stretched out, though very large Suburbs were afterwards added. After he had compassed all the seven Hills within one Wall, he distinguished the Citie into four parts, and instead of three, made four Tribes. And as Romulus distinguished the people according to their Seats and Communion in Sacrifices into Tribes and Curia, so Servius making every one give an account how much he was worth, according to their riches divided them into six Ranks, or Classes. Of these, the first and highest consisted of such as were worth 100000 Asles (each of which answereth to ob. 9. of our money) the next four decreased in value a fourth part, and in the last were contained all such whose Estates were of little, or no value.

31. The Classes he did also so subdivide into Centuries, as 192 were made in all; his design herein being to know certainly how many were fit to bear Arms, and what Treasure might be supplied for Wars, or other occasions. He also first ordained the Lustrum (so named a Luendo, (from paying) saith Varro, as Flustrum a Fluendo) to be celebrated after this Census, or value of each according to their substance. On a certain day after the valuation he enacted that all the Citizens should meet in their Armour in the Campus Martius, every one in his several Classis and Century; where by sacrifice the Citie was expiated, or Lustrated. This solemnity was termed Solitaaurilia, (or rather Suovetaurilia), because an Hog, Sheep, and Oxe were sacrificed, as we read in Quintilian. These things being performed, the Lustrum was finished, which, because of continual change of mens Estates, he ordained should be reiterated every five years, so that he (who begun it according to Lipſius in his twelfth year) celebrated it himſelf four times, according to Valerius Maximus. Every fifth year the Tribute or Taxe (called Cenſus) was paid and thence Lustrum ſeemeth to have had it's name. After the baniſhment of the Kings, the Conſuls managed this buſineſſe, till the Cenſors (Magiſtrates proper to the work) were brought in. Laſtly, Joſeph Scaliger telleth us, we muſt diſtinguiſh the old Roman Lustrum from the later, or Julian, which is onely a Syſteme of four Julian years, whereof the laſt conſiſteth of 366 dayes abſolutely without any overplus of hours. For the Old and Proper Lustrum contained five years complear, which that cited by Cicero, concerning the Cenſors, out of the Laws of the twelve tables, Let them be two, Let them obtain the Magiſtracy for five years, makerh manifeſt; ſo that this Lustrum cannot answer to an Olympiad, properly ſo called; of which beginners are to take notice.

Lib. 3. c. 4.

De legibus l. 3.

32. Of the ſix Classes, which contained 193 Centuries, the fiſt and richeſt was divided into 98; the Equites or Horſmen being counted in: the ſecond into 22, taking in Artificers; the third into 20: the fourth 22: the fiſth 20, and the ſixth and laſt of the poorer ſort, made up but one Century. Men and moneys being levied, according to theſe Centuries, and not by poll (each Century ſuch a quantity) it came to paſſe, that the richeſt being fewer, yet divided into more Centuries (here the word is not to be taken for 100 perſons precisely, being made uſe of onely to expreſſe ſuch a diviſion) were never free from warfare, and contributed alſo more money than the reſt: they that were but moderately or meanly provided of wealth, being exceeded by the other in twenty Centuries, went to the War by turns, and paid but little Tribute: and they that had not any eſtate to ſpeak on, underwent no burthens. This ſeemed very juſt and equal to him, that they who were moſt concern'd, ſhould take moſt pains, and bear the greateſt coſt; the Romans at that time maintaining themſelves in the Wars without any pay from the publick. But the richer ſort ſomething grieved to undergo all charge and danger, for the preſervation of others as well as themſelves, Servius ſufficiently ſatisfied and requited, by giving them in a maner the whole prerogative in matters of State, the poorer being almoſt wholly removed from any power in the Commonwealth, though at firſt they did not perceive it.

Dionys. ut ſuprà.

The Centuries
and Centuriata Comitia.

33. This ſecret lay in the Comitia or Aſſemblies, where the people reſolved about the moſt important affairs; theſe three things being in their power, viz. Creation of Magiſtrates as well Military as Civil, making or abrogating Laws, and decreeing Peace or War; concerning which things the ſuffrages of the ſeveral Curia were wont to be gathered, and the vote of the pooreſt availed as much as that of the richeſt perſon: whence the poorer ſort being much more numerous than the rich, ever prevailed by their Multitudes. Tullius underſtanding this, inſtead of thoſe of the Curia, called the Comitia of the Centuries upon ſuch occaſions. Firſt of all were called the Centuries of the firſt or richeſt Classis, viz. the 18 of Knights or Horſmen, and the 80 of Footmen, which being three more in number than all the reſt beſides, if they all agreed they overcame in number, and there was no need of calling any of the others to the vote. If they diſagreed, the 22 Centuries of the ſecond Classis were called, and if need were, the third Classis, and the fourth, till 97 Centuries agreed in their ſuffrages. If this hapned not after the calling of the fiſth; (192 Centuries being divided equally in number, and of ſeveral opinions) then was the ſixth Classis called containing the laſt Century, free from Tributes and War; and to which ſide it joyned, that overcame.

34. This rarely hapned, and was almoſt impoſſible, the Comitia being ended moſt commonly by the firſt call; but, however, ſeldom came it to the fourth Classis, ſo that the two laſt were ſupervacaneous. By this conſtitution the poorer ſort were deceived, thinking it enough that every man, as well one as another, gave his ſuffrage, and not conſidering that the ſuffrage of the whole Century was but one, whether it contained more or fewer perſons in it. But at length, ſeeing themſelves freed from danger and charge, they were content, and the richer injoying ſuch priviledges for their pains and coſt, were well well satisfied; and this order was kept for many Ages, till afterwards, by the violent actings of some, the common sort got more power, as Dionysius himself observed the innovation to have broken in, in his time. At the first Lustrum were found 84700 Citizens; but to increase their number, hee brought in the custom of making Slaves free of the Commonwealth, whom being before manumitted or set free, he distributed into the four Tribes of the City.

The custom of manumitting Slaves.

35. These Slaves were either made or born such, as Justinian the Emperor distinguisheth them. The former sort were either taken in War (then properly called Mancipia), or bought of the publick, or of some private man. The later, were those that were born either of both Parents being such, or of the Mother onely. At first they obtained their liberty gratis, by well deserving some way of their Masters, or some by payment of money earned by their honest labours, they having a certain Peculium, though all was said to belong to their Masters. But in proceſſe of time, when the Romans degenerated from their former worth and honour, some by Roberies, others by breaking of houses and other villanies, got money, whereby they purchased their freedom. Some by helping their Masters in these things obtained liberty as a reward; others on condition to let them enjoy the monthly allowance of Corn out of the publick purse, or other Largeſſes conferred by Princes upon poor Citizens. Sometimes they were manumitted through the levity and vain-glory of their Lords; some having by their Testaments set at liberty all their Slaves, to obtain a fame of clemency after their death, and that their Funerals might be celebrated by a great train of such as wore caps upon that occasion; in which pomp a thousand Rogues have been seen, who much better deserved hanging. This was laid to the charge of the Mistressse of the World, that challenging the Empire over all, she should defile her self with such impure Citizens, which custom might have been reformed, as Dionysius observeth, by the care of the Censors, who inquiring into the lives of Senators and Knights, never considered what persons were unfit to be admitted Freemen.

power.

36. Tullius not onely clipped the power of the Patritians and Senate, but took away half of the King's Prerogative also. Whereas the former Princes called before themselves all controversies, and took cognisance of crimes as well committed against particular persons as the publick, he separated these causes, making himself Judge of such as respected the Commonwealth, and referring the quarrels of private persons unto others, to whom he prescribed Laws and Rules for to go by. After he had thus ordered the Commonwealth, he caused the Latines to build a Temple at Rome to Diana, upon the Aventine hill, whereat they should meet and feast every year, and so preserve themselves as one body politick in unity and concord. If any controversie arose betwixt particular Towns, it was to be decided by the judgement of others, in such a manner as the Amphyctiones in Greece were wont to proceed, the Council of the Ionians at the Temple of Ephesus, and that of the Doriers in the Temple of Apolla, built by common consent at Epiropeum. These things were done by Tullius at home, according to Dionysius, Livie, and others; to which we may add from Pliny, that he first stamped money with the image of Cattel, whence it was called Pecunia, whereas the Romans before his time used it in a rude lump or Masse. As for his actions abroad; he warred with the Hebrusians 20 years, who refused to obey him, as an obscure man, and renounced the league formerly made. In all battels both with the united Nation and particular Cities, he ever had the better, triumphed over them thrice, and at length forced them to submit to the yoke, on the same terms as formerly Tarquinius had imposed it, except that from three Towns that had been principal in the revolt, hee took part of their grounds, which he divided to those that had newly been made free of the City. Having done these things at home and abroad, when he was grown old and not far from the natural period of his life, he perished by the devices of Tarquinius his son in law, and of his own daughter.

37. Tullius had two daughters by his wife Tarquinia, which he married to their two Cousin-germans, the grand-sons of Tarquinius, joyning them in wedlock according to their age, as he thought it most equal and convenient. But it hapned that they were married together with those of dispositions clean contrary to one another. Lucius the elder, a man of a bold, arrogant, and tyrannical nature, had an honest modest wife, and one most dutiful towards her Father: on the contrary, Aruns Tarquinius the younger, being of a mild and sweet disposition, light on a wicked woman, one of a bitter spirit against her Father, ready for to attempt any thing. Lucius breaking out into passion against his Father in Law, for keeping the Kingdom from him, was still appeased by his wife, but Aruns being content to stay his time, and averse to any thing that might favour of disrespect to Tullius, was importuned ever and disquieted by his wife's earnest and tedious solicitations, to attempt the utmost, though with the destruction of her Father, for the obtaining of the Sovereignty. This woman being impatient of her husband's backwardness, and bewitched by the fury of ambition, resolved to change husbands if it might be, and match her self to the other Tarquin, who suited well with her own humor: she brake her mind to Lucius, telling him of what a sordid spirit they were, to suffer an Usurper so long to possess their Patrimony, railing against her own husband, as a man of a poor and degenerate disposition, and at length made a profer for them two to dispatch out of the way their present unequal yolk-fellows, and then unite themselves in that relation, thereby to bring about their noble and gallant design. He was not backward to a compliance, and the device was accordingly brought about, after which, they resolved by force to expel Tullius from the Kingdom, if hee would not give place on his own accord, raising a faction of the Patritians, that were discontented with the King's new modelling of the State, and the poorest Plebeians, whose assistance they purchased openly, without any respect to right or modesty. Tullius was not ignorant what they intended, and feared also to be destroyed ere hee could provide for his defence; yet thinking it an unseemly thing to make War upon his son in Law, and his own daughter, and punish them as Enemies, he indeavoured by fair means to take them off, before their Friends, blaming, admonishing, and dehorting Tarquinius from the intended injury.

38. Effecting nothing hereby, but the other saying, he would plead his cause in the Senate, he called together the Fathers, and gave him liberty to speak. Tarquin laid his claim to the Kingdom, as his Grand fathers Heir, and alleged, that Tullius kept it from him unjustly, having got all his preferment from their family, and obtained the place illegally, without the consent of the Senate. Tullius replied, that the Kingdom was in the power of the People, to dispose of it to whomsoever they would, which he proved from the example of Tarquinius Priscus, who being a stranger, was preferred before the Marcii. He mentioned how well he had deserved of him, by protecting and taking care of him in his minority; and as for his coming to the Government without the ordinary assent of the Senate, that concerned the Fathers and not him. He then appealed to the Senate, whether ever he had wronged or carried himself arrogantly towards any of them, that they should conspire with his son in Law against him, and in conclusion told them, that if they thought Tarquinius the fitter man, he should not be against the profit of the Commonwealth, but retire to a private life, and let the World see, he could as readily obey as be obeyed, after he had restored the honour to those from whom he had received it. Having struck a great reverence of him into the Senate, he assembled the People, to whom, after a great complaint against Tarquin, and a recital of what good things he had performed for the Publick, he offered to resign his place; but was confirmed therein, and after he refused to give ear to such as would have Tarquin dispatched, with great acclamations brought home to his house by the multitude.

39. Tarquin thus prevented of what he expected from the Patritians, counterfeited repentance, and a desire to be reconciled to the King, which was easily obtained. Covered with this Cloak he laid his designs anew, and being continually solicited by his wife to attempt something worthy of a Kingdom, took his opportunity on a day when most of the people were out of the City, with the Robs of Estate, and all Royal Ensigns as King, to go to the Senate house. There he presumed to call together the Fathers, and, such being Assembled as were appointed beforehand, took possession of the Kings Seat. Tullius having notice hereof, unadvisedly with a few followers, hasted thither, admiring the young mans impudence, whom seeing in his Chair, he fell of rating, and received as bad language; then going about to thrust him out, Tarquin took him up by the middle, and haling him to the door, threw him down the stairs into the Comitium. The old man hardly recovering his spirits, was led homewards, when his daughter, and Tarquin's wife, being come in her Chariot to see the event, saluted her husband as King, but told him his principality would be but uncertain, except, perfecting what he had begun, he would send some who should overtake and dispatch Tullius. He took her advice, and the feat being done, she presently returned home the same way. In her passage when she came to the place where the body lay as yet almost gasping, her Chariot driver stood still, confounded at the sight, and not having room to passe besides it. Hereat she reviled him, and caused him to drive her over it, after she had first thrown her footstool at his head. The place formerly called Cyprius Vicus, was afterwards named Sceleratus from that occasion. To this end came Servius Tullius, after he had reigned 44 years, a man just and moderate, who abolished the envy contracted in his illegal assumption, by his after acts, and was thought, if he had not been prevented, to have intended to lay down his Office, and restore absolute liberty with the care of the Commonwealth to the people, which some of the Patritians perceiving, took in the interest of Tarquinus, that they might preserve their own power.

Superbus.*

40. Lucius Tarquinus obtained the Kingdom by violence, in the fourth year of the 6th Olympiad, wherein Agatharchus was Victor, when Heraclius (or rather Heraclides) was Archon at Athens. By his Tyrannical, and imperious carriage he soon got the surname of Superbus, as that of Priscus, for distinction, was given to his Grand-father. He would not suffer his Father-in-law's body to be buried publicly for fear it should give occasion to the people to rise against him, saying, that Romulus died without burial. He murdered such as he suspected to favour the cause of Tullius; and fearing what end his wickedness might bring upon him, got to him a strong Guard which continually attended his person. He reigned onely by his own arbitrary will, neither standing upon the consent of the Senate nor people. As for the former, he much diminished it by the murder of the richer sort, whose wealth he seized on, for his own use; and resolved to chuse no more in, that it might wear out, and grow contemptible. All controversies he decided himself, assisted by his intimate friends, and took cognizance of all offences, so as he might kill, banish, or fine at his pleasure. He sought to establish himself, and confirm his Tyranny by great alliance, marrying his daughter to Octavius Mamilius, the greatest man amongst the Latines, (being descended from Telegonus the son of Ulysses by Circe) and by false accusation, and a cunning device caused them to stone Turnus Herdonius, who had discovered to them his baseness and villainies. He began a War with the Volsci, which ended not with him, but lasted above 200 years; and subdued the Sabinians who refused to obey him. From the Volsci he took Suessa Pometia, (where getting much plunder he first cast in his head the design of building a Temple to Jupiter, which his Grand-father had formerly vowed) and afterwards the City Gabii by treachery, making Sextus his eldest son to counterfeit flight from him for hard usage, whereby he was made their General, and having according to the secret advice of his father (who in imitation of Thrasylus the Milesian carried the messenger into the field, and cut down the coldest Poppies, dismissing him without any other message) put to death the most principal Citizens, at length easily betrayed it into his hands.

hands. After this he made peace with the Æqui, and renewed the league with the *Tuscan*s. Then went he forward with the work of the Temple formerly designed.

The Capitol.

41. Tarquinius Priscus, in his last War with the Sabines made a vow, that if he got the Victory, he would build Temples to Jupiter, Juno, and Minerva; and with great cost had in his life time levelled the Rock, and formed a plot for the building; but died before he could finish the work. Tarquinius his Grandson resolving to perfect what he had begun with the plunder of Sueſſa, set on all sorts of work-men, at which time as they were digging to lay the foundation, a mans head was found bleeding afresh, which belonging to one called Tolus, thence the building had the name of Capitol. He perfected a great part of the Temple, but could not consummate the work, being prevented by Exile, which was finished by the Citie in the third Consulship after its freedom. It was seated upon an high Cragge, eight Akers in compasse, almost two hundred foot wide on every side, and almost of the same length and breadth, as differing onely in fifteen feet. After it had stood 425 years from its Dedication, it was consumed by fire in the dayes of Sylla, when L. Scipio and Caius Norbanus were Consuls, as Tacitus writeth: Yet it rose again with greater cost and Ornament on the same foundation. Its front looking toward the South, had a Porch, or Gal-

Hist. l. 3. c. 14.

42. In the time of this Tarquinius, another great blessing, as it was counted, hapned to the Romans. A certain strange woman came to the King, offering to sell nine books of the Oracles of Sibyl, which when he refused to buy at her rate, she went away and burning three of them, returned and demanded as much for the six. Being derided for a mad woman, she departed, and burning half of them, returned with the other three, still asking as much as at the first; whereat Tarquin astonished, sent for the Augures to know her meaning, who answered that the nine ought to have been bought, and the three were to be purchased at the same Rate. The woman after the sale and delivery vanished, and never after could be seen. Tarquin chose two men out of the Nobility to keep them, to whom he allowed two publick servants. After his expulsion the people Elected most Noble persons, who all their lives executing this Office were freed from all other burthens, both Military and Civil, to whom onely it was lawfull to look in them. No sacred thing was so carefully kept as these Sibylline Oracles. They were consulted by decree of the Senate when the Commonwealth was disturbed by any seditions, when any great overthrow was received in War, or any prodigies hapned. They were kept by the Decemviri, or ten men appointed to this Office within a Vault under the Capitol, in a stone Chest, till they perished at the burning of the place. Those that the Romans used afterwards were Copied out of such as belonged to other Cities, and private persons, wherein were some supposititious things, which they distinguished by the difference of the Acrosticks.

Sibyls.

Sibyls books.

43. The woman that brought those books to Tarquin, having the name of Sibylla, and there being many found to whom it hath been given besides, something is to be said of those women, for distinction. The first Sibylla, or woman Prophetesse (to which the * Council of Jupiter was communicated, as the word importeth) was a Persian, according to (a) Varro, or else a Caldean, or an Hebrewesse, born at Noe, a Citie near the Red-Sea; her name was Sambetba, her father called Barossus, and her mother Erymantha. The second was a Lybian. Themis of Delphos was the third. The fourth was called Cumæa, because she was born at Cimeriam, a Town of Campania in Italy, near to Cuma. The fifth of Erythra, a Citie of Ionis in Asia, at this day called Cabo Bianco. The sixth was of the Island Samos; her name being Phyio. The seventh of Cuma, and called Cumæa, her proper name being Amalthea according to some; but Herophile and Demophila according to others. Suidas calleth her Hierophile, and saith she brought nine books to Tarquinius Priscus, and demanded for them 300 Philippines, being Gold Coyn of Philip King of Macedonia. Pliny contrary to the common account of Writers mentioneth three books, not nine, and writeth that she burnt two of them. But the eighth was called Hellespontiacæ, being born in the Trojan Countrey upon the Hellepont, in a Village named Marmissus near to Gergesium, which Heraclides of Pontus affirmed to have flourished in the dayes of Solon and Cyrus. The ninth was a Phrygian, and Prophecied at Ancyra. The tenth was of Tibur, by name Albana, being worshipped for a Goddesse at that place, near the Banks of the River Aniene, wherein her image is said to have been found holding a book in one hand. These ten are reckoned by Varro. There were several others also. (b) Strabo maketh two to have lived at Erythra, whereof the later flourished in the time of Alexander. There was another of Colophon, a Citie of Ionis. Elissa and Cassandra, the daughter of Priamus, were accounted Sibyls. There were also a Thessalian, Manto the daughter of Tiresias the Theban, and another of Epirum. Moreover, Carmentis the Arcadian, the Mother of Evander and Fauna, or Fasna, the sister and wife of Faunus, King of the Aborigenes in Italy, might be reckoned in the number. The siege of Ardea.

44. In the work of the Capitol Tarquin employed the people, and in other baser works, wherewith he even tired them out; so that to appease them, and especially to recruit his own Coffers, he made War against the Rutulii, and besieged the rich Citie Ardea, five German miles, toward the East, distant from Rome. The quarrel he pretended to be for that they received the Roman Exiles, and endeavoured to restore them; but the true cause was his thirst after the riches of this most flourishing place, once the Metropolis of the Rutulii. While he lay before this Town, taking great pains to gain it, and the other as eagerly resisting (yet so as he seemed to have hope to carry it) an act of his eldest son Sextus occasioned both the freedom of the one and other Citie. Dionysius writeth that he was sent to Collatia about some businesse concerning the War, and going to the house of Tarquinius Collatinus his Kinsman (Grand-son to Egerius the Nephew of Priscus) he ravished his wife Lucretia, the daughter of Lucretius a Noble Roman. Livy and Aurelius Victor relate that the Courtiers drinking together in the Camp before Ardea, and with them Tarquinius Collatinus the son of Egerius, they fell severally on praising each one his own wife; in so much as proceeding to an earnest dispute, Collatinus said there needed not many words, for that they might see within a few hours how far his Lucretia excelled them all; and he desired them to ride to the several places, and judge accordingly as they should find. Being well heard with wine they agreed to this motion, and away they rode. They found not Lucretia junketing, and idely spending her time as the Kings daughters in law, but late at night hard at work amongst her maids, so that by consent of all she far excelled the rest, and Collatinus nobly entertaining his Guests returned with them to the siege.

Sextus Tarquinus ravisheth Lucretia.

45. Now was Sextus Tarquinius inflamed with a lustfull desire after Lucretia because of her beauty, and, as it hapneth towards difficult, or forbidden things, the more because of her eminent chastity. Within few dayes, without the knowledge of her husband, accompanied onely with one servant he returned to Collatia, where being kindly entertained by her, he was brought to his bed-chamber; but when he thought all asleep, having observed where she lay, with a naked Dagger he went to her, and laying his hand on her breast, threatned her with death if she offered to stir. He mixed threats with fair words, but yet could not prevail, till he told her he would first kill her, and then his slave, whom laying by her side he would report it was for having surprized her in Adultery with him, whereby obtaining his prey, in the morning he departed. When he was gone, she sent for her father from Rome, and her husband from the Camp, (or say some, went her self to the City) desiring they would call together some friends, for that a matter of great importance had befallen her. With Luc etius came Publius Valerius, and with Collatinus, Junius Bruius, who finding her in her chamber in a sad and afflicted condition, she told them the whole matter, refused to admit any comfort, and intreating them to revenge her cause upon the Author of her sorrow, stabbed her self to the heart before them, with a knife she had kept close about her for that purpose.

Junius Bruius.

46. Lucius Junius Surnamed Bruius, was the son of Marcus Junius, who being descended from one of the Companions of Aeneas, and, for his Virtue, very eminent amongst the Romans, married Tarquinius the daughter of Tarquinius Priscus, of which he begat this Lucius. This Lucius was nobly educated, instructed in all disciplines of the City, and of a pregnant wit. But after that Tarquin had privily murdered his Father (not for any offence, but to possess his great estate, as he did several others) and with him his eldest brother, who seemed to bear such a mind as would revenge the injury; he being young, and destitute of any assistance from his kindred, counterfeited himself a fool, which he acted all along, and thence had the Surname of Bruius, this being the sole remedy against the cruelty of the Tyrant, who thinking his folly not feigned but real, despised the man, and having spoiled him of his Patrimony, kept him as an Idiot in his house, and suffered him to converse with his children, not out of respect as a kinsman, but to make them sport by his ridiculous words and actions, as true Idiots are wont to do. On a time a great Pestilence having seized on the City, he sent him to Delphos with his two sons Sextus and Titus, to consult the Oracle. They were glad they had him to make them merry, laughed at him for offering to Apollo a wooden staff, wherein yet he had secretly put some gold, having made it hollow for that purpose. Having privately enquired which of them should be Prince of Rome, it was answered, he who first of all should kisse his Mother, which the young men misunderstanding, agreed betwixt themselves, that at their return they would do it, and so reign joyntly together: but Bruius as soon as they arrived in Italy, knowing the meaning of the Oracle, fell and kissed the Earth, which is mother of all. When under the Vizard of a Fool, he waited for an opportunity to revenge himself and family upon Tarquin, this disaster of Lucretia at length presented it self.

47. Being sent for beforehand, or coming in with Collatinus his kinsman after the death of Lucretia, as Dionysius writeth, while her husband and friends were lamenting over the dead body, he told them it was not time now to weep, but to study how to revenge the injury. He acquainted them with the cause of his assuming the name and behaviour of an Idiot, and manifesting himself to be a most cunning man, desired they might unanimously joyn for the expulsion of Tarquinius and his friends from the City, speaking many things efficacious to perswade them to it. Finding every one very ready, he said there was no need of words and promises but real deeds, if they meant to perform any thing, and that he first would begin. Then went he to the dead body, and taking the bloody knife in his hand, swore by Mars and the rest of their gods, to cast out Tarquinius Superbus with his wicked wife and progeny, to prosecute them or their friends with fire and sword, or any other way, and never after that, to suffer the Tarquins or any other, to reign in Rome. He made them all successively take the same Oath; then, for the way how to bring the matter about, said the gates of the City should be safely kept, that the King might not hear the least word, till he, who was Prince of the Sacrificers, should, as he might by his place, assemble the people, to which the dead body being exhibited, and Lucretius with Collatinus deploring their condition, they might procure the banishment of Tarquin by a publick decree, that should be presently dispatched to the Army for it's concurrence.

48. But before Tarquinius should be removed, they thought it wisdom to consider what Magistracy was fit to succeed his; lest they should pull down the present dwelling before another house was prepared. Some were for Monarchy,

Government.

Monarchy, as indeed the best of Governments, others for Aristocracy, or the rule of the Senate, and others would have the whole power put into the hands of the People; each party bringing examples of good Government in the several kinds. Brutus said the time was straight, and these matters required mature deliberation, which neither at length could produce such a form as would be void of all inconveniences: he said, he hoped that after the expulsion of the Tyrants, they should have leisure to consider how they might best reform the Commonwealth, if any better way could be found out than what Romulus, Pompilius, and the other Kings had chalked out to them, wherein proceeding, till Tarquin forsook the path, the City had been happy and famous, both for it's acts abroad, and constitutions at home. This he could not for shame denie, yet however, he thought those incommodities, as he called them, had procured the Kingly power to degenerate into tyranny, and therefore were at present to be abolished, and to be taken heed of for the time to come. As first, because some men made a great matter of very names, he thought that of a Kingdom was to be left, and the other of Commonwealth to be assumed; so that for the title of King and Monarch, some more modest and popular was to be invented. Then, the regal power he judged not safely to be intrusted with a single person; but that two were to be chosen, who should govern with equal command and authority, and so be a counter-poise each to other. Of all royal ensignes or ornaments, such as procured the envy and grudge of the People were to be laid aside: viz. Scepters, golden Crowns, and Purple Robes of Cloath of gold, except upon Festival dayes, and in triumphal pompes, which rare use of them would not be at all spoken against: but as for the Ivory Chair in which they sat in Judgment, with the white Robe edged with purple, called Prætexta, and the twelve Lictors, or Sargeants, bearing Rods and Axes, they were to be continued. He added, that the main thing to keep these his Magistrates in order, was to prevent their perpetual power, which would keep them from giving account of their actions; wherefore he thought fit their Magistracy, after the manner of Athens, should be but Annual, that so each one might learn as well to be subject as to govern, and this would preserve the mind from being drunk with too much liberty. Lastly, that the name of King might not utterly perish (whence may be concluded, that his judgment was not against the Office though his passion was) he would have the title given to one, who should be called Rex Sacrorum, and having this honour for his life, with immunity from warfare, should medle with nothing else, but these superstitious Rites, of which the Kings had charge before.

49. Having first got a decree of the Senate for the Kings banishment, according to the custom of publick proceeding, the Comitia were assembled by Brutus, and the body of Lucretia brought in her gore into the meeting place, where it was set for a spectacle to all. Brutus then discovered himself, told them why he had seemed what he now appeared never to have been, and then declared the occasion of their meeting to be, that the Patritians might have their assent for banishing Tarquin, who having obtained the Principality illegally, had abused it more than any Tyrant that was ever heard of. He illustrated his assertion by a relation of his crimes; as of his poysoning his own brother before he was King, together with his lawful wife, and marrying the other sister that was partaker with him in his wickednesse: his killing Servius Tullius, and strangling his wife, whom he ought to have respected as Parents; then his invading the Government without decree of Senate or Suffrages of the people by force of Arms. He reckoned up the injuries received by the Patritians, most of whom he had made away, and reduced the rest to the estate of beggars; how from the Plebeians he had taken, Laws, Religious Meetings, the Comitia and Suffrages, and used them no better than Slaves bought with woney. He then demanded how long they should endure this bondage; whether no longer than till the death of Tarquin, when as he had three sons more wicked and mischievous than himself, especially the elder, which he proved by the spectacle before their eyes, telling them them than the whole storie. This advantage he improved to the utmost, shewing how the King being now absent, and the Patritians resolved, nothing could be wanting to them, if they had but courage for the enterprize; not Men, Money, Arms, Captains, nor foreign aid; urging, that it was a shame they should think of commanding the Volsci, Sabines, or others, and be Slaves to others at home; or maintain so many Wars for to serve the ambition of Tarquin, and undertake none for their own liberty. As for the Army now at the Siege, there was no fear, but, for their own freedom and accommodation, they would readily cloze with them; and if any should be found to intend the Contrary, they had their wives and children as Hostages, in the City, whereby they might easily draw them off.

50. The multitude being variously affected with hope of liberty, and fear to misse of it, during his Speech, yet made acclamations to the particulars, and at the end, with one voice desired he would give them Arms. He said he would, if first they should confirm what was offered from the Fathers, as the beginning of their liberty; and therewithall recited the forme of this severe Decree, that the Tarquinius should be banished with all their off-spring, and be capital for any one to speak or act for their return. The several Curia being called, confirmed it by all their Suffrages, which being done, he acquainted them how it was agreed, that unto two men the Government should be committed, whom they should elect in their Centuriate Comitia, which was also passed. Then, according to the custom, by virtue of his Office formerly mentioned, he named Sp. Lucretius to be Inter-rex for holding of the Comitia or Assemblie, who adjourned the meeting to the Campus Martius, where it was the custom for the Romans in their Armour to elect Magistrates. There he named Brutus and Collatinus (as was formerly agreed on betwixt the conspirators) for to have the Regal power, and the Centuries confirmed them by their Suffrages. In the mean time, whilst these things were done in the City, Tarquinus having heard by such as escaped out ere the gates were shut, that Brutus called the people to their liberty, making none acquainted but his sons and some trustie friends, with them rode away post, to prevent the general defection, but finding the gates fast shut, and the walls full of Armed men, in great grief returned to the Camp. There now he could not be received; for Brutus foreseeing his sodain coming, sent Letters to the Army (or went himself by another way than that he knew he would come) wherein he acquainted them with the decree of the People, and desired that they would revolt from the King. The letters were read to the Soldiers by T. Herminius and M. Horatius, whom Tarquin had left to govern the Army, and they being called to give their Suffrages also by Centuries, all thought that what their friends at home had done, was to be approved, and would not admit the King at his return. Frustrated of this hope, he went Care in Heururia, saith Livie, to Gabii saith Dionysius, where he had made his son Sextus King, now gray-headed, having reigned 25 years. Herminius and Horatius took truce with the Enemy for 15 years, and breaking up the Siege before Ardea, returned with the Army. This happened in the 244th year of the City, after the account of Cato, but the 245th, according to the computation of Terentius Varro, in the latter end of the 67th Olympiad, or the beginning of the 68th, A. M. 3496. Pliny writeth, that it was the same year wherein the Pisistratida were banished Athens, and Clemens joyneth it with the recovery of Babylon by Darius Hystaspis. This was somewhat above twenty years after the beginning of Cyrus, and the destruction of the Babylonian Empire.

The Jews return out of Captivity.

THEY having obtained the Empire of the East through the Conquest of Babylon, after a three years siege, as ^{is} conjectured, was sensible of Gods providence therein (whom he understood to have foretold it, and called him by name above 100 years before he was born) and out of obedience to his decree, gave leave to all the Jews that were in Captivity in his Dominions, to return to their own Country, the 70 years of their exile foretold by Jeremiah the Prophet being now expired. In compliance with this opportunity Zorubbabel the son of Salaaniel, and Grand-son to Jechoniah as Captain, with Jo-

SECT. 2.

Jshua the son of Josedec (which Josedec was brother to *Esdra*s, and son to Seraiah the Chief Priest, who being Counsellour to Zedekiah was slain by Nebuchadnefar, the year wherein Jerusalem was taken) and 42462 Jews (as Josephus reckoneth up the number) departed, and went into Judea. Though the other Tribes formerly led into Captivity by Salmanasar might have the same liberty of returning, yet having together with the memory of their antient Countrey lost their affection to their God, and it, regarded not the time, the Lord having onely promised liberty of returning to those that were exported by Nebuchadnefar. And a great part of the Tribe of Judah it self (if not the greater) unwilling to leave their possessions got in a strange Land, as also discouraged by the difficulties and troubles they were to undergo, preferred perpetual banishment before the seat and habitation of their Ancestors.

The second Temple built at Jerusalem.

2. In the second year of the Persian Empire, and the second moneth, when all things were in a readinesse, according to Commission given by the King (who defrayed the charge out of his own Revenue, and restored the Golden Vessels carried away by Nebuchadnefar) the Levites were set over the work of the Lords house, and Zorabbabel laid the foundation of the second Temple, to the joy of the younger sort born in Captivity, but with the lamentation of the elder, who had seen the glory of the former house. When the Chuthites (whom Esfarhaddon planted in Samarita) heard of their progresse in the work, they first fraudulently offered their assistance, pretending the same religion, and being rejected so corrupted the Courtiers (who either kept the thing from Cyrus, or he was then busied in his Wars, as Josephus writeth) that the building was hindred for several years, untill the second of Darius, the son of Hystaspes. For this the Prophet Daniel (who was yet alive, and nigh 90 years old, as having been carried into Captivity 72 years before) mourned, and fasted three weeks, and had the great, and last Vision concerning the future Kings of Persia, of Alexander the Great, and his Successors in Asia and Egypt, untill the time of the Hasmoneans, or Maccabees. But whether he lived past the third year of Cyrus or no is uncertain.

Cyrus variously reported.

3. Concerning the end of Cyrus many and several things are written. According to Herodotus, Trogus and others he invaded the Massagetes, and perished in their Countrey. The Queen of this Scythian people named Tomyris he first made a pretence to sue to for marriage, but she being aware of this design to entrap her forbade him entrance; whereupon betaking himself from wiles to force he laid a bridge over the River Araxes, and provided for the passing of his Army over. Whilst he thus imployed himself, she was so hardy as to send him a message, offering him either to invade her Countrey, or else to permit her a passage into his. Amazed at it, he referred the matter to his Council what should be done therein, where some advised him to suffer her to passe the River, but Crasus stiffly opposed it, shewing the danger in case he were overthrown but in one battel, and advised him after he had set over his men, and discovered the enemy, to leave the weakest sort amongst his Army there in the Camp plentifully provided of strong wines, with which liquor being utterly unacquainted, they would make themselves drunk, and so might be easily destroyed. This advice succeeded accordingly, and amongst the rest Spargapises the Queen's son was taken prisoner, who as soon as he came to himself desired to be loosed, and put an end to his life with his own hands, out of a deep sence of his condition. His mother knowing nothing of his death, with threatening language required Cyrus to dismiss him, and when she saw he returned not, gathered together all her forces, wherewith counterfeiting flight she trained the King into streights, and by an ambush laid in the Mountains, cut him off with his whole Army to the number of 200000 men. His head she cast into a bason of bloud, upbraiding him with cruelty in these words: satisfie thy self with bloud after which thou hast lived. To this story Diodorus addeth that she nailed his body to a Cross.

4. But Ctesias wrote that the last War he made was against the Derbices, a people people also of Scythia, whom though he overcame, yet he received a wound in fight, of which he died three dayes after. Xenophon saith he died aged, and in peace, and how finding himself almost spent, he called to him his friends, with his two sons Cambyfes and Smerdis, or Tanaoxares, whom (after a long Oration, wherein he discoursed much concerning the immortality of the Soul, and the punishment and reward which is due to things committed in this life) he exhorted by the strongest arguments to perpetual concord and love. If so, he acted like one that had received the knowledge of the true God, which he had opportunity also to know from Daniel and others, being by them instructed in the Scriptures. Some think that the variety of these reports proceeded from the study of the Persians to conceal the shame of his being overthrown by the policy of a woman. Others observe, that had he lost his whole Army in Scythia, it is scarce probable that his son would have transported all his remaining Forces into Egypt so soon, and hereby leave that side of his Kingdom destitute and naked, when the Scythian Nation bordering upon Media was so victorious: not to add that Cambyfes would not have been able to undertake, and perform such a Conquest in so little a space. Considerable certainly is that which the Writers of Alexander's Acts have committed to memory, as Curtius, Plutarch, Arrianus, and even Aristobolus (who by command of the King was an eye witness of it) as he is cited by Sirabo: That he was buried in his own Citie Pasagardis in Persia, where his Epitaph was plain to be read, in which after telling the Traveller who he was, he desired him not to grudge him that earth wherewith his body was covered. The Tomb was opened by Alexander, either out of hope to find some Treasure, or (what was pretended) out of desire to honour his dead body with some Ceremonies, and in it were found an old Target, two Scythian Bows and a sword. The Coffin wherein he lay Alexander caused to be covered with his own Robe, and a Crown of Gold to be set thereon. These things something weaken the credit of that opinion which Herodotus relateth as the most probable of those that were held in his time. But lesse credit is to be given to that * which will have him slain in a Sea-fight against the inhabitants of Samus; and * another that lengtheneth his life to 100 years, whereas he scarce passed 70. Herodotus giveth to his reign 29 years; but most agree that he reigned 30. which must be counted from his first obtaining the Kingdom of Media.

5. What time passed from the Conquest of Babylon, and the beginning of his Monarchy, unto his death, is controverted amongst learned Writers. Some reckon ten years, or thereabouts, and others but three, of which number was once Joseph Scaliger, who afterwards retracted it as an error; but Ludovicus Cappellus hath renewed the assertion, making it probable by arguments drawn from Scripture, who therefore is to be consulted in his sacred * Chronology. Cyrus had issue two sons, Cambyfes and Smerdis, or Tanaoxares, with three daughters, Atossa, Meroe, and Artystona, to which Cresias addeth Amysis. Atossa and Meroe their brother Cambyfes afterwards married; and Darius Hystaspis obtained Artystona, as also Atossa after the death of Cambyfes. Of the two sons, to Cambyfes he left his Kingdom, and to Smerdis or Tanaoxares assigned the Government of Media, Armenia, and the Cadusi-ans, according to Xenophon.

Cambyfes married War upon Egypt.

6. Cambyfes presently after he came to the Government, made all possible provision for a War with Egypt, the cause whereof is to be enquired after. Herodotus telleth a story how he sent to Amasis King of that Countrey to desire his daughter Niteis in marriage, which he not daring to deny because of the then formidable power of the Persians, and not willing to gratifie him absolutely, for that he conceived his daughter would be entertained but as a Concubine, he found out a way as he thought to satisfie Cambyfes, and yet keep his daughter. There was one of Apries his predecessor's daughters yet unmarried, her he sent to him under the name of his own, who when she had sufficiently ingratiated her self with Cambyfes, told him how indeed she was nothing a kin to Amasis, but begotten by his Lord and Master; whereat the Persian conceived such indignation, that, to be revenged on him, he invaded Egypt. But that which moved Cambyses to send for this woman, seemeth something strange. He had formerly desired from Amasis a Physician for the eyes, the best that could be procured in Egypt, wherewith he gratifying him, the man took it so ill of Amasis to be sent out of his native Country, that in way of revenge, he moved the matter to Cambyses, concluding with himself, that the King of Egypt would not send his own daughter: This was the saying of the Persians, which Herodotus rather approveth than what the Egyptians alleged, that Cambyses was son to Nisetis the daughter of Apries, and that the Persians ascribed that to the Son which belonged to the Father, because they would have Cambyses born of Cassandane the daughter of Pharnaspes, of the noble race of Achamenes; and yet he confesseth there was a report, that besides Cassandane, Cyrus kept Nisetis as his Concubine, whom he most affected, and that to revenge his mother upon her, Cambyses when but young threatned, and after his Father's death made War upon Egypt. However things might go in reference to the daughter of Apries, Cambyses seemeth to have invaded that Kingdom, upon pretence of the right he had to it as Heir by conquest to Nebuchadnefar, who subdued it, though it revolted from his Successors; which might be concealed from Herodotus by the Priests, who spared not to invent lyes for a cover to the disgrace of their Country.

SECT. I.

Vide Polyanius
lib. 8.

7. While Cambyses was yet busie in his preparations, one Phanes an Halycarnassan by birth, taking something in distaste from Amasis, whom he served, fled out of Egypt by ship, and coming into Persia, advised this King, that for his better passage of the sandy Deserts, he should send to the King of the Arabians for safe conduct, who being no good friend to the Egyptian, came and met him with Camels bearing abundance of water, which was necessary for the sustenance of the Army in that hot and dry place. Ere Cambyses could arrive in Egypt, Amasis had prevented captivity by a natural death, and Psammenitus his son having succeeded him, expected his coming at Pelusium one of the mouths of Nile. Here a battel being fought, the Egyptians were overthrown and fled to Memphis, whither Cambyses sent after them to yield up themselves to him; but they tare in pieces the messengers, and then being besieged, stood out for some time; but at length the City was taken. Psammenitus had his son put to death before his eyes, to try his patience, though the Conquerour too late repented of it, and had given him his life with the Kingdom to govern, as a Province, had he not attempted new matters, for which he was forced to drink Bulls blood, and so died, having reigned six months after his Father.

His extrava-
ces.

8. This work done in Egypt, Cambyses betook himself to extravagant practices. The dead body of Amasis he caused to be brought forth, to be beaten, pinched, and then burnt, contrary to the practice as well of the Persians as Egyptians, who abhorred such a thing, because the former accounted Fire a god, & the later a ravenous beast, perishing with the thing devoured by it. Then resolved he to make a three-fold War: One upon the Carthaginians, another upon the Ammonians, or the Inhabitants of the place situate about the Temple of Jupiter Hammon, and the third against the long-lived Ethiopians, who inhabited Africk, near to the Southern Sea. He resolved to send a Fleet against the Carthaginians, an Army of Foot against the Ammonians, and as for the Ethiopians, he would first send to discover their Country. While his Messengers were dispatching towards Ethiopia, he gave order to the Phanicians (who having yielded themselves, were his onely strength at Sea) to fight against Carthage, which they flatly refused, because that City was a Colony of their own, and thereby this design was dashed. After the return of his messengers, who brought him word how he was slighted by the Ethiopian King, in great rage and haste he set forwards against him, without all thought of victualling his Army, commanding all his foot to follow, except the Gracians. When he was come to Tibes, he sent about 50000 men against the Ammonians, with command after they had spoiled spoiled them to burn the Temple ; and so he marched on with the rest of the Army. But ere he had passed the fifth part of his journey , all provisions failed, and all the beasts that carried burthens were eaten up ; yet did he not now recollect himself, but proceeded till they were constrained to eat up every tenth man, and then returned he with great losse and disgrace to Memphis, where he dismissed the Greeks from his service. The forces sent against the Ammonians, never reached thither, neither ever returned, being all overwhelmed, as was reported, in the Sandy Wildernesse.

He murdered
sister.

9. Cambyses at his return to Memphis, found the Citizens in great mirth and jollity, for that Apis their god had appeared to them lately ; which he interpreting as an expression of joy for his bad successe, wounded the beast in the thigh (thinking to strike him into the belly) of which he died. He derided much the Egyptians for such deities : those that were found rejoycing, he commanded to be slain, and the Priests to be beaten with rods. For such impiety they accounted him stricken with that madnesse, which afterwards appeared. For not long after, he sent his brother Smerdis back into Persia, having conceived great indignation against him, because he alone of all the Persians, could draw a Bow that was brought him by his messengers out of Ethiopia. After this he dreamed, that one came and told him how Smerdis sat on the Throne, and with his head reached to Heaven, whereupon, he sent Prexaspes his greatest confident to make him away, who murdered him in a pretended hunting, or as some said, drowned him in the Red Sea. To this he added the murder of his own Sister, whom, without any example, he had married, because she upbraided him with their brother's death. Memorable is the answer of his Judges, who, when he demanded, whether there was not a Law amongst the Persians, that a man might marry his own Sister, answered, they found no such Law, but one there was, viz. The King might do whatsoever he listed. Then married he one Sister, and afterwards another, whereof the younger he killed being great with child, as the Egyptians reported, so that she miscaried double.

10. To this rage and madnesse against his relations, he added fury towards those that were nearest about him. Asking Prexaspes the minister of his parricide, what his people thought of him, and receiving this answer, that they thought him too much given to wine, that it might be seen how sober he was to do mischief, he said it should be a demonstration, if he could shoot with an arrow the son of Prexaspes right into the heart, which accordingly he did. The day after he buried quick twelve other Persians for no fault at all, and commanded Croesus the Lydian to be slain for admonishing him gravely concerning such enormities, having dispatched him himself with an arrow, if he had not taken him to his heels. His servants notwithstanding preserved Croesus alive, expecting a reward if he should afterwards repent of his death. And he really rejoyced in his preservation, when he returned to himself ; but put them to death for their disobedience. Many more such like things he did whilst he remained at Memphis, and raged against the Images and Temples of the Egyptians.

usurp.

11. But whilst he thus spent his time, two of the Magi, Medians by birth, conspired against him. One of them he had left Overseer of his household affairs, named Patizithes, who having certain knowledge of the death of Smerdis, though it was kept very secret, took occasion thereat to rebel, because most of the Persians thought this Prince yet living. For, having with him in the Kings house a brother as like him in the lineaments and proportion of body as in name, him he placed in the Throne, and sent up and down through the Empire, to perswade every one rather to obey Smerdis the son of Cyrus than Cambyses. One of these messengers coming down to the Army towards Egypt, found it at Ecbatane in Syria, where standing in the midlt, he proclaimed what was enjoined. Cambyses being much startled, blamed Prexaspes for having neglected to execute his commands ; but he protesting his obedience therein, and that he had buried his brother with his own hands, the messenger was persued and fetcht back, out of whom Prexaspes

SECT. 2. aspes getting out that he had not himself seen Smerdis, but Patizabes had given him instructions as from him, easily conjectured what was at the bottom, and therewith acquainted the King. Then too late did Cambyfes bewail his brother, and resolving with all speed to march for Susa, as he mounted on horseback his sword fell out of the Scabberd, and wounded him in the thigh. Demanding the name of the place, he gave himself for lost, for that it had been told him he should die in Ecbarane, which he had ever interpreted of the place in Media so called, where he hoped it would be in his old age. Twenty dayes after, he revealed the whole matter concerning his brother to the Nobility about him, conjuring them not to suffer the Empire to return to the Medes, but rather recover it the same way it had been betrayed. Not long after his thigh-bone being putrified, he died, when he had reigned seven years and five moneths. He left no issue, and so the direct line of Cyrus in him received it's period.

SECT. II.

From the death of Cambyfes to that of Xerxes.

1. Smerdis the Magician (called also Mardus, Sphendadates, and Oropastes) reigned those seven moneths which were wanting to compleat the eighth year of Cambyfes, whom the Persians believed not as to his brothers death, but thought that indeed he was alive and reigned, because Prexaspes feared to confesse that he killed him. In this time he, or rather his brother, wonderfully pleased all men, except the Persians, remitting to other Nations their tributes, and excusing them from War for three years. But in the eighth moneth he was discovered by the means of Oranes, a man of highest rank in Persia, who suspected him for a counterfeir, because he never would appear in publick, nor admit any of the Nobility into his presence. He having a daughter then at Court, which had been Concubine to Cambyfes, and now was in the same quality to him that reigned, as all the rest of his wives; to her he sent to know, whether it was indeed the son of Cyrus with whom she lay. She having had no acquaintance with that Prince, could give him no answer, and neither could she come near Arossa, who being sister to Smerdis might easily know him, for that the Magician to prevent intelligence, kept them severed one from another: This increasing the suspicion, Oranes sent to her again, charging her as he lay asleep to know whether he had any ears; for Cyrus had upon some account cut off the ears of Smerdis the Magician. She obeyed her Father when it came to her course, notwithstanding the danger, and the day following confirmed him fully in what he had suspected.

The imposture
discovered.

2. Oranes presently discovered the matter to Aspathines and Gobryas, two men of prime rank also among the Persians, who easily giving him credit, as having suspected the same thing themselves, agreed to take three more, each of them one, into Council about it. Oranes brought Intaphernes, Gobryas chose Megabyzus, Aspathines took Hydarnes, and Darius being then arrived at Susa from Persia, which his Father Hystaspes governed, they also thought fit to add him to their number. Darius when admitted, signified, that he had been assured of the cheat, how he was come to Town upon no other account than to kill the impostor, and urged them to joyn with him and attempt it speedily. Oranes was much against such hasty proceedings, desiring further to consult about it, but Darius alleging the danger of delay, for which cause, if they would not attempt something that very day, hee would go and discover rather than be discovered, at length they agreed to him.

against them.

3. But while they were thus debating the matter, the Magi knowing that Prexaspes had made away Smerdis the son of Cyrus, and considering how nearly it concerned them to make him their own, had sent for him, and by vast promises endeavoured to purchase his secrecy in that private affair. He seemed seemed to comply, and desired that the Persians might be called together under the wall, that he might persuade them, that he who now reigned was the true Smerdis. But after he had mounted the turret, he began to reckon up the Pedigree of Cyrus from Achamenes, related his kindnesse and good turns done to the Persians, and then telling the whole matter concerning Smerdis whom he had murdered, after he had laid many curses upon them, except they recovered the Empire, and revenged themselves upon the Magi, he threw himself down headlong and died. The seven Conspirators utterly ignorant of this, arrived at the Court, at such time as the Magi were consulting concerning what had happened, where the Porters easily admitted them, because of their dignity, nothing being suspected of them. But coming into the house, they were stopped by such Eunuchs as there waited, whereupon they forced their passage with their Swords, and were encountered by both the Magi, who having taken the Alarm, and perceived the matter, betook themselves to their weapons. One of them wounded Aspathines in the thigh, and put out the eye of Intaphernes: the other retired into another room, whither he was pursued by Darius and Gobryas. Gobryas grappling with him, Darius stood idle for fear of wounding his friend; but Gobryas bidding him strike though it were thorow his sides, he did it at adventure, and slew the Magician. Both of them being slain, they cut off their heads, and carrying them out, acquainted the Persians with what they had done. Then fell they upon such Magicians as they could meet, which the Persians taking as an example, did the like, so that if night had not intervened, all that sort of men had perished, and this day was observed annually as a great Festival, in which none of the Magicians stirred abroad. This was the end of the usurpation, wherein seven Magi are said by some to have been partakers; but if so, those two brothers are to be accounted the chief, one of them counterfeiting the right Heir.

4. This tumult being over in five dayes time, the seven Conspirators fell into consultation about a settlement. Otanes spake for the taking away of Monarchy, which he urged, from the example of Cambyfes and the Magician, was apt to degenerate into Tyranny, and would have had the Government remitted to the people in a Democratical way; Megabyzus was for Oligarchie; but Darius of all the three sorts preferred Monarchy, as that into which at length the other would passe, through seditions and the ambition of such particular men as should be able to advance themselves above their neighbours. The other four subscribed to his opinion as best, which therefore being agreed on by the major part, several capitulations were made in order to the election. Otanes desired that both himself and family might be exempted from the regal jurisdiction, which was granted, and all possible honour further decreed to him for his pains taken in the discovery. It was agreed amongst the other six, that it should be lawful for them at any time to come into the Palace, except the King were with his wife, and the King was prohibited to take a wife any where but out of their families. As for the election, it was resolved, that all the next morning by Sun-rise riding into the Suburbs, he whose Horse first neighed, should obtain the Empire of Cambyfes.

5. Darius obtained it through the cunning of Oebares his Stable-Groom, who having knowledge from his Master of the businesse, the night before the controversie was to be decided, put his Horse to Mare in the place whither they were to ride. The Horse the next morning remembring his mate neighed, for which, as coming by accident, the other five adored Darius as King. Having thus obtained the Kingdom, though he had children already by a daughter of Gobryas; yet the more to strengthen his title, he married the two daughters of Cyrus which remained; Atossa the wife of her brother Cambyfes, and of the Magician, and Arystona yet a Virgin: he also took Parinys daughter to Smerdis the son of Cyrus, and Phaedaina the daughter of Otanes. This he did, being also himself of regal extraction, both allied to ancient and modern Kings. He was issued from Achamenes; Cyrus and his Father Hystaspes being brother's sons, the one to Cambyfes, and the other other to Arfames, as some have reported. This translation of the Kingdom is said to have been first revealed to Cyrus, at such time as having passed the river Araxes, he was marching against the Massagetes; For he dreamed that he saw the eldest son of Hystaspes (which was this; for he had three younger sons, Ariabannus, Atarnes, and Artaphernes,) having wings on his shoulders wherewith he overshadowed Asia and Europe. At that time he was about twenty years old, and Armour-bearer to Cyrus (according to * Ælian) who sent him back into Persia, and as some said, caused him to be imprisoned. After his death he was delivered out of Prison, and made Governour of the Persian Magi, accompanied Cambyfes into Ægypt, and when he had discovered the imposture of the Magi, joyned with the other Princes against them, and then either by the neighing of his Horse, or by strong hand, as some have thought, obtained the Empire.

* Var. Hist. lib. 12. c. 43.

6. Though thus Darius obtained the Sovereignty; yet it seemeth to some, to have been as a perpetual Dictatorship, who think it probable, that the other six had also by turns the exercise of Tribunitial jurisdiction, together with him. First, because Æschylus who fought against the Forces of Darius at Marathon, nameth two Kings, viz. Maraphis and Artaphrenes, betwixt the slaughter of the Magi and Empire of Darius, who seem no other than Mardonius and Artaphernes, reckoned by Ctesias amongst the seven. Then in the Holy Scripture, together with the edict of Darius in the second year of his reign, the assent of Artasbashea King of Persia is joyned, which may well enough be taken for the said Artaphernes; though others do otherwise expound the place. And, to add something not altogether so material, the other Conspirators foreseeing how burthensome they should be to Darius (which in what other way could it be than this?) bound him with an * Oath most sacred amongst the Persians, that neither with poyson, sword, any other violence, nor by famine should he kill any of them; though it proved not so sacred as to be inviolable.

* Valer. Max. lib. 9. cap. 2. externa. exempl. 6.

The building of the Temple proceedeth.

7. In the second year of Darius the building of the Temple which had been interrupted, began again and proceeded. The Samaritans bribed the Courtiers in the time of Cyrus, to hinder the work, and Cambyfes having been formerly no friend to it, when he came to reign stopped it by expresse command, through the calumnation of such as bore the Jews no good will. The Magician also forbad it upon the same account, it being clear from Scripture, that two several Princes named Abasuerus and Artaxerxes withstood it; and that betwixt the reigns of Cyrus and Darius. But when the Adversaries now betook themselves to Darius, expecting from him a countermmand to the Jews (who being reproved for their remissness by the Prophet Haggai, were fallen again to build upon the foundation formerly laid) he instead of any such inhibition, sent them an expresse command, not onely not to hinder, but at his own cost to further the Structure, allowing also to the Priests expenses for the daily Sacrifices. The Jews therefore encouraged by this new Edict, and confirmed by the Prophecies of Haggai and Zachariah, proceeded prosperously in the building.

8. In the same year had the Prophet Zachariah a Vision, in which the Angel interceding for Jerusalem, and the Cities of Judah, mentioneth the Lord's having had indignation threescore and ten years. The rise or beginning of these years Ludovicus Cappellus fetcheth from the destruction of the Temple. For from the first Edict of Cyrus, and the end of the Captivity, to this time, passed about eleven years (Cyrus, according to his account, reigning but three after the taking of Babylon, Cambyfes together with the Magician eight, and Darius one; from which must be deducted so much as the removal of the Jews would require) even so many as passed from the beginning of the Captivity to the desolation of the Temple, and so the Temple lay desolate full Seventy years. Hence is observable, that as the State and Policy of the Jewish Commonwealth was broken, and much impaired eleven years before the destruction of the Temple, so was it renewed at the end of the Captivity so many years before the re-edifying of it, which hitherto had been been attempted without successe, but now renewed, was happily finished in the sixth year of Darius, as to the house it self, though three years more seem to have been taken up in the building the porches and other appendices to it. And as the greatest part of the holy Vessels were carried away in the Captivity of Jechoniah, eleven years before the destruction of the Temple, so were they sent back again so many years before the restauration of it. Lastly, this also is observed, that as from the destruction of this typical Temple to the rebuilding of it, passed Seventy years, so from the Conception of Christ the true and spiritual Temple, to the final desolation of the shadow or typical one at Jerusalem, so many years passed, precisely Seventy.

Intaphernes put to death.

All the Conspirators made away.

Babylon rebell-eth,

And recovered.

9. Darius after his settlement in the Kingdom, divided it into twenty Provinces (which the Persians called Satrapies) over each of which he constituted a Præident, withall appointing what tribute each Nation should pay. For, hitherto, under the two former Kings, nothing was appointed concerning tribute, the several people contributing money by way of benevolence, whereupon, because of this new imposition, they styled Darius an Huckster, Cambyse a Lord, and Cyrus a Father. Cyrus was mild, and used them as children, striving to deserve well of them; Cambyse was sharp and morose, and Darius by all wayes possible purveied for money. The next thing memorable concerning Darius, is, his putting to death Intaphernes, one of the Conspirators, for abusing the Porters, and violent intruding into the Palace, contrary to the Capitulations agreed on amongst them. Having an intention to go to the King, they that kept the gate stopped him, saying, that he was with his wife, which he thinking to be a lye, drew his Sword, and cutting off their ears and noses, then tyed the reigns of an horses bridle to their necks and let them go. They presenting themselves in this case to the King, he first suspected some treasonable design of all the six, but finding that the rest knew nothing of the matter, he put Intaphernes to death, with all his sons except the eldest, whom he granted to the intreaties of the Mother. But not onely him, but all the rest also who were burthensome to him, another telleth us that he made away by a new kind of death. He caused many ashes to be laid betwixt some walls, over which laying a rafter, thereupon he feasted them very nobly; but being fast asleep the floor fell, and they therewith into the ashes, where they perished. If he destroyed them in this strange manner, probable it is, that he desired to be rid of them, because of some power to which they might pretend by virtue of a previous agreement, not enduring any incombrance or restraint upon his prerogative; for that Sovereignty is impatient of any competition in the throne.

10. About the tenth year of his reign the City of Babylon rebelled against him, having of late recovered that greatnesse of mind which sometime possessed it's Inhabitants. Cyrus demolished not their walls, but left them intire with the gates standing, which putting them in a posture of defence, they took courage at the forein Wars of Cambyse, and the stirs that happened about the Magi. He gathered his forces together, with all speed, and laid siege to it; but they being resolved to stand out to the utmost, chose every one a woman to make ready their meat, and to save provisions, killed all the rest of that Sex except their Mothers. Then, as if they had made themselves impregnable, they derided the Persians, saying, they should be overcome when a Mule foaled: And above nineteen moneths they held out, notwithstanding all their attempts and devices. At length in the 30th, Zopyrus son to Megabyzus, one of the chief Commanders in Darius his Army, being encouraged by his Mule that foaled, mangled his face, cutting off his ears and nose, and in gore blood counterfeited a flight to the besieged, as thus abused by the King. The Babylonians believed, and according to his expectation chose him for their General, after which, he made several sallies, and the besiegers according to the former agreement fled; but within a while he betrayed the City to Darius. He demolished the walls, and nailing 3000 of the principal actors unto crosses, pardoned the rest, for whom 5000 women were sought, by whom they might repair their decayed stock. Zopyrus was rewarded, as with other things in greatest account amongst the Persians, so with the City of Babylon for his life. The son of this Zopyrus was Megabyzus, who afterwards conducted the Persian Army against the Athenians and their companions: and son to this Megabyzus was that Zopyrus, who revolted from the Persians to the Athenians.

against the Scythians.

11. After the recovery of Babylon, Darius wanting neither men nor money, undertook an Expedition against the Scythians, to be revenged on them for holding the (a) dominion of Asia 28 years, at such time as pursuing the Cimmerians they overthrew and kept under the Medes, whom they found Lords of all in the dayes of their King Cyaxares. This (b) Herodotus maketh the pretended cause of the War, but (c) Justin from Trogus reliteth, that it was because Lanichius the Scythian King denied him his daughter in marriage. Darius caused a bridge to be laid over the Bosphorus into Europe half a mile long, and thereon passing his forces over, crossed the Sea himself by ship, and gave charge to the Ionians his Subjects (who together with the Aeolians, and others that lived upon the Hellepont, made up the Navie) to sail up the Sea as far as the River Ister (which parted Scythia from Thrace) over which he also enjoined them to make a bridge. In his march through Thrace all submitted to him except the Getes, who out of Ignorance withstood him. The Ionians prepared the bridge against his coming, whom, after he had transported his forces, he commanded there to expect him Sixty dayes, at the end of which if he returned not, he permitted them to return into their own Country.

12. The Scythians had no constant dwelling or habitation, removing with their wagons, wherein they lay, and cattel, from place to place, according as they were furnished with grasse, living upon milk and raw flesh, without Towns or corn, and taking their conduct from the Pole-Star, as the Chrim Tartars their posterity at this day also live, the great Chrim himself having no other City than an Agora, or one of the Carts. Having intelligence of his coming, they sent their wives, children, and cattel towards the North, then stopped all the wells, destroyed all fruits of the Earth, and sometimes appearing to the Persians, again retired on purpose to deride them. Darius seeing himself thus mocked, and despairing to come at them by reason of their perfect knowledge of the Country, and his ignorance therein, fearing also his provisions might fail, and especially lest the Ionians should forsake him at the bridge, now that the Sixty dayes were expired, berought how he might make a safe retreat. The Scythians getting knowledge hereof, laboured to remove the Ionians from the bridge, telling them how good it would be for them to return home in safety; for that now the time prefixed by the King was expired. They fell into consultation hereupon, and Miltiades Tyrant or petty Prince of the Chersonesus besought them, that, having this opportunity, they would not let it slip, but free themselves from the Persian yolk. But Histiatus Tyrant of Miletus a City of Ionis, and others, who had enslaved their own Citizens at home, fearing, lest if the power of the Persians, by which they were maintained, were broken, they should be reduced into a private condition or worse by their own Country-men, resolved, that nothing more concerned them, than that the greatnesse of that Empire might be established. Yet it was judged convenient to break the bridge so far, as to be out of bow-shot from the Scythian side, therein to comply with that People, who perhaps else might force them to do it. Beginning therefore to break it, the Scythians believed their promise of performing the whole, and returned to hunt out the Persians. Expecting them to retreat that way which was best for Provisions, they missed of them; for Darius returned the same he went, and with great difficulty recovered the banks of Ister. Here he arrived by night, and was much discouraged when he found the bridge broken; but upon the first shour Histiatus came with all his Vessels and made it up for the transportation of the Army.

13. Darius passing over his Army marched through Thrace unto Sestus, and thence sailed over into Asia, leaving Megabyzus in Europe with an Army of of 80000 men. Megabyzus, according to order, subdued the Perinthians and Paonians, whom he translated into Asia, and having reduced to obedience all the Maritime Coast, sent into Macedonia to demand earth and water of Amyntas the King. These were Symbols of subjection, signifying an acknowledgement of fealty, and voluntary homage, the chief Sovereignty over all wherein propriety lay, being yielded up with these two Elements. Darius had formerly sent to demand them of the Scythians, and they in return sent him a Bird, Frog, Mouse, and five Arrows, leaving him to make the interpretation, which he framing according to his own wish, thought that they had yielded all those Elements wherein those Creatures live, and their Weapons withall into his hands. But Gobryas construed the meaning to be this: O ye Persians, get ye wings like Birds, dive under the water, or creep into the holes of the Earth, for else our Arrows will overtake you; which exposition was accordingly verified. Amyntas doubting of his own strength, kindly entertained the Messengers, and granting what they came for, magnificently feasted them, inasmuch that being well heated with Wine they desired that women, according to the custom of Persia, might be brought in to them. He replied, that was not the fashion of Macedonia; but yet he would gratifie them therein, which being done, they began to be uncivil towards the women, whereat he inwardly fretted, but for fear suppressed his indignation. But his eldest son Alexander being present, a young man of prompt boldness and little experience, desired him to quit the room, and let him alone to entertain the Guests; and though he suspected him for his courage, and dissuaded him from any rash attempt, yet did he withdraw accordingly. Alexander then told the Persians they might have liberty to enjoy these women, but for that it now grew late, he desired they would let them go out to wash, and make themselves ready, which done, they should come again. They assenting, he dressed so many bare-faced young men in women's Clothes, who, being brought in, when the Persians began to dally with them, according to his command stabbed them with Daggers hid under their Clothes for that purpose. Megabyzus hearing nothing of his Messengers, sent one Prubares a Persian down with an Army to make diligent search after them, but him Alexander easily took off by giving him his sister Gygæa in marriage, with whom he had fallen in love; so that he suffering the matter to rest in silence, no farther inquiry was made after it.

The occasion
Rebellion.

14. The year following, being the 26th of his reign, Darius sent as Successor to Megabyzus, Otanes the son of Sisamnes, who took in the Cities Chalcedon, Byzantium, and Antander, with the Islands Lemnos, and Imber. He himself was now returned to Susa, whither he carried along with him Hippias, who stood so much his friend at the Bridge of Ister. Hippias having begun to build a Citie of his own in Thrace, Darius out of colour of doing him honour, and using his advice in his most important affairs, drew him away from it, knowing his great abilities, and fearing his restless spirit. There he continued for some years, till not being able to hear so much talk of Empire, and rule, wherein he himself had no share, he much preferred his ancient Dominion though but over one Citie, before this Real, though plausible imprisonment, and therefore sought how he might kindle a fire in Ionian, that for his interest in that Countrey he might obtain to be sent thither to quench it, and so with his liberty get some notable advantage for a great achievement. It hapned that his endeavours did but tend to the blowing up of that spark, which was already kindled without his knowledge, in Aristagoras his son in Law, who Governed Miletus in his absence. The first rise was occasioned by the inhabitants of the Island Naxos, who having banished some of their principal Citizens, the Exiles fled to Anaxagoras for protection and succour. He knowing not well of himself how to restore them, sent to Astaphernes the brother of Darius, and his Lieutenant of Ionian then resident at Sardis, proposing the Conquest of that Island to him, and offering to subdue both it, and all the rest of the Cycades to the obedience of the Persian Empire. Astaphernes acquainted the King with the business, and he approving of it, he

SECT. 2. lent him 200 ships under the conduct of Megabates his Kinsman. They sailed together towards Naxos, and it hapned in the way that Megabates harshly used one of Aristagoras his followers, for which he sharply rebuked him, as having no authority to punish those under his command. This the Persian took so hainously, that he gave intelligence underhand to the Naxians of their coming, who being forewarned were forearmed, so that no good could Aristagoras do, but spending his time to no purpose, was forced at length to raise his siege. For this fruitlesse attempt, fearing disgrace, or worse from the Persians, that he might prevent it, he studied how to revolt, and draw the Ionians into Rebellion.

15. While he consulted with himself, a Message came from Histians, who because the wayes were so warched that he could send no Letters, shaved close the head of his trusty Slave, and thereon with an hot iron ingrav'd such marks as served to make out his sence, and after his hair was grown sent him to Miletus. Aristagoras shaving his head again as he was commanded (which was all the message that the slave carried by word of mouth) presently, and gladly apprehended the matter, viz. that he should excite the Ionians to rebell. Going now more cheerfully about his work, that the Milesians might more readily receive the motion, he restored them to a shew of liberty, and to oblige the rest of the Cities, by one means or other abdicated the power of their petty Princes, or Tyrants as they were called. But knowing how little able this strength would be to grapple with the whole power of Asia, which presently would be upon them, he sailed to Lacedamon, there to desire assistance from Cleomenes the King, who refusing to intermeddle, he thence went to Athens, where as before he laid open the riches of Asia, with the imbecillity of the Persians the present masters thereof; and added, that the Milesians, as a Colony of the Athenians, might justly expect relief from their hands.

16. The conjuncture of affairs at present were such at Athens, as he could not have had a more convenient opportunity. It hapned that Hippias the son of Pisistratus being expelled from Athens had withdrawn himself to Sardis, where he laboured with his whole might to make the Athenians odious to Artaphernes, and bring the Citie into the command of Darius, that so it might return to his own Dominion. They sent their Ambassadors after him, praying Artaphernes that he would give no credit to their Eviles; but he urging them, that, if they meant to secure themselves, they would receive Hippias, they chose rather to become Enemies to the Persian; and therefore complied with the motion of Aristagoras. They agreed to send out 20 ships under the command of Melanthius, a man of principal note amongst them, with which the Eretrians (out of way of requital for aid formerly received from the Ionians) joyned other 5. This was the beginning of those many evils, which afterwards fell both upon the Greeks and Barbarians, and of such Wars as ended not till in the destruction of the Persian Empire. It fell out in the 19th year of Darius, the second of the 69 Olympiad, 501 before the Aera of Christ. A.M. 3502.

17. Aristagoras with this force went against Sardis, which he easily took, all but the Castle wherein Artaphernes secured himself. A fire prevented the plundering of the Citie, which was all turned into ashes by the means of a souldier's burning one particular house. The confusion being great, the Persians and Lydians met together in the Market-place, through which ran the River Pactolus having Golden Sands, and imbodying themselves prepared to charge the Enemy, which when the Gracians perceived they fled for fear to the Mounrain Tmolus, and thence to their ships lying at Coresus in the Territories of Ephesus. The Persians in the pursute slew a great part of them, amongst whom fell Eualcides Captain of the Eretrians so much celebrated by Simonides the Ceian Poet, and other eminent men: those that escaped dispersed themselves through the Cities. Aristagoras could not by any means persuade the Athenians from returning home; notwithstanding, for what had hapned to Sardis, Darius was exceedingly incensed against them; insomuch that ted,

18. At this time all Cyprus revolted from the Persian, except the Amathusians, whom also the Rebels besieged. Yet Darius, blinded by the specious pretences of Histiæus, let him go, thinking indeed that being present he might do him especial service in extinguishing the Rebellion. Though the Ionians were forsaken by their friends of Athens, yet they proceeded, and crossing the Hellepont took Byzantium with the Towns adjacent, and thence went into Caria, a great part whereof they drew into society with them in the War. But the scene of affairs was presently altered. Artabius the Persian with a numerous Army was sent against Cyprus, and the Ionians followed with a Fleet to the aid of Onesilus, who first procured the revolt, and now lay before Amathusia. Both parties being well appointed by Sea and Land, they engaged with their Fleets and land Armies. The Ionians had the better by Sea, but on Land the Cypriots were betrayed by Stesantor, Tyrant of the Curienses, and by the Salaminians, so that being utterly routed, Onesilus was slain, and Aristo-Cyprus Prince of the Solians, and son to that Philo-Cyprus whom Solon commended in his Verses above other Tyrants, or Reguli. The Ionians receiving intelligence of this overthrow, and how all the Cities in the Island were besieged, except Salamis (which the inhabitants had already given up to Gorgus their ancient Prince) hastened away. Of all Towns Solis stood longest out; but in the fifth month was taken by the Persians, who undermined the Walls; and thus Cyprus was reduced into its former bondage, a year after it had cast off the yolk.

The two former reduced many upon the Hellepont and Propontis, and the later by the assistance of Artaphernes took Clazomene in Ionis, and Cuma in Æolia, after which Aristagoras was utterly discouraged, and thought of nothing but flight. Hecæans the Historian, who had formerly dissuaded him from Rebellion, now advised him to build a Fort in the Island Lernus, where he might continue for some time, till it were convenient for him to return to Miletus; but his resolution being bent for Myrcinus, a Town built by Histiæus in Thrace upon the River Strymon, and amongst the Edones, thither he soon after departed with as many Volunteers as would follow him, leaving the Government of Miletus to Pythagoras, a man of the most approved fidelity amongst the Towns-men. He obtained the Countrey thereabout without much trouble, but besieging the Town was cut off by the Thracians with all his Forces.

20. Histiæus being dismissed by Darius upon that account formerly mentioned was ere this come to Sardis. Artaphernes demanding of him what should have moved the Ionians to Rebel, he answered, that he knew not, but wondred at the thing, whereto the other replied, telling him plainly that he had made that shoe which Aristagoras had put on. Fearing therefore to stay with him whom he perceived sufficiently to understand the matter, he fled the night after, and conveyed himself into the Island Chius, where the inhabitants supposing that he came to promote the affairs of Darius, cast him into prison, but upon farther advice restored him to liberty. Then sent he to some Persians lying at Sardis, who were partakers of his conspiracy, willing them to rise, but Artaphernes having timely notice thereof prevented it by putting them to death. This device failing, he procured the Chians to convey him to Miletus; but there he could not be received, the inhabitants rejoicing that they were rid both of him and Aristagoras; so that endeavouring to get in by night he was wounded in the Thigh, and forced to retire himself again to Chius. Here now not being able to procure any ships by all his intreaties, he went over to Mitylene where he persuaded the Lesbians to furnish him with 8 Vessels, with which he sailed to Byzantium; and at this Port he intercepted all such ships of the Ionians as coming from Pontus refused to obey him.

SECT. 2.

Miletus besieged.

21. The Persian Generals having much weakened the power of the Carians, and subdued all the Ionians that lived upon the Hellepont, were now ready to go against Miletus both by Sea and Land. The Ionian Deputies assembling in Pavonionum (the place of their publick Councils) resolved to levie no Land Army against them, but withstand their violence from the walls of Miletus, and make as great and strong a Fleet as possible. They ranged in order of battel near Leda, a little Island lying over against Miletus. The wing that looked towards the East the Milesians themselves made up with 80 Sail; to them joyned the Prienians with twelve, and the Musians with three. By them stood the Teians with seventeen, and by them the Chians with 100 Vessels. Beyond these were placed the Erybraeans with eight ships, and the Phoceans with three. Next to them stood the Lesbians with seventy, and in the last place were seen the Samians making up the Western wing with Sixty ships; the whole consisting of 353 Gallies with three ranks or Oars. But the Persian Navie contained 600 of Phœnicians, Cyprians, Egyptians, and Cilicians.

Idem ibid. Capp.
6. &c.

22. Though the Persian Fleet almost doubled the other in number of Vessels, yet the Captains feared both the skill and valour of the Ionians, and therefore betook themselves to politick Councils. They sent for the several Reguli or Tyrants of the Cities, whom Aristagoras had deposed at the beginning of the War, and desired that every one would endeavour to draw off his own Citizens. While they were using their utmost indeavour herein, Dionysius the Phocian Captain, and General of the whole Ionian Navie, exercising his men continually for the fight, they being unaccustomed to such discipline, were after seven dayes weary of it, and pitching their tents in the Island, therein shaded themselves, and could not be got to their ships. The Samians doubting whitherto their suggishnesse might tend, though it wisdom to hearken to the propositions made from the Persians by Æaces the son of Syloson their Prince, who advised them by a timely repentance to save their estates, rather than expose themselves to the anger of the Persian, who though he were beaten at present, was able to bring another Fleet five times as big, so that their labour and danger would know no end. Their Captains therefore took occasion at the disorder of the Ionians, to deny any further obedience, and, when the Phœnicians began to row their Fleet together to fall on, they hoised up their Sails and departed. After this pattern the Lesbians and a great part of the Ionians withdrew themselves; onely the Chians stood to it, who taking many of their Enemies ships, lost more of their own, and at length fled to Land. Some of them running their Gallies on ground at Mysale, went on foot by night unto Ephesus, where the women then celebrating the Thesmophoria, the Inhabitants taking them for thieves issued out and slew many of them. But Dionysius having light on the Persian Gallies, retreated not home, knowing his own Country would go to wrack with the rest, but going into Phœncia, there robbed certain ships of burthen of much wealth, and thus enriched sailed into Sicilie.

It is taken.

23. The Persians having thus done their work at Sea, presently laid siege to Miletus, which by undermining the walls, and using all sorts of Batteries, they utterly destroyed in the fifth year after the Rebellion was first begun by Aristagoras. Some of those Inhabitants which survived their Country, together with the Samians, transported themselves into Sicilie; the rest being brought to Susa before Darius, he without any punishment inflicted on them, placed in the City Ampia, situated where the River Tigris falleth into the Red Sea. As for their grounds, the Persians took to themselves the Champain Country, and gave the Mountainous parts to the Carians of Pedassus. Hystians seeing what was befallen Miletus with some Lesbians subdued Chius easily, being weakened before, whence with many Ionians and Æolians, he undertook an Expedition against Thasus; but hearing that the Phœnicians were gone from Miletus into the other parts of Ionia, he returned back to Lesbus. Here his forces not trusting themselves, he went over into the Province of Atarnes, as it were thence, and from the Territories of the the Myfians adjoining to gather forrage, where Harpagus the Persian then lying with a considerable force, ingaged with him in a fight at Maena, and having cut off the greater part of his men, took him alive. Being carried to Susa unto Ariaphernes, they nailed his body to a crosse, and sent his head as a present to Darius, who was displeased that they had not presented him alive, and caused his head to be buried, as of a friend, and one that had well deserved of the Persians. Now not onely Caria, but all the Islands and Cities on the continent were also recovered without much trouble: the most beautiful of the Boyes being made Eunuchs, and of the Girls sent to the Persian Court. And thus the Ionians were subdued the third time; once by the Lydians, and twice by the Persians: the tributes were established by Ariaphernes, according to Darius his former prescription, and all things settled at the cost of the revolters.

SECT. 2.

24. Two years after the destruction of Miletus, and in the 26th of his reign, Darius withdrawing the commissions of all his late Captains, sent Mardonius the son of Gobryas, who had married his daughter Artostre, with a great power to the Sea. Mardonius coming into Cilicia, sent away all his Land Forces towards the Hellepont, and passing by Sea into Ionia, there dissolved all the Tyrannies, as they were called, or powers of single men, and brought in the Democratical Government into the Cities. After this with his Fleet he subdued the Thasians, and with his Land Army other Macedonians besides them that formerly obeyed his Master; but loosing from Acanthus and coasting by the Mountain Athos, such a Tempest fell upon the Navie as sunk three hundred Vessels, wherein perished above 20000 men. Then quartering his Foot in Macedonia, the Thracians called Brygi, fell in upon him by night, and killing many wounded him also; whereupon, he turned his Forces upon them, and subduing them, carried back the Army into Asia. The year following Darius constrained the Thasians, who were accused by their neighbours of having an intention to revolt, to pull down their walls, and carry all their ships to Abdera. Then to try of what temper the Grecians were, he sent throughout Greece to demand Earth and Water. The Lacedamonians and Athenians threw the Messengers into pits, bidding them thence to take Earth and Water to carry to their Master; but the Inhabitants of Agina and other Islands out of fear complied, for which they were accused by the Athenian Ambassadors at Sparta, as intending with the Persians to fight against Athens. Hereupon Cleomenes one of the Kings, was sent to chastize the principal revolters, but such a contention fell betwixt him and his Colleague Demaratus about it, as ended at length in the deprivation of the latter, who thus unjustly outed of his Patrimony, betook himself to Darius, by whom he was bountifully entertained.

Greece.

25. When Darius sent into Greece to demand Earth and Water, he gave order to the Cities upon the Sea-coasts to build long ships and flat bottomed boats for the transportation of Horse. The burning of Sardis by the means of the Athenians and Eretrians, was thrice every time he went to meet still sounded in his ears. Hippias the late Prince of Athens was yet provoking him against that City, and at length procured forces to reduce him into his former place. Under colour of restoring him, Darius intended, if possible, to subdue all Greece, and therefore removing Mardonius, under whom the Fleet had of late miscarried, he put in his room Datis a Mede, and Ariaphernes his brothers son, to whom he gave in charge to lay waste Athens with Eretria, and bring the inhabitants thereof prisoners into his presence. In their passage they burnt Naxos, took some Forces and Hostages out of the Islands, and landed their Horse upon the Coasts of Eretria. They prepared to fight; but, the Enemy keeping himself within the walls, they strongly attempted the storming of the City for six dayes, and on the seventh had it betrayed into their hands by Euphorbus and Philagrus, two of the principal Citizens. The Athenians hearing of their approach, sent Phidippides a famous, though ordinary Foot-post, to Lacedemon, to desire that State to hasten their succours. They resolved to send aid; but said it was impossible speedily to do it, for that they could not break the Law, which forbid them to go forth on the ninth day of the moneth Or, except the Moon was at the full. Whilst they expected that season, the Athenians made choice of ten Captains for the War, and by this time the Persians, now Masters of Eretria, sailed into Attica, wherein they were conducted by Hippias, to the plains of Marathon, as most convenient for Horse. After the Athenians had taken the field, the Plateans came in to their aid, but a great dispute there was amongst the Captains, whether they should stand to the hazard of a battel. Those that were for the Negative had carried it, but that Miltiades, who was all for fighting, drew over Callimachus one of the Polemarchi to his party. The major part of the votes then passing on his side, each Captain assigned his day to him (who had formerly been Prince of the Chersonesus, and thence was expelled by the Persians) committing the management of the fight to his discretion.

26. Miltiades accepted of the charge, yet thought good not to fight till his one day (which was the tenth) should be arrived. Then set he the Army in order, and being at a miles distance from the Enemy, led very fast upon him, which the Persians attributed to madnesse, seeing the other so few in comparison of themselves, and badly provided both of Horse and Arms. The fight continued long, wherein, in the middle battel the Persians put the other to flight; but in both the wings the Grecians prevailed, and turning themselves upon those that worsted their fellows, made great slaughter of them as far as the Sea side, where they also seized upon seven of their ships. Concerning the number of the slain, Writers do not agree. Herodotus writeth of 6400 of the Barbarians, and 192 of the Grecians. On the one side fell Hippias, as Justin hath recorded out of Trogus, and Callimachus on the other. What year the battel was fought is not certainly known, but in the second or third of the 72 Olympiad, and four or five before the death of Darius.

27. Datis and Artaphernes returning into Persia, carried the Eretrians captive along with them to Susa, where they presented them before Darius; though Ctesias wrote that Datis was slain in the battel of Marathon, and that his body was denied to be restored. Darius placed the Eretrians in Anderica in Cissia, a Country so called, at 210 furlongs distance from Susa, the possession whereof their posterity held a long time together with their own language. Notwithstanding the defeat at Marathon, he left not off thoughts of conquering Greece, making all possible provision for another invasion. But in the fourth year after, more work fell into his hands; for though Diodorus telleth, that the Egyptians much honoured him as one of their Law-givers, they now rebelled. The year following he was provided for both Expeditions, and was about to undertake them, when the custom of the Country first required that he should name his Successor. He had three children before he was King by the daughter of Gobryas, whereof the eldest Artobazanes, (by others called Artemenes and Ariamenes) challenged the Kingdom by virtue of his birth right. But it was judged due to Xerxes his eldest son by Mossa Cyrus his daughter, who was founder of the Empire, and he accordingly was declared at this time; although some make this civil and loving contest betwixt the two brothers, to have happened after their Father's death, and been judged by Artaphernes their Uncle. But as Darius was about setting forwards for Greece he was prevented by death, the first year after the rebellion of Aegypt ending, after he had reigned 36 years compleat, in the third year of the 73 Olympiad ending, before the Era of Christ, 485. A. M. 3519.

28. Xerxes succeeded his Father in the third year of the third Olympiad, being the fourth King of Persia, the right to the Empire whereof he fetched from Cyrus his Grand-father by the Mother's side. He was scarce settled in the Throne, when Mardonius his kinsman stirred him up with earnestnesse not to give over the War which he had begun with Greece, promising to himself great command upon the conquest of Europe, which he made Xerxes believe believe would be as readily performed as spoken. He, though ambitious enough, was not at first of himself very forward, but as it concerned him, thought first of recovering Egypt, for which all things were left in readinesse by his father, and in the year next after his death turned his forces thither with present successe. For, he reduced that Countrey under the yoke, which he laid heavier upon it than formerly, and committed the Government thereof to his brother Achamenes, who was after many years slain by Inarus the Libyan.

ing the War with Greece.

29. Egypt being thus fortunately recovered, he was therewith much elevated, and now had resolved to follow on the War with Greece; but to hear what his Captains would say, he called them together to advise about it, to whom with vanity enough he opened his mind, and was seconded by an indiscreet flattering speech of Mardonius, who seemed with words to be able to blast the present condition of Greece. His Uncle Artabanus, a grave and long experienced man, strongly urged the contrary, shewing how vain humane confidence was, how brittle and instable the fortune of Princes and others, which appeared sufficiently in his fathers expedition against the Scythians first, and since that, against the Athenians: that the Greeks were not so weak a Nation he proved by the battel at Marathon, that the thing which he attempted was most dangerous to be thought on again, and again, that without mature deliberation the attempt would be rash however the successe should happen; that God many times pulls down the highest things, and humbleth the haughty that trust in their own strength, by making them to fall into sudden calamities: and as for Mardonius, he chastised his youthfull and ambitious heart with a sharp reprehension, foretelling him what would be the reward of his rashnesse. But this wise Counsel could not be heard from a grave man, the ears of Xerxes being stopped by the suggestions of one more agreeable to his head-strong, and youthfull humour; so that he imputed to his Uncle basenesse of mind and cowardise, inflicting this punishment upon him for it, that staying at home he should not partake of so glorious an expedition. To this enterprize he was also stirred up by the Aleuadae, or Princes of Thessaly, who grudged at the liberties of the Greeks: by the son of Pisistratus also banished Athens, who living in his Court, abused his credulity by the help of a Wizard, or Fortune-Teller.

Idem ibid. Capp.

30. Yet not long after, considering what Artabanus had said, he changed his purpose, and calling his Council together again, after he had commended his Uncles opinion, signified the same unto them, at which all the wiser sort much rejoiced; but the thing running much in his mind, so that he was disturbed in his sleep, he returned to his former resolution, and resolved on the expedition. In the preparation for it three years (Herodotus saith four) were taken up, all Asia being concerned therein so far, as to seem to be removed out of its place. A Navy he provided out of all the Sea-Coasts of his Empire to the number of above 1200 Vessels, which he commanded to meet at Cuma and Phocæa; and having out of all his Provinces gathered great multitudes of horse and foot, at length he moved from Susa in the fourth year of the 74th Olympiad, and in the fifth year (not after the Egyptian expedition as Herodotus hath it, but) of his reign. All the land forces met at Critale, with which he passed the River Halys, and came to Celæna, a Citie of Phrygia, where Pythius the Lydian (or Bithynian as Pliny will have him) entertained him and his Army, & presented him with a vast summe of money, which he returned with advantage. And so at length he came to Sardis, whence he sent into Greece to demand earth and water, as Symboles of subjection. The Navy was come to the Chersonesus by this time, which that it might shun the inconvenience which that formerly Governed by Mardonius had incutred, by sayling about the Mountain, or Promontory of Achos, he caused the Mountain to be cut off from the main, by a Ditch so broad as two Vessels might sayl a breast, through which the whole Navy passed. And wintering this year at Sardis, he commanded a Bridge to be laid over the Hellespont (a mile over, wanting an 8th part) which being shattered and broken by a great Tempest, he took so hainously, as he commanded 300 stripes to be given the Sea, and a pair of Fetters to be cast into it in token of servitude, and causing the heads of the work-men to be cut off, ordered other Bridges to be made.

31. In the beginning of the Spring he moved from Sardis with his whole Army and came to Abydos, the day being turned into night by a sudden darkness (though no stars appeared) at his setting forth; with which portentous thing (being no true eclipse) Pythius, who formerly entertained him, was so terrified, that of his five sons listed in the Army, he desired the eldest, as the comfort of his old age, might be left to him, at which the King was so angry, that he commanded the young man to be cut in two, and the parts so to be laid asunder that the Army might passe betwixt them. When he was come to Abydos he had an extream desire to view all his forces, for which purpose he had an high ascent raised for him, where he also desired to see a Sea-fight, which in shew was performed, and wherein the Sidonians had the better: with the sight hereof, and all his Land forces on the shore, he was elevated into a great passion of joy, apprehending of how many thousands he was Master, and then presently again into another of weeping, the cause of which Ariabannus his Uncle demanding (who had thus far accompanied him) he told him, it was in thinking that of so many thousands not a man should be alive 100 years after. Hence that wise old man took occasion to discourse to him most gravely of the vanity, and miseries of this life, and being again importuned to tell his opinion concerning the expedition, did it with the same faithfulness as formerly, after which he sent him back to Susa to Govern as his Deputy in his absence.

32. Then prepared he for his passage into Europe, and having performed his Heathenish Devotions to the Sun, by one of the Bridges bending towards the Euxine, passed over his horse and foot, and by another inclining towards the Aegean, his slaves and beasts, seven dayes, and as many nights being taken up in the passage. The Fleet sayled Westward to the Promontory of Sarpedon, the Land forces marching through the Chersonesus of Thrace to Agora, and so bore down towards the Bay of Melana, where a River of the same name failed them in drinking, as Scamander, and several others in Asia are said to have done before. Passing over, and moving Westward they came to Dorisus, where being a vast plain watered with the great River Hebrus, there they pitched their Tents, and Xerxes mustered his whole Army, both by Land and Sea.

Ibid. Cap. 52, 53, & c.

33. The greatest number of men it contained that ever were seen listed under the Banners of one man; but yet great is the variety found in Writers about the true number: Herodotus writeth of 1700000 foot, and 80000 Horse, besides Camels, and Chariots; Diodorus Siculus not half so many foot, viz. 800000. and yet what he assigns to the foot, Ctesias attributeth to the whole Army, which he writeth to have consisted of 80 Myriads, besides Chariots: Justin from Trogus, and Orosius out of him, reckons 700000 men out of his own Dominions, and 300000 Auxiliaries. Ælian writeth of 700000 in all, Cornelius Nepos of 700000 foot, and 400000. (perhaps rather 40000) Horse. Pliny 788000 (for the name of Darius, Xerxes being to be read) and Isocrates agreeth with Ælian, mentioning onely 700000 in all. As for the Navy there were found 1207 beaked ships, and other Vessels for carrying of Horses, and for other uses 3000. according to Herodotus, from whom Diodorus little dissenteth as to the number of the Gallies, writing, there were found above 1200 of them, to which he addeth 850 Horse-boats, and other Vessels of burthen of 30 Oars apiece 3000. with the former agreeth Ctesias (though often dissenting) and Cicero: with the later Isocrates and Lyfias. Orosius mentions 1200 beaked Gallies, and 3000 Vessels of burthen; and as for that place in Justin, which encreaseth the number of the Fleet to 100000. there is no doubt of its corruption. Herodotus by giving 200 men to every Gally, and furnishing all the other Vessels, conjectures 517610 men to have been bestowed in the whole Fleet, so that at this muster the Land and Sea-forces being added together, with the 20000 Arabians that drove Camels, and the Libyans the Chariots, at this rate would amount to 2317610. besides slaves and others that followed the Camp.

34. Notwithstanding all this number, he commanded all the Nations in his passage, from Doriscus towards Greece, to march along with him, so that hereby came an accession of 120 ships to his Fleet, to which giving 200 men a piece, the number will amount to 24000. and to his Land Army another of 30 Myriads, or 300000 men, as Herodotus gathereth (though Diodorus thinketh lesse something then 20 Myriads) and so the whole number of his Asian and European Souldiers would on this account amount to 2641610. and yet he thinketh the number of slaves and attendants to have rather exceeded this, so that if it onely be doubled, the number of those persons that by Land came to Thermopylae, and by Sea to Sepias, amounted to 5283220.

of his men.

And for the number of women that baked meat, and of Concubines and Eunuchs which followed, no man can assign them, of carriage beasts, and for the Waggon, and of Indian Dogs no man could count; so that no wonder it is that to this stupendous multitude some sorts of Rivers failed to afford drink, or that Plutarch and Isocrates should write 5000000 to have followed Xerxes into Greece; the wonder is, that no greater plague raged amongst them, that any concord could be preserved amongst so many Nations, & that provisions could be procured for the preservation of the lives of so many Creatures.

35. The Gracians all this while having had intelligence, first of his design all along from Demaratus the Spartan Exile, and then of his motions, were according to their several interests variously affected. Some, as the Thebans, and the rest of the Boeotians (except the Thespians, and them of Platea) and many Thessalians (perswaded by the Alcanda) and several others, cut of fear, had under-hand sent earth and water, as Symboles of subjection: Many also were uncertain in their resolutions, not knowing what to do. The rest meeting at the Isthmus, and consulting for the publick safety, resolved, and swore to joyn together in War against the Persians, and with United power to defend the liberty of Greece, at the present to wave all their private differences for that purpose, and to remit the monies owing to each other; to devote the tenth to Apollo, i.e. to do to death the tenth man of all those that had already given up themselves to the Enemy. The War which had often been patched up, and still brake out again, betwixt the Athenians and them of Aegina, was composed. By occasion of this War the Athenians of late had strengthened themselves exceedingly at Sea, through the procurement of Themistocles the son of Neocles, a very wise man, who had brought the people to lay out the money, which issued out of the Golden Mines of Laureia, and was to be divided amongst the multitude man by man, upon shipping, whereby the Fleet was encreased to almost 200 sayl, and Greece came to be preserved. About the same time it hapned that the Athenians asking Counsel at Delphos, the Oracle answered, that Wooden Walls alone would be security to them; which several interpreting several wayes, he expounded ships to be meant by it, and pressed hard, that a Sea victory was promised them at the Island Salamine, which being received by the greater part, they set themselves with all their might to the strengthening of their Navy.

36. But those of the League finding it convenient to call in the help of their friends, and Allies, sent into Sicily, Corcyra and Crete, to desire aid and assistance of the Greek Colonies against the publick Enemy; and to Argos to excite them to joyn against him with the rest of their Neighbours. But all was to no purpose; for Gelon, who then had all Sicily in his power, and was thought to have more ships than all the associates put together, refused to give any aid except he might be declared Captain General of the whole Army; the Corcyreans promised great matters, confessing their safety to be involved in that of Greece; but resolving to make use of the successe of either party, when danger threatened Greece from Xerxes they sent 60 ships, under shew of supply, but commanded the Fleet to hover about Laconia, and apply it self to Xerxes, if the Conquerour, as coming in to his assistance, which being observed, after the fight the Officers excused themselves for being absent at the fight at Salamine, because the Etesian winds blowing contrary, they could not double the Cape of Malea. The Cretans very powerful at Sea put off the matter under pretence of hearing an answer from the Oracle at Delphos, whither they said they had sent: and the Argives out of hatred to the Lacedemonians, proposed such conditions as could not be admitted, and afflicted them sore with the rest of the associates.

37. The Athenians then and Lacedemonians being most engaged (against whom the design of the Persian was most bent) applied themselves with all their might to make resistance. Xerxes being about to passe over into Europe, the Thessalians sent to them, demanding help to secure themselves, or else being unable to stand out they must yield. The Council General at that time being assembled in the Isthmus, thinking it wisdom to withstand him at the first entry into Greece, rather than to defend it in broken parts, sent presently away by Sea 10000 men into Theffalia, under conduct of Evemerus a Spartan, and Themistocles the Athenian, who in conjunction with the Theffalian Horse, at the River Peneus, flowing betwixt the Straights of Ossa and Olympus, might hinder the passage of the Persians; but after they came there, it being shewed to them to be but a vain thing there to oppose themselves against so great a multitude, especially seeing there were other passages into Theffalie, by Alexander King of Macedonia, they returned back again to the Isthmus, and the Theffalians thus forsaken, gave themselves up to the Persians. Afterwards the Council again deliberating what should be done, resolved to seize upon the Straights of Thermopyla, which are the only passage out of Theffalie into Greece, and better to be maintained by far than the other, and concluded on sending 6000 Foot thither under command of Leonidas the valiant King of Sparta. Sea matters were committed to the care of the Athenians and Aeginetans especially, and it was resolved, that the Fleet should sail to the Artemisian shore, towards the North part of the Island Eubœa, and not far from the Straights. Xerxes drawing near, this was done accordingly, both as to Land and Sea Forces; but the Navy receiving an Alarm, through a mischance of three of it's ships, retreated into the Straights betwixt Eubœa and Bœotia, where Euripus floweth betwixt Chalcis and Aulis; but understanding of a great Wrack suffered by the Persian Fleet, wherein by tempestuous weather were lost 400 Vessels, with a great multitude of men, and much treasure, it returned back after a few daies; in the mean while Xerxes drew down with his innumerable multitudes to the Straights.

38. He sent before a Spie to look how Leonidas and his men behaved themselves, who bringing him word how he found the Spartans, who then kept watch, exercising themselves in gymnick games, and dressing their heads as on some Festival, he demanded of Demaratus their Country-man the reason thereof. He told him they were fully resolved to die for their Country, and ready to fight it out to the last man, if need required, whereat he derided him as before when he spake of the valour of his Country-men, thinking they would be so skared at his multitudes, as not to dare to come to hand-strokes. But finding no such matter, but Demaratus his words to be true, on the fifth day after, he commanded a party of Medes to fall upon them, who being with great slaughter repulsed, he sent his Band of Persians, which being invincible as he thought, he named immortal, and they, though wanting no courage under the eyes of the King, who from an high throne beheld the fight, came off with the same successe; whereat he was astonished, grew melancholy, as being now solicitous for his whole Army. The next day the fight was renewed, but with the same successe, great slaughter being made of the Persians, so that the way being more narrow by the carkeises, there was no room for a multitude to fight, which being driven one upon another, the confusion and consequently the slaughter was the greater. At this Xerxes was struck with great consternation, not knowing what to do.

39. There was one in the Army, a Trachinian, named Epialtes or Ephialtes (as Pausanias writeth it) who understanding his trouble went to him, and offered ferred to shew a way over the Mountains, by which, though with much difficulty, he might send a Party to come about, and fall on the backs of the Grecians. Being cheered with this, he sent as many as shewed themselves most forward, with him, under the command of Hydarnes, who passing over the River Asopus, got in the dark of the night up into the Mountain, where beating down the Guard of Phocians which there watched, they began to come into the more plain and easie way, when the thing was carried by some fugitives to the Grecians. They were stricken with great terror at the report, all but Leonidas with his Spartans, who for that the Lacedemonians were told by an Oracle, that they must either lose their City or one of their Kings, was very readie to abide to the utmost. Wherefore he willingly gave way to his associates to depart, bidding them to reserve themselves for the better condition of their Country, who all presently falling off, except the Thespians, and such Thebans as the rest of the Grecians had forced thither, not so much to help them, as to keep them as Hostages; with them and his 300 Spartans he prepared himself to fight with a mind devoted already to death. When the Sun was up, and the Persians not yet got down, those resolute Grecians passing the Straights to redeem their lives at dearer rates, fell in upon the multitudes of their enemies, with which being compassed about, they were all cut off, with Leonidas, except such as retiring back into the Straights took an hill, and fighting valiantly with those Persians whom Epialtes had led down upon them, sold their lives as their fellows at a dear rate; 20000 of Xerxes his Army with this handful of men being slain. The Thebans alone lifted up their Targets begging quarter, crying out they were brought thither against their wills, and that they were Xerxes his Subjects, yet were they slain, or being taken were stigmatized for disgrace. The body of Leonidas being found was nailed to a crosse. These things hapned at Thermopyle in the middle of Summer, while some of the Grecians in Peloponnesus were celebrating the games of the 75th Olympiad, in the beginning of it's first year, wherein Callias was Archon at Athens, as we are told from Diodorus Siculus, of whose history digested according to the years of their solemnities, that part now extant beginneth with this Expedition; at which time also Philosophy was translated out of Ionia to Athens by Anaxagoras the Clazomenian, Scholar to Anaximenes the Milesian, who now being twenty years old began to profess it in that City, way being made for Learning there by the Library collected through the industrie of Pisistratus.

40. Xerxes having now had experience of what Demaratus had said to him, asked his advice for carrying on the War: being in great doubt what to do, after he had heard how they of Sparta were able to arm well-nigh 8000 men of such temper as the former; and that the other Lacedemonians though inferior to those were very valiant. Demaratus being of this opinion, that all the Land-forces would assemble together at the Isthmus, to defend that entrie into Peloponnesus, advised him to send 300 ships well manned to spoil the Country of Laconia, thereby to keep the Lacedemonians and their neighbours entangled at home, whilst having subdued the rest, he might afterwards fall upon them, who would be then too weak of themselves to sustain his power: he farther also advised, that 300 Vessels should seize upon Cythera the Island, which lying near the Coasts of Laconia, might serve as a place of retreat or rendezvouze for their own security, and endamaging of the Enemy; Chilon the Lacedemonian having been wont to say, that it were better for them to have it drowned in the Sea, than to stand so as it did for their disadvantage. But Achemenes the brother of Xerxes stiffly impugned this advise, lest by the severing of the Fleet after such losse by the Tempest, they might prove too weak for the Grecians at Sea; and to this out of fear, the King submitted, hoping his Land-Army and Fleet should stand each the other in good stead, both holding one course, and not lying far asunder.

41. The Fleet of the Grecians stood all this while at Artemisium, as a bulwark to Eubœa, commanded by Enrybiades the Lacedemonian, to whom the Athenians for quietnesse and safety gave place. But now the Peloponnesians

Perſians having every one an eye upon his own Country, longed to go farther into Greece, and were onely ſtaied by the cunning of Themistocles, till ſuch time as the Eubœans could ſecure their wives and children, with the principal of their goods. In the mean time the Perſians thinking to incompaſſe them, ſent 200 ſail to come behind about the Iſland, they lying in the Straights berwixt it and the Main. They had knowledge of this deviſe, and not ignorant of the loſſe ſuſtained by the Perſian Fleet in the laſt tempeſt, ſet ſail at midnight, and met theſe 200 ſhips with a counter-ſurpriſe, took and ſunk thirty of them, and forced the reſt to take the Sea, where by foul weather they were driven upon the Rocks, and all caſt away. The news of this was brought to the Gracians by 53 Athenian ſhips, ſent in to encrease the Fleet, which doubled the joy thereof, ſo that elevated with new hopes, they ſet next day upon ſome Cilician ſhips, which were ſeſevered from the reſt of the Fleet, and damniſying them much, returned to Artemiſum.

A Sea fight.

42. The Perſians taking this in great indignation, and fearing the anger of Xerxes, reſolved to redeem their credit with ſome notable exploit, and for that purpoſe the next day in the form of a crescent invaded the Gracians. They cheerfully gave them battel, and the fight indured from noon till night, ending with equal loſſe to both parties. For though more of the Perſian Veſſels were loſt, yer, the leſſer damage fell as heavy upon the other, which being ſmaller could leſſe bear it, though they fought moſt manfully for their Liberty and Country, the Athenians deſerving beſt amongſt them, and amongſt the Athenians, Clinias the Father of Alcibiades, a famous man in the next Age. Amongſt the Perſians the Egyptians fought moſt ſtoutly; and theſe things hapned at Sea thoſe ſame three daies in which the Land-aſſion was at Thermopghyla, in both the Straights the Greeks endeavouring to hinder the Enemies acceſſe into their Country. But ſhortly after they had intelligence by one ſent out on purpoſe, what was become of Leonidas and thoſe with him, they would needs depart from Artemiſum, and draw their Navie, much battered in the former Fights, more inwards and nearer home. Themistocles ſeeing their reſolution, before they weighed Anchor, perſwaded them to kill up the Carrel of the Eubœans, and bring the meat on ſhipboard, rather than to leave them a prey to the Enemy, and engraved upon ſtones upon the ſhore, and at the watering-places, where he knew the Ionians would come, an exhortation to revolt to the Greeks, and ſide with their Morher-Country, or elſe ſtand neutral in the fight, or fight coldly. This he hoped would either prevail with them, or at leaſt render them ſuſpected with the Perſian.

43. From Artemiſum they ſailed to the Coaſt of Attica, and at the deſire of the Athenians took up their harbour at the Iſland Salamine: the Perſian Fleet removed to Artemiſum and the Coaſt adjoyning to Hiſtaotis. Xerxes now having paſſed the Streights of Thermopghyla, marched through the Country of Doris into Phock, which being forſaken of it's Inhabitants he waſted, and when he came to Panopæa a Town thereof, he divided his Army into two parts. With the one he invaded Greece, and the other he ſent to riſle and burn the famous Temple of Delphos, bur, as it's ſaid, this party was almoſt wholly deſtroyed without humane help, by Thunder and Lightning, and two Rocks, which breaking off from the Mountain Parnaſſus, overwhelmed it: thoſe that eſcaped were generally killed by the Phocians, who having fled into the Mountain for fear of Xerxes, fell upon them; ſo that few remained and eſcaped to their Friends in Bœotia. Xerxes now marched through Bœotia the Country of his allies into Atica, with intention to do his utmoſt againſt the City of Athens it ſelf.

44. In the mean time the Gracian Fleet lying at Salamine, though ſtrengthened with a new acceſſion of ſhips at the Coaſt of Trezene, could hardly be contained there; for every one being ſollicitous for his own Countrey, and deſpairing of Atica, and the reſt of Greece without the Iſthmus, was buſie in fortifying it, and laboured thither to bring the Navy, whence there might be a ſafe retreat into Peloponneſus if need were; This the Athenians underſtand-

ing, were sore troubled, as having justly expected that the Peloponnesians would joyn with them, and the rest of the associates in defending Attica, as they had fought for them at Artemisium; but making the best use of it they could, begged of them so long to stay there till they could provide some way for themselves. Having obtained this, they published an Edict by the procurement of Themistocles (who improved the Oracle formerly mentioned to this purpose, and invented other devices) that all fit by age should come aboard, and transport their wives & children out of the Citie, with their slaves, & what they could, which was done, most carrying them to Trazene, where they were kindly entertained: and that Aristides, a man famous for wisdom, justice, and integrity, but lately banished for a time by the Ostracism, by the potent faction of Themistocles, might return home; by the same procurement another Order was made to recall all such as were so banished, that they might now in time of need serve their Countrey, and out of fear lest they should joyn themselves to the Enemy.

supra.

45. In the Fleet now at Salamine were 358 armed ships, besides other vessels of lesse importance, of which 180 were provided and furnished by the Athenians, 161 onely by the Lacedemonians, the Corinthians sent 40. the inhabitants of Egina 30. which were notable for swiftnesse, the Megarians 20. they of Chalcis furnished as many, having the Vessels of the Athenians: the rest were supplied in lesser numbers by the Chians, Naxians, Melians, and Seriphians Islanders. Whilest the Officers were in Council about the place of battel, news came that the Enemy was entred Attica, wasting all with fire and sword: for having in Boetia burned the Towns of the Thespians, and Plataeans, who had forsaken their habitations, he hasted into Attica, where consuming all things, he entred Athens three moneths after he had passed over his forces into Europe. The Castle some few who would not leave their ancient seat held out to the last, and were all put to the sword, having refused quarter upon a vain confidence of the Oracle, that the Citie should be defended with wooden Walls, and thinking they fulfilled the same by fortifying themselves with Boards and Pallisadoes: the Temple of Minerva in the Castle he burnt to ashes. The message being brought, the Captains departed every man to his ship, decreeing nothing, and all the rest of the Peloponnesians determind to sayl to the Isthmus.

46. This resolution might have proved fatal to all Greece, had it not been prevented by the wisdom of Themistocles, who being stirred up by Mnesiphilus of Athens followed Eurybiades the Admiral into his ship, and obtained of him again to Assemble the Council. Here he overcame him by his mildnesse, who lifting up his Rod in an heat to strike him, he bade him strike so he would but hear. When he came to speak of staying at Salamine, one Adimantys upbraided him with the losse of his Countrey, saying, It was not fit that such an one should give Counsel to them that had theirs remaining to them; to whom he boldly replied, that though they, the Athenians, had left their houses and valls, dead things, and not to be valued at their liberty, yet they had a Citie left them, than which there was none greater in Greece, viz. 200 ships, which as yet was present, and ready to help their associates; but if they would depart, and betray them, he would have them know they should presently hear that the Athenians had both a free Citie and Territories as good as that they had left, meaning Siris, a Town in Italy, in their power: Eurybiades hearing this, and fearing to be deprived of the Athenian Fleet, so necessary for their support, inclined to his opinion, insomuch that the Grecians resolved to stay, and prepared themselves for the fight; but the Persian Fleet drawing down to Phalerus the Athenian Port, and the Land army to the Sea-side, the Peloponnesians were so afrighted thereat, that having all their minds upon the Isthmus, the advise of Themistocles was not at all regarded, and they resolved to weigh Anchors, and to be gone that night, and notice hereof was given to the Mariners.

the shipwrack at Sepias, and taking all Nations as he passed along with them, his Land Army contained as great a number as heretofore at Thermopylae. The King came down from Athens to Phalerus the Port, and called a Council to deliberate what should be done. All the Captains were for a Sea-fight, the Kings of Tyre and Sidon being first asked their opinions by Mardonius; onely a woman, Artemisia Queen of Halicarnassus, a wife and valiant woman, who had followed Xerxes in this expedition with five ships, with grave and important arguments dissuaded a Sea-fight, and advised him to enter Peloponnesus with his Land Army, for thereby he would presently dissolve the Greekish Fleet, and finish the War. Though this advice followed would have been enough, and Xerxes could not but commend it, yet the major and worse part carried it, and it was resolved to fight the Grecians out of hand at Salamine. The Anchors then were weighed, and the Fleet made thitherwards; but night coming on suffered them not that day to reach the Island.

48. At this time were the Peloponnesians ready to depart homewards, and thereby the Estate of Greece to be ruined, by their breaking their united power, and reducing themselves into their particular and inconsiderable conditions, had not Themistocles, born for the preservation of his Countrey, relieved it by his wisdom in its great necessity. There was one Sicinus a Persian, who, taken prisoner, was a great lover of Themistocles, and taught his Children. Him he sent privately to the King, to tell him, that he preferring his good before that of the Grecians, gave him now first to understand that they were about to fly, and advised him not to suffer it, but prevent them, and set upon them whilest they were disordered, and the Fleet was severed from their Land Army. Xerxes gladly hearing the message, as believing it to proceed out of Themistocles his affection to him, communicated it to his Officers, and whilest the rest could be furnished with Souldiers, sent 200 ships about the Island to block up the Straights, so that none of the Enemies might escape. Themistocles communicated what he had done to Aristides, who approving of it, went to perswade the Greeks to fight, when presently, whilest their minds hung in suspense, came a ship of Tenedos from the Persian Fleet, and acquainted them with what was done in the Straights, so that necessity compleated what was but half effected by the speech of Aristides.

Plutarch in Themistoc.

49. Then prepared they themselves unanimously to the battel. Themistocles made a speech unto them, wherein he shewed where their concernments lay, exhorting them to fight manfully for their Countrey and Liberty; for their Parents, Wives, Children, and whatsoever was dear to them, with which being provoked they applied themselves to their ships, and put forth the Fleet into the Main. Xerxes placed himself on an high Throne to behold the fight over against Salamine, and had some with him to write down the particulars thereof. A bloody fight was fought with great earnestness on both sides, the one fighting under the eyes of their King, who marked every passage, and accordingly was affected, and the other for as much as could be dear to them in so dangerous a condition. Herein the Greeks had the advantage, that they were more exercised in Sea matters, and having all they had lying at the stake, they did it with the more earnestness, and in that they fought with greater order: the Persian with so great a multitude of ships, fought in disorder, and hindred one another, and if the Vessels sunk were all lost, whereas their Enemies by their skill in swimming saved themselves. At length their Ionians, solicited as was said, by little and little withdrawing themselves from the fight, the rest, what by that discouraged, and overcome by the pertinacious valour of their enemies, began to fly; the Athenians pressing hard upon them, and destroying many of their ships; of such as fled towards Phalerus, many were intercepted by the Egeatans, the Emulators of the other in deserving well of Greece; such as escaped them, and got to the Port, thence withdrew themselves to the Land Army.

Idem & Herod. ut prius.

Xerxes his Fleet defeated.

50. Of all the Grecians the Athenians and Egeatans deserved best, and amongst them Themistocles, the Captains of the Fleet each one, when upon their their Oaths they pronounced who merited most, naming him after themselves. Amongst the Persians the valour of Artemisia the Queen was most conspicuous, acknowledged by Xerxes himself, who thereupon said, that his men were turned women, and women became men: she was saved as it hapned, and escaped to Phalerus. Many Noble Persians fell, amongst the rest Ariabignes the Kings brother, few of the Gracians. Xerxes exceedingly discouraged with this great losse, considered of his safe retreat out of Europe, fearing the Ionians might break the bridge laid over the Hellepont; yet that he might colour any such intention, he began a new project by casting earth into the Straights, to joyn the Island Salamina with the Continent. But Mardonius understanding his temper, and bethinking himself in what case he himself might stand for being the first adviser to the War, went to him, and extenuating the losse, the Land Army being left inire, at length proposed to him, to leave to him 300000 men, with which he would engage to revenge him upon Greece, and reduce it all under his power, if he pleased to depart himself into Asia, being nothing tainted in honour for that things had not so well succeeded in this encounter, because the miscarriage was procured by the Cowardise of the Egyptians, Phœnicians, Celicians, and others no better than slaves, the Persians having gallantly enough behaved themselves, and he, their Prince, having subdued already the greater part of Greece, and taken Athens it self, against which the War was principally intended.

51. He liked very well the motion, but still dissembled the matter, answering, he would refer it to his Council, which he accordingly called, and asked the advice particularly of Artemisia. She approved of Mardonius his Counsel, for that if he should subdue Greece it would be to the Kings advantage, and if he miscarried it would be no disgrace to him, who in his own person had accomplished the main design of the expedition, in taking, and wasting Athens; he was pleased therewith, sent her beforehand away with his sons he had brought with him, and gave liberty to Mardonius to make choice of what, and how many Forces he pleased; all this being done the same day with the fight at Salamis. The night following in great fear and disorder the Fleet loosed from Phalerus, and fled amain towards the Hellepont, which the Gracians seeing, persued them as far as Andros one of the Cyclades, and took in there, for that they could then no more discern them, and that Island had been of the Persian faction. Here it being debated in the Council of Officers whether the Enemy should be any further persued, Eurybiades the General, for several grave and urgent reasons, dissuaded it, a Bridge being rather to be laid for him, inasmuch that he convinced the rest, and Themistocles, who as Herodotus saith, was formerly for the persute, or else dissembled, for that which followed, changed his mind, and restrained the Athenians.

52. And further foreseeing that through their inconstancy, & known ingratitude, he might have cause in time to come to use friends, that now he might make one of Xerxes, and therein also further provide for the good of his Countrey, he betook himself to his wonted craft and policy. He dispatched away to him his former trusty Messenger, to acquaint him how carefull he was for his safety, in dissuading the Gracians from persuing him, and to advise him by all means to make towards the Hellepont, ere the Bridge should be broken down, which he thought would be within a small time. He being much afrighted hereat retreated presently with all his Forces the same way he came, into Thessaly, where delivering to Mardonius 300000 men picked out of the whole Army, and settling other matters, with a small and obscure train fittest for haste (all the rest being commanded to follow) he hasted through Macedonia and Thrace to the Hellepont, where he arrived after 45 dayes. Here, whether he found the Bridge whole, and so passed over it, or (what the Gracians have believed) broken in pieces by Tempests, and so passed over obscurely in a fishers Boar, observable is the great change upon him, who with so great pride had formerly beaten the Sea, and cast Fetters into it. His Army following was a great part consumed by the plague, famine, and other casualties, so that the fowls of the aire continually followed it, the way being full of carkeises. Being shipped also over to Abydus, very many died by intemperate use of diet, and drinking too much in the dysenterie, wherewith they were sorely grieved. Those that remained, by slow journies reached to their King lying at Sardis.

He flyeth.

53. Ariabazus, a man of prime note amongst the Persians, accompanied Xerxes to the Hellepont, with a partie of 60000 men taken out of Mardonius's Army, who finding at his return the Inhabitants of Potidea in Macedonia to have revolted, fearing the Pallenians round about would do the same, and suspecting also Olynthus, which then was inhabited by the Bottians, he besieged both Towns, of which the latter he took, and killing the Towns-men gave it to one Criobulus of Chalcis to govern, after which, they of that place inhabited it. He then more strongly besieged Potidea, but after three moneths having layn before it to no purpose, many of his men being lost in the Sea, which broke in with an unusual Tide, he rose up and departed to Mardonius, who, for that Winter was at hand, had taken up his quarters in Thessali, and the adjoyning places of Macedonia. The Persian Fleet being returned to the Coast of Asia, wintred at Cuma, for the greatest part, onely some ships at Samos, whither in the Spring they all sailed, being increased to the number of 300 by the addition of the Ionians, on whose Coast now they lay to keep them in obedience, being little desirous of sailing any more Westward, for the experience they had lately had of the Gracians at Salamina, and being in as little fear of their coming to them, whom they expected to be kept in awe, so as not to stir far from home, because of Mardonius.

54. They stirred not about providing any Land-forces wherewith to oppose Mardonius; but very busie they were at Agina in rigging their Fleet, over which Leutychides King of Sparta (issued from Procles, and put into the place of Demeratus;) was made Admiral: Xanthippus Father to Pericles being General of the Athenian Fleet, which contained the most ships. Whilst they abode here, came six men from Chios, who having conspired against Serathes their Tyrant, upon discovery of the plot, fled, beseeching them that they would undertake the freeing of Ionis; and so far they prevailed, as to get them to Delus; but no further would they go, because unacquainted as yet with the affairs of Asia, they feared the Persians, so that both parties stood in awe of each other.

55. Mardonius thinking of his promise made to his Master, consulted the Oracles, but they refusing to answer, he sent Alexander King of Macedonia, now in great grace with the Persians, through the marriage of his Sister to Butaris, in ambassage to the Athenians, to take them off from the society with the rest of Greece. He knew they gave the most mortal blows in the battel at Salamina, and thought, that if they could be taken off, the rest would be conquered with little or no difficulty. The fame of this Ambassage flying abroad, came to Sparta, which nettled the Lacedemonians, and made them with all speed to dispatch away Ambassadors of their own, to prevent the alliance so dangerous to all Greece, and the Athenians refused to give audience to Alexander, till they were arrived, that they might also be present therein. Alexander told them how Xerxes had given order to Mardonius to signifie to them how willing he was to remit what was past, to restore them their Territories, and more than them if they would, to leave them to their own freedom, and repair up their Temples at his own charges, if they would enter into a league of amitie with him, otherwise they could not be ignorant how great inconveniencies they drew upon themselves from so potent a Prince, able to send other Armies if they now with Mardonius should be overthrown: to these things spoken as from Mardonius, the Ambassador added as a friend, not to let slip such an opportunity. After him the Ambassadors of Sparta spoke, and shewed how unworthy a thing it would be for the Athenians of all others, to forsake the publick cause, they having been the causers of the War, and their Ancestors been so renowned for setting others at liberty, wherefore they hoped that they would not be accessary to the slavery of all Greece. Their answer was to Alexander, that so long as the Sun should hold hold his course, they would never enter into alliance with Xerxes, but resist his forces with their own; and him they desired, whom they respected as a friend, not any more to bring such an unwelcome message, lest he might suffer something from the angry people. To the Spartians they answered to this purpose: That they would never any of them as long as they lived enter into confederacy with the Persians; they thanked them for their kind offer to maintain their wives and children in case of necessity, which they hoped they should not have much cause to need, so as to be troublesome to them, and desired them to hasten away to them their supplies, for that they thought the Barbarian would not lose time after the report of their answer, but presently invade them; and they thought it most convenient to meet him in Boeotia.

56. Mardonius having received this answer from Athens, in great wrath marched thitherwards out of Thessalie. When he came to Thebes, the Inhabitants advised him to go no farther, for that he should never subdue Greece united together, but stay there in a commodious place, and corrupt with money those that were most prevalent in each City, whereby he might divide the Grecians into factions, and so easily mastering the dissenters, subdue the whole Country. But he not hearkening to this advice, proceeded, hoping by fires made in the Islands, to give notice to Xerxes still lying at Sardis, that he was again got into Athens, which the Inhabitants upon his approach, and the Peloponnesians deferring to send their succors, again quitted and departed to Salamine. He entered Athens the tenth moneth being now compleated after Xerxes had the possession of that City, and having so done, sent to Salamine to the owners of it; once more offering them the same conditions he had formerly proposed by Alexander of Macedonia, hoping, that upon this extremity to which they were once again reduced, they might change their stubbornness for a more complying disposition.

57. But they were so far from harkening to what he offered, that they stoned one Lycidas a Senator, for saying it deserved to be taken into consideration, and to be proposed to the whole body of the people, and his wife and children were used in the same manner by the women. Then sent they (together with the Megarians and Plataeans) seriously to expostulate with the Lacedaemonians for the non-performance of their promise, whereby their Country was again exposed to the will and pleasure of the Enemy, and plainly to tell them, that except their associates would better stand to their word, and dispatch away their succors in time, they must needs provide for themselves apart, for as much as yet a way was open for their entry into confederacy with the common Enemy. The Ambassadors found them celebrating annual games, and understood that the Peloponnesians were onely intent upon their perfecting the wall at the Isthmus, having no regard at all to them, whereof they highly complained to the Ephori. They promised them an answer the next day, but deferred from day to day, until after ten dayes the wall of the Isthmus was perfected.

58. After this time came a man of Tegea to them, and blaming them for their neglect of their allies, convinced them of the vanity of the wall, in case the Athenians should joyn with Mardonius, for they could with ease convey him otherwise than by the Isthmus into Peloponnesus, wherewith being startled, in the dead time of the night, and without privy of the Ambassadors, they sent out 5000 men besides 7000 of the Heilors or publick Slaves, under the conduct of Cleombrotus Tutor to Plistarchus the young King. In the morning the Ambassadors came again to them expostulating as before, whereto the Ephori answered, that their succors were already on their way, whom then the other understanding the matter, followed, and with them other 5000 gathered out of the places bordering upon Sparta. Mardonius having intelligence how things went in Peloponnesus from the Argives, who all this while were of his party, was something abashed, having till now had some hopes of the Athenians their compliance, for which reason he had spared their Territories. But now he destroyed all he could both in City and Country, and forsaking Attica as a Country dangerous to his Army, by reason of the unevenness of the ground, and hard to be quitted suddenly in time of danger, he returned into Boeotia a Champaign Country, and in alliance with him, where in the Territories of the Thebans he pitched his Tents at the River Asopus, bringing much damage to his friends round about, in taking up such things as were but necessary to the sustenance of his Army. The Spartans in the mean time lying at the Isthmus, the other Peloponnesians after their example came also thither, whence they marched to Eleusine. Thither came the Athenians from Salamine, and joyned with them, whence they followed Mardonius into Boeotia, and sat down over against his Camp at the foot of the Mountain Cithæron.

59. The Greeks brought into the field 11 Myriads or 110000, according to Herodotus, from which number (a) others take the odd thousands, and make them just 100000. The number of the Persian Army Amounted to 30 Myriads or 300000, besides the Greek Auxiliaries, which he conjectureth to have been about five Myriads more; the 300000 are owned by Plutarch, another (b) numbereth but 200000 Foot, & 20000 Horse, but Diodorus on the contrary saith, that besides these Forces drawn out of Xerxes his Army, Mardonius had out of Macedonia and Thrace, and the associate States, about 20 Myriads, and that his whole Army contained 50 Myriads or 500000 men. Mardonius when the Gracians were encamped, sent a partie of his Horse to assail them, which objecting cowardise to them, and provoking them, very light skirmishes ensued, wherewith the Megarians were sore put to it, being on disadvantageous ground, but being relieved by 300 stout Athenians, all others refusing, a sharp encounter followed, in which Masistius who commanded the Party of the Persians was slain. A great contest followed about the body, the Persians labouring with all their might to redeem it, all the Persian Horse coming in to the quarrel, and then the whole Army of the Gracians; but at length they were fain to return without it, and it was caried in triumph about the Greekish Camp. This as it brought great sorrow to the Persians, so the other were much elevated in their minds thereby, and removed their Camp into the Territories of Plataea, whither Mardonius also followed them, and encamped over against them, both parties neglecting to fight (onely excepting such Skirmishes as was made by the Persian Horse) for ten dayes.

60. On the eleventh, it being palpable that the Greekish Army daily wasted, by the revolt of many of their Countrymen, and yet that the Persian groaned under it's own burthen, Mardonius called a Council of his Officers to consult what was to be done. Artabazus the son of Pharnaces, a man of great Nobility, and an emulator of the General, contended with him, urging that the best was to decline the fight, and march to Thebes, where they might have plenty of provision, here wanting, and whence by sending money into the principal Cities of Greece (according to the advice formerly given by the Thebans) they might dispatch the War with ease. But Mardonius being more hot and earnest, thinking his Army to be for the present stronger than the Enemy, resolved to fight, not suffering himself by any perswasions to be removed from his purpose, for that because of his authority the rest durst not contradict it, and it was resolved to fall on the next morning by break of day. Notice hereof was given by Alexander the Macedonian to the Athenians, who advised them in case Mardonius should not fight to stay it out; for the Persians were straightned for provisions. The Athenians bring this news to Pausanias the General, who being something struck therewith, he desired them to change places, because they were better acquainted with the Persian manner of fighting since the battel at Marathon, and the Spartans were more used to the Thessalians and Beotians now opposed to the Athenians; they soon condescended hereunto, but Mardonius having notice of it, made his Persians change place with the Beotians and the other; and though Pausanias again reduced his men into the former place, yet was neither this hid from Mardonius, who still to prevent him did the like.

61. Mardonius upon this sent and upbraided Pausanias and his Spartans with with cowardize, especially seeing he had made a challenge to fight with them with his Persians, either a certain number of each, or all together, both which were refused. Then sent he his Horse upon them, which with darts sore troubled the whole Army, and most of all in that it hindred the fetching of water, that the Grecians were constrained to change the place, and resolved to passe into an Island compassed about with the River, and near the Walls of the Citie, which was very convenient for watering, and lay also well for provisions. By night they removed, but most missing of the place went to the Temple of Juno in the high way to Platea, and there encamped themselves, whom the Spartans being commanded to follow, much trouble arose thereupon by the means of one Amomphareus a valiant man, who for some time would not stir with his Regiment, crying out, it was contrary to the Laconick Discipline to fly from the Enemy, and supposing Pausanias and the rest durst not forsake him. But towards morning he came off from his resolution, and so all marched to the Temple of Ceres, situate upon the River Moloe, being followed close by the Persian Horse.

62. The Sun being risen, Mardonius grievously inveighing against the cowardise of the Grecians, and Artabazus for his late opinion, marched with his whole Army, as to pursue the Enemy flying, and all his Horse began sore to presse upon the backs of the Spartans and Tegeatans, joyned with them at the Chapel of Ceres, so that then ensued a sharp fight betwixt them, and betwixt the Athenians who came in to their succour, and such Greeks as were confederate with the Persians. The Tegeatans charged the Persian infantry, in which after much toyl and bloodshed, Mardonius fighting on a white Horse in the midst of 1000 choise men, was slain by Armistus the most valiant Spartan. After his death, his men discouraged, were slaughtered in great numbers, and put to the rout, which Artabazus seeing, shifted for himself with a party of 40000 commanded by him, and fled towards the Hellepont: the Greeks that assisted Mardonius, though nothing inferiour to their Countrey-men for valour, were put to flight; and 300 of Thebans, who most stoutly behaved themselves, were slain upon the place.

63. In the mean time the Corinthians, Megarians, Phlians, and the rest, who had taken up their station at the Chapel of Juno, hearing of the victory of their friends hasted to the place all out of order, the Corinthians over Hill and Dale the nearest way; but the rest through the plain, who were circumvented by the Theban horse, and many of them cut off. The Persians fled into their Camp, which they had fenced with a Rampire for security, whither they were followed by the Spartans, who laboured with all their might to storm the place, but were stoutly repulsed by the Defendants, till the Athenians coming in, and better exercised in such attempts, brake into the Camp. The Tegeatans followed with great violence, and took, and plundered the Pavillion of Mardonius with his brasen manger, and then followed an unspeakable slaughter of the Persians, so that of those 300000 left to Mardonius by Xerxes, excepting those 40000, which fled with Artabazus, not 3000 remained, 100000 according to Diodorus, without mercy being put to death within the Rampire. Of the Grecians not many were slain, according to Herodotus, who reckoneth 31 Spartans, 16 Tegeatans, and 52 Athenians, mentioned at large by him; but Plutarch mentioneth 1360 of the Greekish Army to have been slain, and Diodorus increaseth the number to above 30000. The Mantineans and Eleans came after the victory, at which they were so ashamed, that returning home they banish'd their Captains as authors of the delay. The Conquerours thence marched to Thebes, where the inhabitants gave up the authors of their revolt to the Barbarians, whom being carried to Corinth, all but Asaginus that escaped, he there put to death.

64. Whilest these things were thus done in Boeotia, the Greekish Fleet of which Lentychides the Spartan King was Admiral, harboured at the Island Delos: Hither came three Ambassadors from Samus, desiring aid against the Barbarians, and their Tyrant imposed upon them, shewing that it was most equal equal that Gracians should one vindicate the liberty of another, and that this Enterprize would be without difficulty, for as much as if the Ionians did but once see their Fleet, they would revolt from the Persians, of whom such as were amongst them would either fly, or might easily be made a prey; Lastly, if the Ambassadors were mistrusted as not representing things according to their Commission, they offered themselves as Hostages, till the truth might be cleared. Leutychides taking an Oath of them that they came empowered from the Samians, retained Hegesistratus (because his name he took for a good omen) who had been the mouth of the rest, and sending the other two before followed the next day to Samus. The Sea-men that were there, stricken with great fear at the report of the Fleet approaching, dismissed the Phœnician Vessels, and fled with the rest to the Continent, hoping to keep them safe under the protection of the 60000 Foot left on the Coasts by Xerxes to keep Ionia in obedience, over whom Tigranes was General, a man of a most proper and amiable personage.

65. The Persians having drawn their ships under the foot of the Mountain Mycale, near the Temple of Ceres Euxinian, and barricaded them with great stones, wood, and other materials, came the Gracians with their Fleet prepared for a fight. But understanding what was done, Leutychides coming near the shore, by the voice of a cryer aloud (as Themistocles had done before) endeavoured either to make the Ionians revolt, or at least to render them suspected to the Enemy; which being done, presently he landed all his men, resolving to try the event of a Land battel. The Persians suspecting the Samians disarmed them, and sent the Milesians to keep the passages leading up into the Mountain. As the Armies were going to meet, a sudden rumour was spread abroad through that of the Gracians, that Mardonius with his forces were cut off, which elevated their spirits, and made them to charge with greater alacrity, which was also increased, for that they were now to fight at the Temple of the same Goddesse, as they heard their friends had done with Mardonius in Boeotia. Then charged they the Persians in a double body, the Athenians with the Corinthians and others, on the plain by the Sea-shore; the Lacedæmonians, and others joyned with them, through the mountainous and precipitous places, who whilest they were getting up, the Athenians fell on, and calling on one another to endeavour to deprive the Lacedæmonians of the honour of the victory, charged the Enemy so furiously, that at length they beat them back, and forced them into their Camp, whither also they brake in with them.

66. Hereupon ensuing a bloody fight, all the rest fled except the Persians, who fighting with great resolution, were yet cut off and defeated upon the coming in of the Lacedæmonians and the rest. Two of the Sea Captains were slain, two escaped, and with the rest fell Tigranes, the General of the foot, and of the Greeks perished not a few. The Samians, though disarmed, and other Ionians came in and helped their friends, and the Milesians set to Guard the passages of Mycale fell down upon the Persians another way, and made great slaughter of them. So was Ionia rent from the Persian Empire again, and joyned to the Gracians. After this performed by Land, the Conquerours burnt all the Persian ships in the Haven, and being enriched with great spoil returned to Samus. It was found out afterwards that this victory at Mycale was obtained on the self same day as the other at Plataea in Boeotia, the later in the morning, and the former at evening, which caused the wonder how intelligence could be given to these that fought at Mycale of the success of their Countrey-men so far off. This hapned often in following times as will be seen, although some have thought that no report was brought any way to the Army of the victory of Plataea, but that it was so given out on purpose as a stratagem by Leutychides to animate his Souldiers, who then being wholly ignorant of any such thing, he invented that which afterwards proved accordingly. These two battels, and victories, hapned on the third or fourth day of the moneth Boedromion, in the second year after the invasion of Greece by Xerxes.

67. The Gracians lying at Samus fell into dispute about translating the Ionians, and Aeolians, out of Asia into Greece, for that they could not be always in a readinesse to defend them, and they could not subsist of themselves; and the Spartians moved that those who had revolted to the Persian should be cast out, and they placed in their rooms; but the Athenians fearing to be deprived of the right of their Colony, which yet the Ionians acknowledging themselves, might own the rest of the associates for their patrons, upon such a change, dashed the project. Then were the Samians, Chians, Lesbians, and others, who had revolted, religiously and solemnly sworn to the observation of the league, and the Gracians departed towards the Hellepont to break the Bridge there, which when they found broken to their hands, they consulted about returning home. The Athenians were for going into the Chersonesus of Thrace to recover it out of the hands of the Persians, and, though the Peloponnesians returned, proceeding in their resolution went and besieged Sestus an Aeolian Town, situate in the Chersonesus, over against Abydus. Before this Town they continued till the Autumn was far spent, and then pined out the inhabitants, who forsook the Town, but were overtaken, and either slain, or made prisoners, amongst the later sort of which was Artageus the Governour, who because he had violated the sepulchre of the Chapel of Proteusians, a great Saint in that place, saw first his son stoned before his face, and then was hanged by command of Xanthippus the Athenian Admiral. Then returned the Navy home to Athens, and nothing was done further this year, which was the second of the 75 Olympiad, and the 7th of the reign of Xerxes, of the World 3526. and before Christ the 477.

68. Xerxes all this while lay at Sardis, and thither those few that escaped from Mycale betook themselves. In the way Masistes brother to the King fell foul upon Artayntes, one of the Captains of the Fleet, amongst other reproachfull words telling him that he had in this behaved himself more cowardly than a woman, whereupon the other drew his Dagger, and had stabbed him, but that one Xenagoras an Halicarnassean interposed himself, whom for this saving of his brother, Xerxes rewarded with the Government of Cilicia. Whilest he lay still at Sardis he fell in love with the wife of Masistes, but she being too honest for his adulterous intentions, he married her, and his brothers daughter Artaynta to his son Darius, hoping to enjoy her this way, which Ceremony being over, he returns home, leaving part of his Forces to continue the War with the Gracians. In his (a) flight he burned all the Temples of Asia except the Ephesian, out of indignation at his late bad success, and amongst the rest the Oracle of Didymeian Apollo amongst the Branchidans, who because they betrayed the Treasures of their God to him, durst not stay behind but followed him. (b) Some say he went to Susa, others to Ecbatane, a (c) third, that by Babylon into Persia. That in his way back from Greece he (d) destroyed the Temple of Belus in that Citie, we also read, with all the other religious places of the Babylonians, taking away a statue off that Wall of twelve Cubits, and all of beaten Gold, and killing the Priest who offered to hinder the removal of it.

69. Being returned to Susa, he fell from the Mother to the Daughter too, being in love with Artaynta his Daughter-in-law, whom incestuously he used constantly. She begged of him a Coat which with much art and industry Amestris his wife had made for him. By her wearing of this the Queen knew how matters went, and thence followed the destruction of the whole house of Masistes; for on Xerxes his birth-day, when he used not to deny her any request, she asked Masistes wife to be given up into her power, which he doing, she cut off her breasts, nose, ears, lips, and tongue, and in this case sent her home. Masistes enraged at this barbarous usage, conspired with his Children how to be revenged, and resolved to fly into Bactria, of which he was Governour, then to stir up that Province, and the Saca with whom he was very gracious, into rebellion against his brother. But Xerxes coming to the knowledge of the matter sent a party after him, which cut him off with his Children, and all his retinue. These things hapned about a year after his return, SECT. 2. return, with which enderth the history of Herodotus the Father of history (as Cicero called him) seeing he is the most ancient of all Heathen Writers now extant.

70. The same year being the third of the 75th Olympiad, and the eighth of the reign of Xerxes, a year after the finishing of the Median War, so called by the Gracians, the Lacedemonians sent Pausanias, famous for his Generalship at the battel of Plataa, to set at liberty such Greek Cities as yet were under the Persian, who accordingly with 50 Gallies set sail out of Peloponnesus, and taking 30 more out from Athens, commanded by Aristides, first went to Cyprus, where he set at liberty such Towns as were yet held by Persian Garrisons, and thence to the Hellepont, where he took Byzantium, and therein many Noble prisoners of the Persians, whom he delivered to one Gangylus an Eretrian, to be kept as he pretended, to be put to death, but indeed to restore them to Xerxes. For he sent this man secretly to the King, and bargained for his daughter to be given him in marriage to betray Sparta and all into his hands. He gladly received the message, and wrote back again to him by Artabazus the son of Pharnaces whom he sent to the Sea-Coasts to hold intelligence with him, and for that purpose gave him the Government of Dascylis, recalling Magabares who was over that Province. But Pausanias growing more insolent, hereupon was suspected, and afterwards at length discovered, and punished for his treason, as farther is to be discovered in it's proper place.

Diodorus ad Olymp. 75. aa. 3. Thucid. lib. 1.

71. In the third year of the 77th Olympiad, and the sixteenth of Xerxes, Demotion beng Archon, or chief Magistrate at Athens, the Athenians made choise of Cimon the son of Miltiades for their General, and with a considerable force sent him into the Maritime Coasts of Asia, with order to relieve the Associates, and set at liberty such as were still under the slavery of Persian Garrisons. He bends his course towards Byzantium, and took Eione and Scyrus, inhabited by Pelasgians and Dolopians, and divided the grounds thereof by lot; then casting in his mind greater designs, sailed back to the Piræus, and furnishing himself with more ships, increased his Navie to the number of 200, to which he added of the associates 100 more, and with all this power sailed towards Caria. Here all the Maritime Greek Cities revolted to him, and what did not, he subdued by strong hand, which having done, he sailed to Lycia, where he had the same successe, and now requiring ships to be provided by such as had joyned themselves in society with the Athenians, he thereby mightily increased his Navie.

Diodorus ad Olymp. 77. aa. 3.

72. The Persians now levied both a Land and Sea-Army, the former within themselves, and the latter out of Phœnicia, Cyprus, and Cilicia, the General being Tihrastes the base son of Xerxes, who by some other is said to have only had command of the Fleet, and that Pharendates was over the Land-forces, though this place by another is given to Ariomandes the son of Gobryas. Cimon having made discovery that the Persian Fleet rode nigh to Cyprus, sailed thither, and with 250 ships made head against 340, whereupon ensued a sharp fight, both parties fighting with great courage and animosity, till at length the Athenians overpowered the other, and spoiling many of their Vessels, took about 100 with the men in them, the rest escaping to Land at Cyprus, the men saved themselves by flight, but the ships fell into the hands of the Gracians. Cimon not contented with this Victory, sailed towards the Land-Army of the Persians, then lying upon the River Enrymedon. To deceive the Enemy, he put his most valiant men aboard those Vessels lately taken in the fight, adorned and clothed after the Persian fashion, so that the Persians not doubting at all but that it was their own Fleet, kindly welcomed these counterfeits as their friends. Hereby Cimon received as such, landed his men by night and fell upon the Enemies Camp, whence ensued great fear and tumult, his men presently killing all they meet, and amongst the rest Pheredates Nephew to the King by his brother. Of the common sort many were slain, others sorely wounded, and shortly all put to flight, yet they knew not by whom, nor suspecting the Gracians to have any Land-Army

Army and therefore concluding themselves surprized by the Pisidians upon whom they bordered. SECT. 2.

73. Suspecting therefore this storm to come from the continent, they betook themselves to their ships, and the Moon then not shining, and the night being very dark, the error was the more increased, so that not discerning any thing they ran upon their own ruine, and great slaughter was made of them on all sides. All things being thus in confusion, the Gracian General fearing the straggling of his Soldiers too far for booty, according to former order, that when he set out a Light they should all come back to that place, gave out that sign by the ships, upon sight of which they withdrew themselves thither. Notwithstanding these two Victories, which in some sence seemed to excel those of Salamina and Platæa, being fought on the same day, yet would he add one thing more as a supplement to them. Understanding that 80 Phœnician ships (expected as Plutarch saith, by the Navy at Eurymedon, which was the cause why he set upon it so soon, being unwilling they should joyn) to be arrived at Hydrus, he sailed hastily thither, where as yet the news had not arrived, but now the Phœnicians suspecting the truth, and thereby discouraged, he easily overcame, took and sunk all their ships, and therein the greatest part of themselves miscarried. Hereupon ensued a certain agreement betwixt the King and the Gracians.

Plutarch ibid.

74. The next thing considerable concerning Xerxes, is his death, placed in the fifth year after the former transactions, by Diodorus. There was one Artabanus an Hyrcanian by birth, of great power about him, as Captain of his Guard, who consulted about making him away, and transferring the Kingdom to himself, and for that purpose inveigled Mitridates the Eunuch the King's Chamberlain, by whom being let in by night with his seven sons, they strangled him in his bed. Hee reigned 21 years, or 20 with odd moneths, though some there be that cut off nine years from that number. Their ground is, for that Themistocles the Athenian being banished his Country, came to Artaxerxes, then the new King of Persia, according to Thucydides, so that Xerxes must at that time have been dead. Now the same Author placeth this flight of Themistocles betwixt the Siege of Naxos which the Athenians subdued, and the former exploits of Cimon, so that his Expedition must have happened also not in the dayes of Xerxes as we have fixed it according to Diodorus, but in the reign of Artaxerxes his successor: and Eusebius placing the flight of Themistocles in the fourth year of the 76th Olympiad (though Diodorus in the second of the 77th) hence it must follow, that the beginning of the reign of Artaxerxes must be placed higher by near to nine years. The authority of that grave Author is in no wise to be despised, yet notwithstanding, this shortning of the reign Xerxes which must necessarily follow, is not agreeable to the testimony of other Writers: especially it is to be considered what difficulty will arise hereby to the Chronology of the sacred story, it being most probable, that the seventy weeks of Daniel commencing in the seventh year of Artaxerxes, end at the death of Jesus Christ; which cannot be, if their beginning be to be assigned nine years higher. This may incline us to believe, that some reason Diodorus had (who could not but have opportunity to see and compare several histories) not to follow Thucydides, and make us rather subscribe to the number of years by general consent ascribed unto the reign of Xerxes.

1. XERXES left three sons, Darius, and Artaxerxes, both of them at the time of his death resident in his Court, and Hystaspes, who was absent in his Government of Bactria. Artabanus having murdered their Father, presently in the dead time of the night went to Artaxerxes, and made him believe that his elder brother Darius had made him away, out of ambition to reign himself, counselled him to provide for his own safety and honour, before he should establish himself, and offered him the guard to rid him of him, whereby he being perswaded, sent and slew his brother. When this was done, Artabanus called his sons together, telling them this was the time of obtaining the Kingdom, and drew his sword with an intention now also to kill Artaxerxes. But he being onely lightly wounded, laid so about him, that he slew him upon the place, as we have it from one; though others with more reason defer the time of Artabanus his death, to whom also seven moneths in the Empire are attributed by * Eusebius. In Chron.

2. It is probable, that for that time the treason of Artabanus not being discovered, or for some reasons winked at, he might by a Vicegerency govern the Kingdom. By his means came Artaxerxes to it in his youth, a Prince of a great spirit, and yet of a mild nature, surnamed Μακρόχειρ, or Longimanus, because his right hand was longer than the other, in the fourth year of the 78th Olympiad, or in the beginning of the 79th, Lyfistheus being then Archon at Athens. A. M. 3540, 463 years before the birth of Christ. Within a while Artabanus laid in wait for his life also, communicating his design to Megabyzus, who had married the daughter of Xerxes, and for her loose life was fallen into a discontent, Megabyzus swore secrecie as well as he, but revealed the whole matter, so that Artabanus finding not the same success as in his other treasons, was sent the same way, and by the same means with which he intended to dispatch Artaxerxes. Now came out the whole truth concerning Xerxes and his son Darius, and Spamitres (or Aspamires) the Eunuch, who was accessory to the murders, was tortured to death. Justin telleth us, how the King fearing the number, and power of Artabanus his Sons, commanded his Soldiers to be ready armed the next morning, both for a muster, and to exercise them. Amongst the rest appeared he according to his place, with whom Artaxerxes desired to change his coat-armour, pretending his was too short for him, which to do, he first putting his off, the King took the advantage and ran him thorow with his sword. Ctesias.

Artabanus put to death.

3. After his death, his party being strong, great troubles ensued, which ended at length in the destruction thereof, three of his sons falling in fight, and Megabyzus who opposed them being sorely wounded, for whom now great lamentation was made through the Court, till at length he escaped the danger by the skill and industry of Apollonides the Physician, native of the Island Cos. The Bactrians also, according to Ctesias, revolted, with another of the King's Officers named Artabanus, who seemeth to have had some other command than over Bactria. For we are told elsewhere, that Hystaspes the son of Xerxes was Satrapas or Governour of that Province, and thence may almost conclude him to have been the principal cause of the revolt, out of indignation that being the second brother, the youngest of all the three should be preferred before him. Two battels were fought in this quarrel, in the latter of which the wind being full in the faces of the Bactrians, so disturbed them, that thereby Artaxerxes became Victor, and reduced all that Country into obedience. Artaxerxes having thus revenged his Father's and Brother's death, and brought Artabanus and his complices to condign punishment, and recovered Bactria, settled the affairs of his Kingdom. He took care of his revenue, settled the Militia, displaced suspicious Governours of Provinces, and carrying all things with much moderation and Justice, gained great Authority from his subjects. In the mean while the Egyptians hearing of the death of Xerxes, and in what disturbance the affairs of the Persians were, out of desire to recover their liberty, hearkned to the Counsel and persuasions of one Inarus King of Libya, the son of Psammetichus, so that the greater part of the Countrey revolted, and making him their Prince, sent about to crave aid, and amongst others to the Athenians. They thought it their interest to impair all wayes possible the interest of Persia, and concluding it not amiss to get some footing in Egypt, resolved upon sending three hundred ships, and prepared for the setting of them forward with all earnestnesse. Artaxerxes hearing on the other hand how things went in Egypt, determined to overmatch the revolters in provisions for the War, and for that end levied Forces throughout his Dominions, Rigged his Fleet, and omitted nothing requisite for an expedition of that moment.

4. He thought first of going down himself, but being overruled by his friends sent Achamenides his brother, according to Ctesias, but according to Diodorus, Achemenes the son of Darius, and his great Uncle, with an Army of above 300000. saith Diodorus, or 400000 foot, and 80 ships, who marching as far as the River Nile there pitched his Tents, refreshed his Souldiers, and prepared all things for a battel. The Egyptians assisted by the Libyans expected the Athenian Fleet, which at length arrived, and got possession of the River. Presently after this a Land battel ensued, in which, though the Persians for a time prevailed by their multitudes, yet the Athenians, who were now acquainted with their manner of fighting, pressing sore upon that Wing with which they joyned, did such execution as put it to flight, at which all the rest out of fear betook them to their heels. Great slaughters were then made in the persute, the greatest number of the Barbarians fell, and the rest betook themselves to a Fort called White-wall, whither the Athenians persuing, took two parts of Memphis, and besieged them in the 3d division called by that name, of 400000 that came into Egypt, Ctesias writeth 100000 to have been slain, and with them their Captain, killed by the hands of Inarus, whose body was sent back to Artaxerxes. That Achamenes the son of Darius was slain with many Persians, * Herodotus tells us by an anticipation of the story.

5. Artaxerxes understanding what bad successe his affairs had in Egypt, and knowing the main blow to have been given from the Athenians, sent Megabyzus with a great summe of money to Lacedemon to hire that State to make War upon them, and give them something to do at home, to divert them from the assistance of his Rebels. The Lacedemonians would not be bribed to fall out with Athens, and refused to hearken to any thing else the Ambassador offered on his masters behalf, so that he recalled him home, and gave in charge to Megabyzus the son of that Zopyrus who recovered Babylon to Darius, to prepare for another expedition, with whom he also joyned Artabazus, making choise of them both out of respect to their great valour, and skill in Military matters.

They by the Spring having got together an Army of (above 300000 men, saith Diodorus, 200000 onely saith Ctesias) marched down into Cilicia, where, and in Phoenicia they rested their men, and caused the inhabitants of these places, together with the Cyprians, to provide a Navy, which being done, to the number of 300 ships, they furnished them with the ablest Souldiers, and all sorts of Weapons, and whatsoever was requisite for a Sea-fight, and in this preparation, together with the exercising, and training of their men, spent they almost all the Summer. In the mean while the Athenians laboured to storm the White-wall wherein the Persians were besieged, but they made such effectual resistance as they kept them out all this year. When Winter was over, Megabyzus and his Colleague led down their Army through Syria and Phoenicia, the Navy Coasting all along not far off; and at length came to Memphis, where the fear of them presently loosed the siege of their Countreymen, whom joyning to themselves they gave battel to the Egyptians and Ctesias. their Associates. Many fell on both sides, but most of the Egyptians; at length Megabyzus wounded Inarus in his Thigh, and put him to flight, who betook himself to Byblus, a Town situate in an Island of Nile, called Prosopitis, and with him such Greeks as had escaped the fight, after which the Egyptians returned into obedience, making their peace vwith Megabyzus.

6. Megabyzus persuing them, besieged the place, which yet was so defended that they held it out a year and six moneths in despite of him. The Athenian Fleet lay in the River before the Town, which the Persians at length considering, and how it was possible by Ditches to drain the water, and derive that course thereof another way, set about it, and so drained the Chanel that the Island was now joyned to the Main, and the ships rested on dry Land. Now Diodorus saith, the Egyptians forsook their confederates, and returned to obedience, which the Athenians understanding, and how their ships by this stratageme of the Enemy were rendred uselesse, burnt them all, and nothing afrighted with so great a danger in which they were involved, called upon one another with exhortations not to commit any thing unworthy of their former noble achievements, so that excelling those their Countrey-men if possible, who lost their lives at Thermopyla, they resolved to fight. The Persian Commanders seeing their courage, and considering their own losses already great, having lost many thousands, though they had recovered the Island, yet gave them these terms to return with safety out of Egypt. Their number being something above 6000. they returned home by Cyrene above their expectations, having consumed six years in this War to no good purpose, Inarus taken and Crucified; Artaxerxes then recovered all Egypt except some fenny parts, near which Amyrtaeus reigned, who by reason of the difficulty of the place, and the fiercenesse of the people, could not be reduced into order.

In the mean time, whilst the Athenians travelled homewards, came 50 ships more to their relief, which being utterly ignorant of what had passed, took up their harbour at Mendesium, one of the mouths of Nile. Here they were set upon by the Persians on Land, and the Phœnicians by Sea, and lost most of their Vessels, a few onely escaping home, and such was the end of this expedition of the Athenians with their associates into Egypt.

Thucyd. ibid.

7. Artaxerxes in the seventh year of his reign made a decree in the behalf of the Jews, that whosoever of them would, might go up with Ezra to Jerusalem and inhabit it. He and his Counsellors contributed much Treasure, and gave them liberty to Collect what they could, and commanded his Treasurers beyond the River Euphrates to furnish him yearly with what he wanted, as far as 100 Talents of silver, 100 measures of Wheat, 100 Baths of Wine, 100 Baths of Oyl, and Salt without measure, for the sacrifices and other uses, according to the discretion of Ezra. He commanded that all things should be done according to the mind and will of the God of heaven, lest his anger might break out against the Kingdom of him and his sons: the Priests and Levites he made free from all impositions, and gave power to Ezras to constitute Judges and Governours over the people, for the settlement of the Politie or Commonwealth.

Ezra 7. 13.

8. Now though here in this Edict be no expresse mention of repairing the Walls of Jerusalem, or of the Request of Ezra in that behalf, yet is it probable enough that he would desire it, because of the often incursions of their Enemies, the Samaritans, and others, neither could their habitation in the Citie be secure, nor the work of the Temple go on with safety: and in what could all that Treasure be spent but in Fortifications? So that we may even conclude sufficient Licence and Authority to be included in this Decree, and that Ezra began to build the Walls, but was either hindred by other occasions, or the negligence of the Jews, or (more probably) the molestations of their Enemies; who because the Licence was not expressed, took thence occasion to interrupt the work till thirteen years after it was renewed, and perfected by the procurement and industry of Nehemiah, who obtained a confirmation rather of the former Edict, than any new Decree; So though Syrus had first of all granted Licence for the rebuilding of the Temple, yet because the work was hindred by the Enemies of the Jews, there was need of another Edict granted out by Darius. As the decrees of these two Kings were in effect the same, so also those were onely put in execution afterwards by Nehemiah, because the execution of it, as to the rebuilding of the Walls, was either remitted by negligence, or by malice of the Borderers.

9. If so, the beginning of the seventy weeks of Daniel, fitly may be taken hence, ending most probably in the death of our Saviour Jesus Christ. Seventy Daniel 9. 24. weeks saith the Angel, are determined upon thy people, and upon thy holy Citie, to finish the transgression, and to make an end of sins, and to make reconciliation for iniquity, and to bring in everlasting righteousness, and to seal up the Vision and Prophecy, and to anoint the most holy. Know therefore, and understand, that from the going forth of the Commandment, to restore, and to rebuild Jerusalem, unto the Messiah the Prince, shall be seven weeks, and threescore and two weeks: and the street shall be built again, and the Wall, even in troublous times. And after 62 weeks shall Messiah be cut off, but not for himself: and the people of the Prince that shall come, shall destroy the Citie and the Sanctuary, and the end thereof shall be with a Flood, and unto the end of the War desolations are determined. And he shall confirm the Covenant with many in one week: and in the midst of the week he shall cause the Sacrifice and the Oblation to cease, and for the overspreading of abominations he shall make it desolate, even untill the consummation, and that determined shall be poured upon the desolate. Thus the Oracle, in which is contained a Prophecy concerning the rebuilding of Jerusalem, and the coming of Christ, who should bring unconceivable benefits along with him, and yet at length be put to death, not for himself, but others, and this should be all accomplished within 70 weeks of years, which contain 490. Lastly, it foretels, that for that horrible sin of the Jews in murdering the Messias, they should lose both Principality and Priest-hood, and be punished with perpetual Exile, and the utter and unrepairable desolation of the Citie.

10. Many are the opinions concerning the beginning and end of these seventy weeks amongst Chronologers. Some begin them in the first year of the Empire of Cyrus, and end them in the Nativity of Christ. Others fetch their rise from the second of Darius Nothus (Successor to Artaxerxes) and conclude them with the destruction of Jerusalem, by Titus Vespasian. Some make them Commence from the 20 of Artaxerxes (when Nehemiah obtained another Decree of him) and to conclude with the passion and death of Christ; and others will have them begin in the 20th year of Artaxerxes Mnemon, and end in the desolation of the Citie by the Romans. But many there are who rejecting all these, with best reason, fix the beginning of them in the seventh of Artaxerxes Longimanus, and their conclusion in the death of Christ, in which termination most of the Learned, both ancient and modern, agree.

11. For if we seriously consider the account of time, and judge of it according to the best approved Authors, the three former opinions will be found either to exceed, or come short of the number. From the beginning of the Persian Empire to Christ's Nativity passed about 530 years. From the second of Darius Nothus indeed to the destruction of Jerusalem, near upon 490 years intervened; but concerning any Edict made by that Prince, there is not a word in Scripture. From the 20th of Artaxerxes Longimanus to the death and passion of Christ, are found 476. or 477. which come too short by thirteen of the 490. and betwixt the twentieth of Artaxerxes Mnemon, and the destruction of Jerusalem, are found but about 450. which come far short of the true account; as also the Chronology of such as would fetch the rise of the 290 from the first of Darius Medus; and the second or sixth of Darius the son of Hystaspes. And although the Angel mentioneth the punishment

nishment to be inflicted on the Jews, yet doth he not comprise it in the 490 years, the end of which he signalizeth by the anointing and sufferings of the Messias, but assigneth half a week or of seven years for the accomplishment of those plagues, which in such a quantity of time were to be inflicted upon his murderers.

12. But if we reckon from this seventh of Artaxerxes Longimanus down by his Successors in the Persian Empire, the Ptolomies of Aegypt, after that of Alexander the Great, and then by the Assamoneans or Jewish Princes till we come at length to Herod the Great, and so to Christ, the just number of 290 we shall find accomplished at his death, with such small difference, as is pardonable to so many Authors handling so many things. Or if we reckon by the years of the Olympiads and the building of Rome, we shall find Christ to have died in the 490th year after the promulgation of this decree. The seventh year of Artaxerxes Longimanus fell in with the second and third of the 80th Olympiad, according to Eusebius, and the 295, or 296th of the City, from which continuing to the second year of the 202d Olympiad, and the 785th of the City (in which Christ was crucified) 289 years or 290 are precisely found; so that farther we shall not enquire about these seventy weeks, having therein already satisfied what this design and work requireth, leaving the further enquiry thereof to the studious Reader, and the judgement to the Learned.

13. In the fifteenth year of Artaxerxes the Athenians having recalled Cimon, whom for ten years they had banished by the Ostracism, sent him with a Fleet of 200 Sail against Cyprus subject to the Persian. Sixty of these ships he sent into Aegypt to the aid of Amyrtaeus, who still was up in the marshes, and with the rest he set upon Citium a Town in the Island. At this time were Artabazus and Megabyzus still Generals of the Forces of Persia: the former lay with 300 ships in the Road of Cyprus, and the other with a Land-Army of 300000 men quartered in Cilicia. Cimon when he had besieged Citium sent some messengers to Delphos to enquire something of the Oracle, but ere they got to their journeyes end, he died before the place, either of sickness, or by some wound, both which are affirmed. When he saw he should die, he counselled his men forthwith to depart, and conceal his death, and they doing so, it hapned that neither the Enemy, nor Associates knew any thing of it. At this time came back the Fleet sent into Aegypt, so that all joyning together again, they sailed to Salamine a Town in Cyprus, where they fought with the Phenicians and Cilicians, who were come to aid their friends of Cyprus. In a Sea-fight they sunk many of their Vessels, took 100 with the men in them, and pursued the rest as far as Phenicia. The Persians with that part of the Fleet which yet remained, fled into Cilicia, where Megabyzus lay, but the Athenians followed them with speed, and landing fell upon them, and making great slaughter, amongst the rest slew Anaxicrates the Sea-Captain, who most gallantly fought whilst life lasted. Then the Greeks victorious got them to their ships and sailed home.

14. The King understanding what losse he had received in Cyprus, called a Council to deliberate what should be done thereupon, at which, when all was considered, it was resolved that it was requisite to procure a Peace if possible. He wrote then to his Captains about Cyprus, to make peace upon as good terms as might be; according to which order Artabazus and Megabyzus sent to Athens to treat about it. The Athenians not being averse from hearkning to them, both sides sent their Commissioners with full power to conclude; at which time also the Argives sent to Artaxerxes to demand of him whether the confederacy into which they entered with his Father remained, or they were accounted by him as Enemies; to which he answered, that he did not doubt of it's continuance, and as for his part he accounted no City more friendly to him than that of Argos.

not come within three dayes journey of the Sea, that none of the Persian Subjects should come with a long ship between the Cyanian and Chelidonian Islands. The Athenians on the other part took an Oath, not to invade the King's Territories. For the joy conceived about this Peace, they built an Altar of Peace, and graced Callias the principal of the Embassie with the greatest honours. Cimon was dead, and with him in a manner the true gallantry of the Greekish Nation; for none of their Captains after him did any thing to purpose against the Barbarians (as they termed all except themselves) but being drawn by their Orators to intestine differences, and none after him being left to take them up, they fell one upon another, and so afforded an happy occasion to the Persian to breath himself, and for a good time to effect his own security with the impairment of their interest. For though Agesslaus afterwards (as will be seen) passed over his Army into Asia, and made a short War with the Persian Commanders on the Sea-Coasts, yet without doing any thing of much consequence, was he recalled by Seditious at home, leaving the Persian Officers behind him, who exacted impositions from the Cities confederate with Greece: whereas whilst Cimon was in command, not so much as a Carrier appeared in these quarters, nor an Horse came within 400 furlongs distant from the Sea.

Nehemiah obtaineth leave to repair Jerusalem.

15. In the twentieth year of Ariaxerxes, Nehemiah his Cup-bearer the son of Hachaliah the Jew received a message, that the remnant of the Captivity left in Judaea were in great affliction and reproach: that the wall of Jerusalem was broken down, and the gates thereof burnt with fire. Because of this he wept, fasted, and mourned certain dayes, and praying to God to make the King favourable to him, obtained to be sent with ample commission to build up the walls. Now was no new Edict promulgated in behalf of the Jews, which had been done sufficiently thirteen years before by the consent of the Princes: onely letters were written to the Keeper of the King's Forest, to furnish Nehemiah with wood sufficient for the building of the gates and walls of the City, for the Temple, and an house for himself; and the Governours beyond the river were ordered to convey him over till he came into Judah. By virtue of this authority he came to Jerusalem, and notwithstanding the indignation and opposition of the Enemies of the Jews, by his great diligence and valour, finished the work of the wall in 52 dayes. From the new Moon of the moneth Nisan, which followed this repairing of the walls, to that new-Moon of the same moneth in which Christ suffered, passed 475 Julian years, which make up 490 Lunar years, consisting each of twelve Lunar moneths. This being not without a providence, that as from the going out of the decree to the death of Christ intervened 490 Solar years; so also from the rebuilding of the walls to his death, should intervene so many consisting each of twelve Lunary moneths. This gave occasion to many eminent men both Antient and Modern to follow the opinion of Africanus, in placing the beginning of the 70 weeks in the twentieth year of this King, and concluding them with the death of Christ: although he reckoneth from that time to the fifteenth of Tiberius 475 years; whereas there are to be accounted but 472; and Christ died not in the fifteenth year of his reign, but was then baptized.

16. Nehemiah not thinking it sufficient to repair the walls whilst the frame of the State was out of frame, restored both the Ecclesiastical and Civil Polity thereof. Taking notice how all ranks of men, and especially the Priests were out of order, no certainly being of their Pedigrees; he caused to be sought for, and read, the Register of those who returned with Zorubbabel, from which whosoever could not prove his descent from some Priestly Family was cast off from the Priesthood. Twelve years staid he at Jerusalem, governing with great moderation, and self-denial, and reforming abuses both in Religion and the State. The Rulers of the People dwelt at Jerusalem, the rest of the People cast lots to bring one of ten to dwell therein, for that it was little inhabited, and nine parts to dwell in other places, the People blessing all such as willingly offered themselves to dwell in Jerusalem. *Artaxerxes his civil War

17. After Artaxerxes had made peace with the Gracians, he fell into civil and intestine broils with Megabyzus, who had done him such service in Aegypt and elsewhere, if credit be given to Ctesias, from whom we have a relation of these transactions. This Megabyzus, after he had quieted Aegypt, and committed it to the Government of Sartamas, departed thence and went to the King, leading along with him Inarus and some Greekish prisoners, after he had obtained a promise from him that no punishment should be inflicted on them, though Amytis (or rather Amestris) the King's Mother had so layn upon him to deliver into her hands not onely them, but Megabyzus himself her son in Law, being enraged for the death of Achamenes, who in the former Expedition was slain by the Ionians. For five years he endured her importunity without yielding, but at length being wearied and overcome, he gave up the Greeks and Inarus into her power. His body she nailed overthwart to three crosses, and beheaded 50 of the Greeks, which were all she could take. That Inarus was crucified Thucydides witnesseth, though nothing of this time or manner; and Herodotus reporteth, that his son Tbannyras was restored by the Persians to the Principality of his Father. Lib. 3. cap. 13.

18. Megabyzus being sorely moved with the usage of his prisoners, concealed his displeasure for a time; but getting leave to depart to his Government in Syria, whither he had privately sent some Greeks beforehand, broke out into open Rebellion, and got an Army together of 150000 men. Against him then was sent Osrus with 200000, who joyning battel with him wounded him in the thigh, but received two wounds from him, one in his thigh and the other in his shoulder, with the anguish whereof, and losse of blood, he fell from his Horse and was taken prisoner; and though his men well behaved themselves, yet were they overthrown, and Megabyzus getting the Victory used him very courteously, and sent him back to the King who desired it. After this was sent more forces, commanded by Mexistenes Nephew to Artaxerxes, by his Brother Artarius the Governour of Babylon. He also giving battel to Megabyzus, was wounded by him both in shoulder and head though not mortally, and being put to flight Megabyzus obtained another famous Victory.

19. Things going thus, Artarius dealt with him by Messengers, then Artaxares the Eunuch Governour of Paphlagonia, and Amestris also advised him yet to be reconciled to the King, afterwards Artarius himself, Amytis his wife, and Artaxares (now twenty years of age) were sent to him to perswade him to go to him: Being perswaded, after his return the King signified to him by a message, that he freely pardoned him all that was past, but going on a time a hunting with him, when a Lyon set upon the King, as he raised himself up Megabyzus slew him, whereat Artaxerxes was in a great rage that he had stricken him before he could touch him, and commanded his head to be cut off. But by the intercession of Amestris, Amytis, and others, his life was spared, yet was he banished to Cyria, a Town upon the Red Sea, and Artaxares the Eunuch into Armenia for speaking freely to the King in his behalf.

Five years he then continued in exile, at the end of which feigning himself to be a Pisagās (which in the Persian tongue signifieth a Leper at whom no man might come) he fled away and came to his wife Amytis at his own house, by whom scarcely being known, he was by her means and the help of Amestris reconciled once again to the King, who made him eat at his own table as formerly, and so continued in great favour till his death at 76 years of age, for which the King was much troubled.

20. Whilst the Gracians were busie with one another in the Peloponnesian War, of which now several years had passed, Artaxerxes sent Artaphernes a Thucyd. l. 4.
Persian

Persian to the Lacedaemonians, with a Letter written in Assyrian Characters, in which, amongst other things, he desired to know plainly of them how they stood affected, for that he was utterly ignorant of what they thought, many Ambassadors coming, and no one of them agreeing with another, wherefore he desired, that if they intended to declare themselves, they would send some of their own back with Artaphernes. What was effected hereby is not known, but we find elsewhere, that the Lacedaemonians entred into a League with him in one main matter, contrary to that formerly made with the Athenians. For whereas it was provided first in the one, that the Greekish Cities in Asia should be left to their own liberty, in the other they were expressly left under his Dominion; such influence had then the Civil Wars of Greece upon the matters of Asia; perhaps because the Lacedaemonians were jealous of the Ionians, as the Colony of their adversaries the Athenians, who, if not now, entred into War with them, were much suspected, jealousies abounding betwixt them. Not long after this Message, Artaxerxes died, having reigned according to Diodorus forty years compleat, according to Sulpicius Severus 41. but after Ctesias 42. amongst which opinions 'tis probable that he died in the beginning of the 42 year, after the death of Xerxes, in the second year of the 89 Olympiad. Ad Olymp. 88. an. 4.

Ctesias in Excerptis Histor. Persic.

21. Artaxerxes had onely one legitimate son by his wife Damaspia, named Xerxes, but 17 by Concubines, amongst which were Sogdianus, Ochus, and Arsites. Xerxes succeeded his father, but was slain by Secundianus, as he was drunk, in the 45th day after his death. Secundianus then became King, but causing Bagorazus the Eunuch to be stoned for something done about his fathers body, incurred the displeasure of the Army, which because of this, and his brothers death, could never be taken off by all the gifts he bestowed on them. Being jealous of his brother Ochus, whom his father had made Governour of the Hyrcanians, he sent for him; but he refused to come, and so did several times, till he had got a considerable Army. For Arberius General of the horse revolted to him, then Arxanes the Viceroy of Egypt, and Artioxares coming out of Armenia caused him to take the Cidaris (or Cisaris) a Cap peculiar to the Kings and Priests of Persia.

Ochus thus taking the Royal Ensign and Title of King, changed his name into Darius, and was also most commonly called Darius Nothus. By the advice of Parysatis his wife, he enticed by all means Secundianus to come to him, not sparing Oaths, or any other wayes to get him into his hands, and so far prevailed, that though Menostanes the Eunuch counselled Secundianus not to trust himself, yet he came to him, and being cast into ashes he died the same way as Darius the son of Hystaspes formerly made away his Emulators, though some think this Darius to have been the first inventor of this punishment, and that it is falsely ascribed by Valerius Maximus, to the son of Hystaspes. Then reigned he alone by himself after his brother had reigned six moneths and twenty dayes. The three Eunuchs, Artioxares, Artibarxanes, and Athous were in great power with him; but especially, he was advised by his wife, by whom he had two Children, Amistris a daughter, and Arfaces a son (called afterwards Artaxerxes) before he came to the Kingdom. Afterwards he begot of her another son, called Cyrus, from the Sun; and others to the number of 13. But all the rest died young, except these two and his fourth son named Oxendras.

22. After this Arsites his own brother, both by father and mother, and Artaphius the son of Megabyzus revolted from him. Artasyras was sent with an Army against them, who falling upon Artaphius, was worsted in two batels; but in the third overthrew him, and corrupting the Greeks that fought for him, drew away all his Company, except three Milesians; so that upon the Oath of Artasyras for his security, for that Arsites could not be found, he yielded himself to the King. He was minded to put him to death, but Parysatis his wife perswaded him to spare him for a time, for Arsites seeing him unpunished would also be moved to yield himself, and then he might rid himself of them both together, which accordingly came to passe, both being cast into the ashes; though Darius was hardly brought by her persuasions to make away his brother: now also Pharnacyas, who with Secundianns had slain Xerxes, was put to death, and Menostanes being apprehended shunned the same punishment by laying violent hands upon himself.

This Rebellion was followed by the revolt of Pisaphnes the Governour of Lydia, against whom Tissaphernes and others being sent, he met them, having in his Army Lycon the Athenian, with such Greeks as he had brought with him, who being corrupted by the Kings Captains revolted from him, so that with fair words he was drawn in, and carried to the King, who cast him into the ashes, and gave his Government to Tissaphernes, and the Cities with the regions adjoyning to Lycon for a reward of his treachery. After this followed the treason of Artaxares in great power with Darius, who conspired about killing him, and transferring the Kingdom to himself. For this purpose being an Eunuch, he caused his wife to make him a beard, that he might seem no other than a perfect man; but the matter being revealed by her, he was delivered up into the hands of Parafytus, who put him to death.

23. Arfaces (afterwards called Artaxerxes) the eldest son of Darius, married Statira, the daughter of Idarnes, a man of prime rank amongst the Persians; and Terituchmes the son of Idarnes, who after his death succeeded in his Government, married Amistris daughter to the King. She had a sister named Roxana, who being very beautifull, and well skilled in shooting, Terituchmes fell in love with her, and having to do with her detested his wife, insomuch as he resolved to murder her by the help of 300 men, with whom he practised to revolt. Whilest he thought hereof, one Udiasfes, a man in great power about him, being promised great matters if he could deliver the Kings daughter from so great a danger, slew him; but the son of this Udiasfes, who was Armour-bearer to Terituchmes, and was not present at his death, after he had notice thereof cursed his father, and seizing upon the Citie Zaris delivered it up to Terituchmes his son. Then did Parysatis bury alive the Mother, Brethren, and Sisters of Terituchmes, and commanded Roxana to be cut in pieces alive. Darius would have had her to have made away Statira his daughter-in-law together with the rest; but through the importunity of Arfaces her husband, she spared her; of which Darius told her, that afterwards she would sorely repent, as it came to passe.

From the second year of this King, * Sulpicius Severus, and * many learned men with him, count the beginning of the seventy weeks of Daniel, ending them with the destruction of Jerusalem, because the number of years do agree, and the Angel maketh mention of that desolation; though nothing be spoken in any place concerning any going out of a Decree during the reign of this Prince, from which those weeks must needs have commenced. They must needs allow the work now to have been carried on by the solicitation of the Prophets Haggai and Zachariah, which had been interrupted for 115 years, ever since the second year of the return of Zerubbabel and Jeshua, at which time they began to build. But now at this time, and before this, lived Malachias the last of all the Prophets, who exhorts not the people to the building of the Temple as the others did, which is an evidence of the finishing of it before; but reprehends those corruptions which * Nehemiah in his second Government had observed amongst the Jews, viz. marriages with strangers, unjust detention of Tithes, and corruption of Divine worship. And because the succession of Prophets was no more to be expected; in the later end of his Prophecie he exhorts the people to keep the Law of Moses, untill such time as the great Prophet the Messias should be revealed, before whom John Baptist was to come, in the spirit and power of Elias. The ending of the Canon of holy Scripture is by Eusebius placed in the 32th year of Artaxerxes Longimanus. After these Prophets the Hebrews held the men of the great Synagogue to have succeeded; but the later Jews reckon the three last Prophets amongst them, and Esa as the President of the Council.

24. Against this Darius the Medes rebelled, but were after some time reduced again into obedience. At this time the States of Greece being plunged deep in the Peloponnesian War, he made his advantage thereof as much as he could, siding with the Lacedemonians against the Athenians, who did him most hurt in Asia, both by their great skill and practice in Navigation, and being allied to the Ionians, whom as their Colonies they helped against him; so that much intercourse, and great transactions passed betwixt Tissaphernes his Lieutenant, and those of Sparta, which are involved in the affairs of Greece. In the 17th year of his reign he sent his son Cyrus (born since he came to the Government) down to the Sea-side as Satrapa, or Lieutenant, with a kind of power over the other his Lieutenants there, and Captain General of all the forces which were wont to muster at the plains of Castolus: giving him in charge to assist the Lacedemonians in the War against the Athenians, and by his help did they recover to the hopes of their former fortune. When he had continued in his charge a year or two, he grew so high that he killed his two Cousin Germans, Autobasaces and Mitranus, because they came not to him with their hands folded under their Clothes, which Ceremony was onely observed in the presence of a King. Their Parents of this complaining highly to his father, and alleging how unjust it was to connive at such practices, he sent for him to come to him, alleging he was not well, lying then incamped in the Countrey of the Medes, against the Cadusians, bordering thereupon, who had revolted.

25. Leaving the command of the Cities, with all his Treasure, and the assignment of his Tributes to Lyfander the Spartan, he went up, taking along with him Tissaphernes as his friend, with 300 Greeks, under the leading of Xenias the Parrhasian. His father lived not long after he came to him, whom in his sickness Parafytis his wife having ruled him all his life, loving Cyrus above her eldest son, urged him to leave him his Successor, as Darius the son of Hystaspes did Xerxes, for that he was born to him being a King, and the other but a private person. But he thinking it not just refused to do it, but left him those Cities over which he had made him Governour, and his Kingdom to Arfaces, or Artaxerxes his eldest son, and so died after he had reigned 19 years, in the fourth of the 93th Olympiad, the 27th of the Peloponnesian War now ending. Arfaces then, by the pleasure of his father, or his interest in the great ones, obtained the Kingdom, and changed his name into Artaxerxes, being for the excellency of his memory surnamed Mnemon. When he had made sure his possession, his wife Stasira thinking it then time to revenge the death of her brother, and the rest of her kindred, caused Udiasfes, who slew Teritachmes, to have his tongue drawn backwards through his neck, and cut off, and got his son Mitridates, who had delivered the City Zaris into the hands of Teritachmes his son, to succeed in his Government. Not long after his fathers death Artaxerxes went to Pasargada, there to be initiated by the Persian Priests in the royal mysteries. There was a Temple dedicated to some warlike Goddesse, thought to be Diana, whose Temple he that was to be initiated entring must put off his own Clothes, and put upon him a Garment worn by Cyrus the Great, before he came to the Empire; there was he to eat such a quantity of Figs, to drink Milk mingled with Vinegar, and perhaps used some other unknown Ceremonies. Whilest the King was about these things came Tissaphernes unto him, and with him a Certain Priest, who having been appointed the instructor of his brother Cyrus had taught him the Magical Arts. He accusing him of treasonable practices, had more credit given to him, because Cyrus had resolved to set upon the King in the Temple, and kill him as he should put off his Clothes; some say he was apprehended upon this accusation, others, that he came indeed into the Temple, and being hid by the Priest, was discovered and taken.

in her arms, wrapped him in her hair, laid her neck to his, and with great lamentations and intreaties prevailed for his pardon, and sent him back again into his former Province of Lydia, and the Sea-coasts. When he came there, not at all contented with this command, nor so much as remembering that he was saved by his mother's intercession, as that he was taken and bound by his brothers, burned more than ever with a desire of reigning. And to this purpose as secretly as he could gathered forces of the Greeks; and under one pretence or other, laid out for foreign aid both far and near, hoping to surprise his brother. The Ionian Cities given up now into the hands of Tissaphernes revolted to him, all except Miletus, the Inhabitants of which he finding to practise the same, killed some, and drove away the rest, who flying to Cyrus, he besieged the City both by Sea and Land, endeavouring to restore them. Then wrote he submissively to his brother, desiring he might have the Government of those Cities rather than Tissaphernes, and herein he was furthered by his Mother, who lying as it were his Lieger at Court, made the best of all things. Hence was Artaxerxes deluded, suspecting nothing, but accounting these forces to be kept together against Tissaphernes, betwixt whom and Cyrus he little regarded though there were a War, and the rather, because Cyrus sent him the Tributes due from the Cities, which Tissaphernes had formerly kept in his hands.

Idem & Xenoph. Expedit. Cyni, lib. 1.

27. Clearchus at this time being banished from Lacedemon, came to Cyrus, who after conference with him admired the man, and gave him 10000 Daricks, wherewith he levied an Army, and passing out of Cherronesus warred upon the Thracians that inhabited above the Hellepont, thereby greatly promoting the affairs of the Greek Cities, insomuch that they willingly furnished him with money to maintain his Forces which were onely raised for Cyrus, though thus employed for a cover to the design, and till he could be in a readinesse. There was also one Aristippus a Thessalian a guest of Cyrus, who being overpowered by his Country-men of the contrary faction, came to him, and requested him to spare him 2000 Mercenaries and three moneths pay, alleging that thereby he should be able to overcome his adversaries. He granted his request, and doubled both the number of men and sum of money, desiring him withall, not to agree with his adversaries till they two had had conference together; and so this Army in Thessalie (though not discovered) was kept on foot and maintained for him. Further he sent to Proxenus the Boeotian, his friend, to bring unto him as many men as he might, under pretence of warring against the Pisidians, who spoiled his Country; and Sophanetus the Symphalian, with Socrates the Achaean, who likewise were both his Guests, to come to him with as many men as they could make, under colour, together with the banished Milesians, of making Warre upon Tissaphernes.

Idem ibid.

28. When he was now resolved to march up into the higher Provinces against his brother, and for that purpose must gather all his Forces together, he gave out, that his purpose was to chase the Pisidians wholly out of the Country, and so, as for that intent, assembled both his Barbarian and Graecian Troups. He commanded Clearchus with the Army he led to come unto him, Aristippus to compound with his adversaries, and send him his Forces, and Xenias the Arcadian (whom he had appointed General of the Mercenaries that lay in Garrison in the Cities) leaving onely so many as should be necessary to keep the Cittadels, gathered those Forces together, and brought them to Sardis, being about 4000 armed Foot. He sent for those that lay before Miletus, and invited the banished men to his service, promising, if his affairs succeeded, not to give over till he had restored them, which they gladly accepted of. Proxenus came with 1500 heavy-armed and 500 light-armed foot. Sophanetus the Symphalian brought 1000 armed, Socrates the Achaean about 500, Pasion the Megarean 300, and as many Pelcasts or Targetiers.

29. He had before this sent to Lacedemon, desiring of that State, that as he had formerly aided them against the Athenians, so they would not refuse now in his need to do the same for him: boasting in his letters, that if they sent him Foot-men, he would provide for them Horses, if Horse-men, Chariots, if they had before of their own certain pieces of ground, he would give them whole Villages, and that he would not count but measure their pay to them. They counting it but just and agreeable enough to their own interest (not considering against whom they ingaged) decreed aid to be sent to him, thinking hereby if he overcame to ingratiate themselves with him; but if Artaxerxes should get the better, to excuse themselves well enough, as having decreed nothing against him absolutely. The Ephri then presently wrote to their Admiral, to do whatsoever he should command, who accordingly went to Ephesus and joyned himself with Tamos the Aegyptian and Admiral to Cyrus, with whom he sailed into Cilicia, and there prevailed that Syennesis the Prince of that Country hindred not Cyrus as he passed by Land against his brother. Tissaphernes conceiving that these preparations were greater than fitted the War against the Pisidians, with a Party of 500 Horse hastened to the King with all possible speed, who as soon as by him he had the intelligence, made contrary preparations. Cyrus after he had committed the care of Lydia to some Persians of his kindred, and given the charge of Lydia, Aolis, and the parts adjacent to Tamos of Memphis his faithful friend, he presently set forwards toward Cilicia and Pisidia, it being bruted up and down that some of these people had revolted. From Sardis he marched through Lydia, and after four encampings, came 112 miles and an half to Colosse, a great, rich, and well inhabited City, where he stayed seven dayes, and Menon the Thessalian came to him with 1000 armed Foot, and 500 Dolopian, Anian, and Olynthians Peltasts. From thence he marched in three encampings 75 miles and an half to Celane a great and rich City of Phrygia, where he rested thirty daies, & Clearchus the Lacedamonian came to him with 1000 armed Foot, and 800 Thracian Peltasts, and 200 Cretian Archers; and Sofias the Syracusan brought 1000 armed Foot, and Sophaneus the Arcadian the same number. Here he also mustred the Greeks, and found them to be 11000 Armed, and about 200 Peltasts or Targetiers.

30. From Celane he marched in two encampings ten Parasangs, or thirty seven miles and an half, and came to Pelte, where he stayed three dayes; and thence in two encampings 45 miles, and arrived at the Market of the Ceramianians, a City full of People, and the last in the Country of Mysia: and hence in three encampings he marched 30 Parasangs 112 miles, and reached to the Plain of Cayster, a City well peopled, where he rested his Army five dayes. Here the Army made much ado for pay, being more than three moneths behind, which he was enabled to pay them, with a moneth over, by the coming of Epiaxia wife to Syennesis King of Cilicia, who brought good store of treasure with her. From thence in four encampings he proceeded 75 miles as far as Tyrium, a City full of people, and hence in three encampings 75 miles and arrived at Iconium the last City of Phrygia. He stayed here three dayes, and then marched in five encampings through Lycania 112 miles, which Country he suffered the Greeks to spoil as Enemy. Now he sent away the Cilician Queen by the nearest way into her own Country, and with her Menon the Thessalian and his Regiment, to make way for his passage into that Country.

31. Cyrus with the rest marched through Cappadocia 25 Parasangs, or 93 miles and an half in four dayes, and came to Dana a great and wealthy City, where he put to death two Persians for treason against himself. From hence attempt was made to break into Cilicia, but the Streights were so narrow, that one Chariot could but passe at once, and withall exceeding steep, so that if resistance was made it was impossible, which Syennesis the King was said to be ready to make at the height of the Streights, and the Army, for that reason staid in the Plain. But the next day word was brought that he had quitted the passage, after he perceived Menon's Troops to be got into Cilicia beyond the Mountains, and heard how a Fleet of Lacedamonian Gallies were with those of Cyrus, under sail to passe from Ionis thither, under conduct of Tamos.

SECT. 3.

Tamos. Then ascended he the Mountain without any opposition, from which descending, in four encampings he marched 93 miles and an half, and came to Tarsus and a great rich City of Cilicia, where was the Palace of Syennesis, and through which runneth Cydus, a River two hundred foot in breadth.

32. The Inhabitants thereof, except such as bought and sold, fled with their King to the tops of the Mountains, leaving the City to be sacked with the Palace by the Soldiers, intraged for the losse of 100 of their Companions of Menon's Regiment. Cyrus sent for the King to come to him, who refused it, till overcome by the perswasions of his wife, and then he gave him great sums of money to uphold his Army, and received back such gifts as were accounted most honourable amongst Kings, as an Horse with a golden bit, a Chain of gold, Bracelets, a sword decked with gold, a Persian Garment, and Freedom of his Land from spoil; as also restitution of Slaves taken in spoil by the Soldiers wheresoever they could be found. Here the soldiers now imagining that they were lead against the King flatly refused to go any farther, it being, as they said, no part of their agreement. Clearchus went about to force his men to proceed, but they, as soon as he offered to go forwards, cast stones at him and at his carriage beasts, whereby he was forced to betake himself to a fair and politic way, and to effect it (which with trouble enough he did) Cyrus gave out that he went against Abrocamas an Enemy of his, who lay upon the River Euphrates about twelve encampings from thence, that if he found him there, he would be revenged on him, and if he fled away they should deliberate what to do. Hereupon, though they suspected the matter, yet they resolved to hold on, and upon demanding more pay, he promised them half as much more as formerly they had: viz. a Darick and an half instead of one Darick to every Soldier. All this while no man heard in publick they were led against the King.

33. From Tarsus in five encampings he marched about 83 miles to Issos, the last City of Cilicia, well peopled, large, and rich, and situated upon the Sea, where he remained three dayes. Hither out of Paloponnesus came to Cyrus 35 Lacedemonian ships, under the command of Pythagoras, together with Tamos, who brought from Ephesus 25 of Cyrus his ships, wherewith he had besieged Miletus, and Cherisophus the Lacedemonian whom Cyrus had sent for, and who brought with him 700 armed Foot. Whilst the Army lay here, the Gracian Mercenaries that served Abrocamas, viz. 400 armed Foot revolted and came to Cyrus. From hence in one encamping he came about eighteen miles to the Streights of Cilicia and Syria, defended with a wall on each side, betwixt which ran the River Kersos 100 foot broad. The distance betwixt the walls was three furlongs, admitting no passage by force, the neither way toward the Sea being narrow and fenced with strong walls, and the upper nothing but inaccessible Rocks, in either wall there being set a gate. This passage Cyrus suspecting to be stopped by Abrocamas, sent for his ships to transport so many men as might force it: but he upon hearing of Cyrus his coming into Cilicia, returned with all speed out of Phanicia to the King, though reported to have an Army of 300000 men.

34. From the Streights he marched in one encamping eighteen miles, and upwards, and came to Myriandrum a City of Syria, inhabited by the Phœnicians, upon the Sea, being a place of traffick, where many ships of burthen then rode in the Haven. Here he remained seven dayes, and Xenias the Arcadian Collonel, with Pasion of Megara shipping themselves sailed homewards, discontented, as was thought, because Cyrus suffered Clearchus to keep their Soldiers, which refusing to go any further against the King, removed into his Camp, with intent to return into Greece. From thence in four encampings he marched 75 miles to the River Chatos, 100 foot broad, which was full of great tame Fish, which the Syrians counted gods, and therefore suffered them nor to be harmed no more than Pigeons. The Villages wherein they encamped belonged to Parisatis, being assigned her for her maintenance. Thence in eight encampings he marched 168 miles to the River

Euphrates,

Euphrates, whose breadth was 3 furlongs, and upon which was built the great and rich Citie Thapsacus, where the Army remained 5 dayes.

35. Here it was openly declared to the Greeks, that they were led against the King, for which they were very angry with their Officers, who, they said they were sure, knew it before, for not acquainting them sooner with the design; and refused to stir one foot forwarder, except upon promise of as much as their Countrey-men had, who formerly waited on Cyrus to his father. He promised to give every man five pounds of silver (of the value of 14. l. 11. s. 8. d. sterling) as soon as they came to Babylon, and to continue their whole pay, till they should be sent back into Ionia, to which conditions most of them yielded, and Menon prevailing with his Regiment to passe over the River first, whilst the other were yet in consultation, thereby to gain greater favour with Cyrus, all the Army followed, not a man being wet above the breasts in wading over; so that this passage seemed to be miraculous, and to portend more good to Cyrus than followed, the River giving way to him, which they of Thapsacus reported never to have been passed over on foot before, but onely with shipping, which Abrocamus had burnt to hinder him in the passage. Thence in nine encampings he marched fifty parasangs, or 187 miles and upwards through Syria, and came to the River Araxes. Here they stayed three dayes, and made provision of victuals, and then departing thence, marched through the Wildernesse of Arabia, 130 miles in five encampings, having Euphrates on the right hand, and proceeding through this Countrey came to the River Masæa, where they stayed three dayes in making provision for the army; whence in 13 encampings they marched through the desert 90 parasangs, or 337 miles and an half, and came to the Straights.

36. Proceeding in their journey hence, they might discover the footings, and dung of horses; for a party had been sent of about 2000. which going before the Kings Camp, burnt up the fodder, and made havock of all things profitable for use. Now came Orontes a Persian to Cyrus, whom having sought to betray him in times past, and pardoned by him, attempted now to do the like, but was discovered, and put to death. Marching still forward they proceeded in three encampings 45 miles through the Countrey of Babylon. In the third encamping at midnight Cyrus set his men in order, thinking his brother to be near, and would give him battel the next morning. The Grecians were in number 10400 Armed, and 2400 Targetiers, the Barbarians with Cyrus were ten Myriads (or 100000) besides about 200 sythed Chariots. From hence in order of battel he marched some twelve miles, thinking the King would have fought that day, because at the end of this half dayes journey he found a Trench cast five fathoms broad, and three deep, running up 45 miles into the Countrey, as far as the Wall of Media, where the four Chanels begin that derived out of the River Tigris, fall into Euphrates. This Trench the King caused to be made after he heard that Cyrus was stirring, who now passing it without any disturbance, he and all his Army were strongly perswaded that the King determined not to fight; whence he had not so great care of his March the next day, and the third day after he advanced sitting in his Chariot: the most of his Army marched confusedly, many of the Souldiers having their Arms laid upon the wains, and carriage of beasts.

37. Now it was time, the Marker was full, and the place of encamping where they should quarter was at hand, when Paragyas a Persian, one of the faithfullst of Cyrus his Train was seen to come upon the spur, his horse dropping with sweat, crying out in the Persian and Greek language that the King was hard by, with an huge Army, ready and prepared for fight. This news made a great confusion, all thinking they should be charged in that disorder, Cyrus leaping from his Chariot, put on his Curace, and mounting on horseback, took his Darts in his hand, and commanded the rest to Arm, and every man to take his place. Clearchus stood in the point of the right Wing, by the River Euphrates, Menon and his Regiment held the point of the left, and Cyrus himself the midst with 600 horse-men Armed with great Curaces, and Tafes, and all of them with Casks, except he alone, who stood waiting the fight.

SECT. 3. fight with his head unarmed, according to the custom of Persia. The King had with him 90 Myriads (or 900000) and 150 Chariots, having on both sides sythes prominent, and bearing straight forth from the Axle-trees, and some from the former seat of the Chariot with their points turned toward the ground, that they might cut in pieces whatsoever they met and struck upon: His purpose was to send them with high speed against the Ranks of the Gracians, to break and rent them asunder.

38. The Kings Army came on an equal and slow pace, in great silence, quietnesse, and order, which amazed, and discouraged Cyrus, and the Gracians, little expecting any such thing. Cyrus now galloping up to the right Wing, cried out to Clearchus to lead the Gracians against the middest of the Enemies battel, because the King was there, saying, that if he were overcome, there would be no more for them to do. Clearchus seeing the middest of the battel, and hearing from him that the King, by reason of his multitudes which stretched out the body, was far without the point of the left Wing of the Gracian Phalang, would not for all that draw away the right Wing from the River, fearing to be confronted, and encompassed on both sides: but answered, he would have a care that all things should go well. The word was betrayed before they joyned, so that they were forced to change it to Jupiter the saviour, and victory, after the giving of which the Gracians singing the Pæan, and running on with a shout, the Barbarians, before they came within an Arrows shot turned their horses and fled, the other following the Chace with all speed, and crying to one another not to haste too much, but to follow in good order. The Chariots void of Guides were carried, some upon the Enemies themselves, some upon the Gracians, who upon a forecast opened, and let them passe through, onely some were overthrown by fear, who notwithstanding were reported to have had no harm, nor yet any other Gracian in this whole fight, one onely excepted, who was stricken with an Arrow in the left side.

39. Cyrus beholding this fight much rejoyced, and was now worshipped as King by those about him; notwithstanding he followed not the Chace, but keeping by him his 600 horse, observed what the King would do, who being in the midst of his Phalang, without the point of Cyrus his left Wing, and seeing no man to fight against him on the contrary part, wound, and turned his battel to the left hand, to overwing, and encompassse in his Enemies. Cyrus perceiving it, and fearing, lest coming on the backs of the Gracians he should cut them in pieces, galloped forth, and met him in front, and charging with his 600. overcame, and put to flight the 6000 that were ordered before him, and with his own hands (as was reported) slew Ariagis, one of his Generals. His 600 pursuing hotly were dispersed, except a few that were left with him, for the most part such as usually sat at his Table, with which being accompanied, he espied the King, and the Troup about him, and after he had said I see the man, flew out directly against him, struck him on the breast, and wounded him through the Curace, as Ctesias of Gnidus the Kings Physician related, who reported also that he cured the Wound. Whilest Cyrus thus fought, one with a Dart hit him a sore blow under the eye.

40. The King and Cyrus with their followers in defence of either of them thus coping together, Cyrus was slain by the King, as his flatterers said, as others by a Carian, though Ctesias writeth his death to have hapned after the King had withdrawn himself to an Hill, being first wounded besides the eye, and then dispatched by a thrust into his left Leg, by a Caunian of a base condition, who with other of his Companions had thrust himself, it being now dark, in amongst his followers. Here he died in the battel of Cunaxa a place distant from Babylon 500 furlongs, or 60 odd miles, a man in the opinion of such as had acquaintance with him, of a most Kingly disposition, and most worthy a Crown of all the Persians that succeeded Cyrus the Great. Clearchus before the fight advised him to keep himself behind the Army, and not to venture into danger, to whom he replied as one who wished him to carry himself unworthy a Kingdom whilest he fought for one. In the opinion of Plutarch arch, not so much his rashness (though inexcusable) as the laziness, not to say cowardise, of Clearchus is to be condemned, who having marched so many miles for no other purpose than to place him in the Throne, nor so much endeavoured his safety and Conquest, as his own ease and security: The event of the fight shewed, that none of those about the King would have endured the least brunt from the Gracians, and that after they had been put to flight, and he with them, or else killed in the place, the victory and Kingdom must have remained to Cyrus. But this advantage was lost by Clearchus, who so placed his men that Artaxerxes could not have desired a more convenient order, on his part, they being at greatest distance from him and his Army, insomuch that he neither perceived himself overcome by them, and Cyrus was sooner slain than they could reap any fruit of their victory. This battel was fought about the beginning of the fourth year of the 95 Olympiad, Epanetus (or Xenanius) being Archon at Athens, in the third ending, or fourth beginning of Artaxerxes.

41. Artaxerxes commanded the head, and right hand of Cyrus to be cut off, and following the Chace, chanced upon his Camp, which they plundered, and took thence his Phocæan Concubine, called the wife and beautifull, whose name in her own Countrey was Misto, but by Cyrus called Aspasia, whom the King most loved, and kept amongst his 360 Concubines. Now were he and the Gracians near four miles asunder; these last giving Chace to such Enemies as stood before them, as if they had been Conquerours of the whole Army; the other rising the Camp of the Gracians, as if his Army had gained the victory. After this, both parties rallied again for a new engagement, but the Barbarians received not the Gracians, but fled with greater speed than before. Having persued them some way, the Gracians made an Holt, and rested themselves, wondring they saw not Cyrus, being ignorant what was befallen him. Then after some consultation what was to be done they returned to the Camp about Supper time, where they found the most of their other goods rifled, and especially the meat and drink, and the 400 Wains loaden with Meal and Wine, which Cyrus had prepared to relieve them, in case the Army should at any time be driven to want. The most of them therefore were supperlesse, having also wanted their Dinner that day: for that the King came in sight before they could refresh themselves. Thus this day ended, and together with the story the first book of the Aspens of Cyrus commonly ascribed to Xenophon as the Author.

The Gracians having the better in the battel, are ignorant of Cyrus his death.

42. The Gracians hearing of Cyrus his death were much troubled, and offered Arius (a Persian, who followed Cyrus, and commanded his left Wing) to place him in the Throne; but he refused it, for that, as he said, there were many Persians in all respects better than he, who would never endure that he should be King. Artaxerxes sent a Message to them to lay down their Arms, and to repair to his Gate, there to submit themselves to his mercy. The Coronels were divided in their opinions concerning it, and gave several answers according to their apprehensions, but Clearchus, for all a doubtful one, viz. that if they might be accounted as his friends, they should be better friends having Arms, than delivering them up to any man; if no remedy there was but War, they should better make War with Arms, than without, after they had rendred them up. And whereas he offered them Truce, as long as they abode in the same place, but threatned War if they stirred thence, he replied onely, that they would expect accordingly. Then resolved he, after he knew Arius his answer, and how he invited them to march back again into Ionia, for that the sacrifice killed about marching against the King was not propitious, to joyn the Army unto his, which accordingly he did, Arius, and the Officers of the Gracians taking an Oath to be friends, confederates, and not to betray one another. The League was entred into on this manner: They killed a Boar, a Bull, a Wolf, and a Ram; and the Gracians dipped the point of a sword, the Barbarians of a Spear in the blood of these beasts, being powred out into the holownesse of a Target.

43. The length of the journey from Ephesus in Ionia to the place of the battel was 93 encampings, 535 parasangs, 16030 furlongs, 2000 miles and above, which though very long, yet resolved they to take another and longer way through Paphlagonia, because the former was destitute of provisions. Then set they forward that way, marching more slowly for the better gathering of necessaries, and after the King had somewhat recovered of his wound, he pursued them, and pitched his Tents hard by theirs; but with the noise of them his men were so affrighted, that some of the nearest to them removed their Tents, and on the next day setting their men in order for battel, he who before had made such large demands, sent and offered them truce, and covenanted to let them have free passage through his Territories till they came to the Sea, and afforded them provisions for their money, which was also granted to all the Mercenaries who served under Ariens (or Aridens) and Clearchus. Then proceeded the Greeks on their journey, and the King returned to Babylon, where rewarding those that had best deserved on him in the last battel, he judged the service of Tissaphernes to have been most eminent, therefore as a reward (amongst several other noble gifts) he gave him his own daughter to wife, and the government of such places as formerly had been under Cyrus, binding him to him thereby so, as he proved ever most faithful to him.

44. Tissaphernes seeing how the King was incensed against the Gracians, promised him to destroy them all, if he were but furnished with Forces to that purpose, and could but withdraw Ariens from them, by whom he doubted not but they might easily be betrayed. The King accepting his offer, gave him leave to chuse of the most valiant of his Army as many as he would, with which he followed after, and incamping near to them, sent for Clearchus and the other Colonels to come to him, pretending he had somewhat for their good to say to them. They with the Captains of the several Companies going to him, with 200 more (who went to buy Victuals) he secured the Colonels called into his Tent, and killed the Captains at the door with the other 200, of which one chanced to escape with the news thereof to the Camp. The Colonels were sent to the King, who put them all to death except Menon. The Soldiers at first greatly terrified, having now no body left to command or lead them, by the advice of Xenophon made choice of other Leaders, amongst whom Cheirisophus was chief, and he himself was one, being elected into the place of Proxenus, who being his ancient friend and guest sent for him, and promised him if he would come, to make Cyrus his friend, who, as he esteemed him, would be more to be prized than his own Country. He communicated the matter to Socrates the Philosopher and his Master, who, for that Cyrus his interest seemed crossie to that of the City of Athens, seeming to stand with the Lacedemonians, advised him to consult the Oracle of Delphos. Thither he went, and enquired how he might best accomplish his journey, to which was answered, that he must sacrifice to those gods to whom he ought to sacrifice, which he reporting again to Socrates, he blamed him for so propounding his question, alleging he ought to have asked whether he should travel or no, and not as one resolved already to do it; but seeing it was so, he must do as he was bidden, and accordingly he followed Cyrus to Sardis, where Proxenus presented him to him.

The Carducians a warlike Nation and at Enmity with the King, and much exercised in slinging of great and massie stones, much disturbed the Gracians in their passage of their Country, and in the passing the Mountains thereof were spent seven dayes. With great difficulty and danger having passed it, they went over the River Centris into Armenia; of which Artabazus being then Governour, entred into league with them, and suffered them quietly to passe; but in travelling thorow the Mountains they were near all being overwhelmed in the snow, the discerning of wayes being taken away thereby. The whole Army had perished also by extream cold, had they not light upon some Villages near hand, wherein being furnished with plenty of necessaries, they refreshed themselves. The houses stood within the ground, into which the Men descended by stairs, and their Cattel by descents made for that purpose. Having here stayed eight dayes, they journeyed thence to the River Phasis.

46. Having continued four dayes at this River, they marched through the Country of the Tacchi and Phasiani, by whom being opposed, they fought, and made great slaughter of them, and then seized upon their Villages, which were plentifully furnished with such things as they wanted, they there rested fifteen dayes. Thence marching through the Territories of the Chalcidians, in seven encampings they came to the River Harpagus, and thence coming into the Plains of the Tascutin, they there refreshed themselves three dayes, and proceeding, in four encampings they arrived at a great City called Gymnasia. The Prince of this Country entring into a League with them, furnished them with Guides to the Sea, of which, after fifteen dayes being got up to the hill Chenias, they got a sight afar of, at which the Front shouted so for joy, that those in the Rear thinking they had been set upon by some Enemy, prepared themselves for a Fight, and there laid they a great heap of stones as a Monument to Posterity, of the spoils obtained from the Barbarians, and the immortal memory of their Expedition.

47. Then came they into the Country of the Macri, with whom they made a League, by taking and receiving a Spear, according to the custom of these Barbarians. Having got over their Mountains they came into the Territories of the Coleri, where a great multitude opposing them, they made no small slaughter of the Inhabitants, and made great spoil; where they found a kind of Honey, of which whosoever did eat, became according to the quantity eaten, drunken, mad, or as dead, but the next day at the same hour returned to their right Senses, and after three or four dayes arose as having received some Medicine. Thence in two encampings they come to Trapezond a Gracian City well inhabited, situate upon the Euxine Sea, being a Colony of the Sinopeans, placed in the Colchian Country. Here Jason with his Companions are reported to have arrived with their ship Argos. They sacrificed to Hercules and Jupiter, and celebrated Games of Exercise, and hence was Cherisophus sent to Byzantium to provide ships for the transportation of them home, and for him here they staid thirty dayes, but after that term he returning not, their provisions growing scarce, though they had made excursions both by Sea and Land, they put on shipboard (having obtained a little shipping of the Trapezuntans) the sick, all those above forty years of age, with the women and children, and passed in three dayes to Cerasunt a Gracian City situate upon the Sea, being also a Colony of the Sinopeans in the Colchian Country. Here they remained ten dayes, and taking a muster, found 8600 remaining of those that ascended with Cyrus into Persia, the rest being consumed by the Enemies hand, or Snow, or sicknesse. Here also they divided the money that arose out of the sale of Captives, the tenth part of which the Officers took into their hands, being severed as an offering to be made to Apollo and Diana of Ephesus; every one keeping and preserving a share for his gods.

48. From Cerasunt they came into the Country of the Mesynecans, the veniest Barbarians they had met with in the whole journey, which they passed by force in eight encampings, and in three more that of the Tibarenes through which they came to Cotyora a Gracian Colony also of the Sinopeans. Thus far the Army marched on foot, the whole length of the retreat from the place of the battel in the Babylonian Territories hither, being 122 encampings, 520 parasangs, 10820 furlongs, 1352 miles and something more. At Cotyora they continued 50 dayes, making excursions upon the neighbouring

Then the Heracleans and Sinopeans, a Colony of the Milesians in Paphlagonia, furnished them with shipping, into which they put themselves and their baggage, and sailed away, Cherisophus meeting them with a few Vessels. Holding on their course they sailed by Jason's shore, where the Ship Argo is said to have anchored, and by the mouths of the Rivers Thermodon, Halys, & Parthenius, by which after they had passed, they arrived at Heraclea a Gracian City and Colony of the Megaraeans, situate in the Territory of the Maryandens, and came to anchor near the Cherronesus or Peninsula of Acheronsia, where Hercules is said to have fetcht the Dog Cerberus out of Hell; the marks being there shewn of his descent, and the depth of the place, being more than two furlongs.

49. Here the Soldiers, through the perswasion of Lycon an Achaian, making unreasonable demands of money from the Heracleans, they shut their gates upon them, and provided for their own defence, which bred a sedition in the Army, so that they parted asunder. The Arcadians and Acbeans being more than 4500 all heavy armed, sailed away first, having got shipping of the Heracleans, this falling sodainly upon the Bithynians, they might prevent the rest, and make the greatest prey. Cherisophus a little before chosen General, having 1300 armed, and 700 Peltasts, (who were the Thracians that followed Clearchus) marched on foot from Heraclea, and as soon as he entered Thrace, led along by the Sea-coast being now sick, and presently dead of a Medicine he took in an Ague. Xenophon with 1700 Armed, 300 Peltasts, and 40 Horse, taking shipping, landed in the confines of Thrace, and marched through the midst of the Land. With great difficulty passed they through the Country on foot, the Thracians of Asia and the Bithynians, grievously afflicting them, till meeting together again, they resolved no more to part, and decreed it should be death for any one to move such a thing. Then came they safe, though with great difficulty, to Chrysopolis a City in Chalcedonia, whence without much trouble some returned home, others were employed by Sentes the King of Thrace; and after that Thymbro joyning them to the rest of the Gracian Forces, made War with them against Tissaphernes.

The Governours of the King's Provinces through which they journeyed were Artymas of Lydia, Artacamas of Phrygia, Misbridates of Lycania and Cappadocia; of Cilicia Syeneffis, of Phaenicia and Arabia Dernes, of Syria and Affyria Belasis, of Babylonia Roparas, of Media Arbacus, of the Phasiens and Hesperites Teribazus. The Carduchans, Chalybes, Chaldeans, Macrons, Cholcans, Mosynacans, Coians, and Tibarens, were free people, and under no man's subjection. Paphlagonia was ruled by Coryllus, the Bithynians by Pharnabazus, the European Thracians by Sentes. The total number of the Ascent and Descent, was 212 encampings, 1150 parasangs, 34355 furlongs, 4281 miles and more. The time of the Ascent and Descent one year and three moneths. Thus these Strangers wanting all things, ignorant of the Countries through which they passed, over precipitous Mountains, straight and (almost) impassable wayes, notwithstanding the malice of Enemies, sharpnesse of air, and difficulty of the Soil, by the wonderful Providence of God, and singular prudence of Xenophon, returned home into Greece, as we have it described by Xenophon himself, though the seven Books of this Expedition, notwithstanding the constant opinion of Antiquity, are adjudged by a late Learned Man (by reason of the disagreement of their manner of writing from his other works) from him, and are ascribed to Themistogenes the Syracusian, whom elsewhere he mentioneth to have related these matters. However this service performed to Cyrus cost him the losse of his Country, being for that banished by the Athenians his Countrymen; but the Lacedaemonians taking pity of him, gave him some Lands in the Country of Elis and the Territories of Triphylis, whence we may very well fetch an account of his writing that elegant Treatise of the form of their Commonwealth.

51. In this mean time whilst the Gracians were on their way homewards, Parsasis

Parysatis rage-such as had any hand in the death of her son Cyrus.

Parysatis the Queen-mother of Perſia greatly lamented the death of her ſon Cyrus, and meditated nothing but revenge upon ſuch as had been inſtruments in his death, whom one way or other getting into her hands, ſhe killed with moſt exquisite torments. The Carian, who vaunted he, and no other, had killed him being deſigned by Artaxerxes to be beheaded, becauſe he robbed him of the glory of ſo valiant an action, ſhe begged of the King, that ſhe might have the puniſhing him, and ſo delivered him to thoſe, who for ten dayes tormented him; then digged out his eyes, and laſtly made an end of him by powring melted braſſe into his ears. Mubridates guilty of the ſame Crime of boaiſting, and thereby greatly incenſing the King, who would have had all men to believe that he alone in a ſingle Duel had ſlain his brother, was condemned to be put to death after an odd kind of puniſhment full of cruelty then in uſe in Perſia. The Malefactor was laid on his back between two hollow things, in form like to Boats, ſo fitted together that his head, hands, and feet might ly out, and the reſt of the body be contained within. Being thus made faſt meat was given to him, and if he would not receive it, he was forced to eat by pricking of his eyes; and when he did eat, inſtead of drink, honey and milk mixed together were powred into him, being ſo placed as ever to have his eyes againſt the Sun. Hereby it came to paſſe, that his face would be wholly covered with flies; and doing that within the Engine, which a man needs muſt who keepeth conſtantly eating and drinking, from the putrefaction of the Excrements were Maggots and Worms bred, which creeping up into the entrails fed upon the body, ſo that the miſerable man being dead, and the upper part of the Engine removed, they might ſee the fleſh devoured, and ſwarms of filth ſticking on the Carcaſſe: After this manner was Mubridates by degrees extinct, after ſeventeen dayes.

The Bird
Rhyntaces, wherein Pary-

52. Parysatis after this, having won from Artaxerxes her ſon at Dice, the Bunuch Megates, who had cut off the head and hands of Cyrus, cauſed him to be ſleed alive. Her ſtudy then was how to rid herſelf of Statira her daughter-in-law, whom ſhe never cared for, now hated mortally, and emulated her by reaſon of her hatred againſt Cyrus, and her power with the King her husband, ſo as ſhe reſolved in the procurement of her deſtruction to hazard her own ſafety. Being now in appearance reconciled, and all old things forgotten, ſo as they met and ſupped together, ſhe thence took occaſion ſecretly to work her death. There was a bird in Perſia, called Rhyntaces, in which being nothing ſuperfluous, or of excrement, all the inward parts were filled with fat. This, as Cteſias wrote, ſhe cut it in two with a knife, whereof the one ſide was onely poiſoned, & then taking the clear half to her ſelf, ſhe gave the other which the poiſon had touched unto Statira, who ſuſpecting nothing, for that ſhe ſee her eat herſelf of the bird before her, did eat it up, and died after great convulſions and torment. She ſuſpected her before her death, and poſſeſſed the King with the matter, who knew ſufficiently the cruel, and implacable diſpoſition of his mother. He preſently with Tortures examined her neereſt ſervants, but ſhe kept Gygis a woman who had been acceſſary to the fact, and would not give her up to him, till at length having notice that ſhe ſhould go out of the houſe by night, he ſurprized, and condemned her to die the death due to poiſoners by the Perſian Law, which was, that the head of the Malefactor being laid on a great ſtone, with another it was broken and flatted. As for his Mother he hurt her not at all, either by word or deed, but ſhe deſiring to go to Babylon, he ſent her, adding onely this, that he would not ſee that Citie ſo long as ſhe lived. This was the ſtate of the Domeſtick affairs of Artaxerxes.

53. After the overthrow of Cyrus, he ſent down Tiſſaphernes (not Phar-nabazus, as is falſly written in Diodorus) to the Sea-Coaſts to recover them into his power, the Governors of which fearing now to pay dearly for their compliance with Cyrus, ſent to make their peace with this new General, and ſought all wayes poſſible to be received into his favour. But Tamos a man of prime note amongſt them, and Governour of Ionia, ſhipping his goods, goods, and all his sons (except one, named Cyao, who afterwards became Captain of the Kings forces) sayled for fear of Tissaphernes into Egypt to Psammichus the King, hoping for former curtelies to be received; but he, without consideration of former benefits, to get his ships and money to himself, murdered his friend with his Children.

In the mean time the Ionians fearing Tissaphernes, and desirous to enjoy their liberty, sent to the Lacedæmonia, now the chiefeſt State in Greece, desiring, that being the Captains, and Protectors of all Greece, they would not neglect them Originally of the same stock, but endeavour that they might enjoy their liberty, retain their Lands, and not utterly be destroyed, as danger seemed to threaten them from Tissaphernes, whom they had incensed by revolting from him to Cyrus. They, who were nothing contented with the doubling of their power by the accession of that of Athens lately subdued, but still according to the nature of men desiring more, began to cast in their heads how they might attain to the Empire of Asia, being also encouraged by the retreat of their Countrey-men, did not unwillingly receive the embassy; but promising them speedy relief, first sent to Tissaphernes, desiring him not to offer any violence to the Greek Towns, but he neglecting their Message, and falling upon Cyme, in the Territories of which he did much harm, and took many prisoners, they then created Thymbro their Captain General against the King, giving him 1000 of their own Citizens, and order to take up as many from amongst their associates as he should think convenient.

54. Thymbro then with these marched to Corinth, where making them up to the number of 5000. besides 200 Athenian horse, he thence sayled to Ephesus. Having there out of the Associates and others, raised 2000 men more, he removed, and fell upon Magnesia, a Town subject to Tissaphernes, which he took at the first onset, and presently after attempted Tralles, a Town of Ionia; but it being to no purpose, he retreated to Magnesia, which being Fortified with no Wall, fearing that Tissaphernes might after his departure recover it, he removed it to an Hill hard by, named Thorax. Then invaded he, and harazed the Enemies countrey, but hearing that Tissaphernes was coming towards him with a great power of horse, he thought himself unable to grapple with him, and therefore returned unto Ephesus. Not long after upon promise of pay he procured Xenophon his forces to joyn with him, with which then he took the field against Tissaphernes, whereupon Pergamus yielded to him, together with Teuthrania, and Halisarnia Governed by Eurysthones and Procles, who were descended from Demaratus the Lacedæmonian. Other Towns also were delivered up to him, and some he took by force, till at length he sat down before Larissa, called the Egyptian, which attempting for some time to no purpose, his Superiours at Lacedæmon were nothing satisfied with his management of the War, so that he received orders from the Ephori to leave Larissa, and remove the Army into Caria. He obeyed, and when he was come on his way as far as Ephesus, Dercyllidas (a man so famous for his rare invention and cunning, that he got the surname of Sisyphus) being appointed his Successor, there met him, and discharged him of his employment. Returning home, he was accused by the Associates for giving his Souldiers liberty to spoyle the friends and confederates of the State, and for that was banished.

Dercyllidas succeedeth him.

55. Dercyllidas taking the Army into his hands, and not ignorant how he had to do with two Persian Lieutenants, Tissaphernes and Pharnabazus, who feared and hated each other; lest he should be overmatched with both, he resolved if he could to make peace with one of them. He had conceived some distaste against the later for an affront he put upon him, when he formerly served under Lysander in Asia: wherefore he made peace with Tissaphernes upon certain conditions, and lead his Army into Æolis, without any hurt to the confederates in the way, which was under the Command of Pharnabazus, where taking nine Cities in eight dayes, and getting into his hands all the Cities of Troas, he consulted by what means he might so quarter his Soul-

Souldiers in Winter, as not to be burthenfom to the Associates as Thimbro was, and yet prevent Pharnabazus from troubling the Cities with the excursions of horse, of which he had good store. He sent then presently to Pharnabazus to offer him either vvar, or peace, who making choice of a Truce, for that he stood in fear of Phrygia, which bordered upon Aolis, and where he had his fear, he thereupon lead his forces into Bithynia to Winter there; the other not being unwilling he should so do, because the Bithynians were often troublefom to him.

56. In the beginning of Spring Dercyllidas marching out of Bithynia came to Lampsacus, where he met with three Lacedemonians sent from the State to signifie to him the Prorogation of his Command for another year, who also by order from the Ephori, rebuked the Souldiers for the injuries offered by them to the associates in the time of Thimbro, and commended them for their great moderation last year, warning them for the time to come, to which one of the Officers answered (who had followed Cyrus) that the Souldiers were one and the same, but that the change of Generals produced a change in their behaviour. The messengers being departed out of Asia, he sent again to Pharnabazus, offering him either peace, or vvar, as before, who making the same choice, he out off hand passed over the Hellepont, and by the hands of his Souldiers, amongst whom the work was divided, fortified the Isthmus of the Cherronesus of Thrace with a Wall, thereby to defend it from incursions of the Thracians, who now had fallen upon it, and whom to repell he was sent for. He so encouraged the minds of the Souldiers by hope of reward, that the work being began in Spring was finished before Autumn, being thenceforth a great advantage to the inhabitants. After this he returned into Asia, where visiting the Cities he found that the Exiles of Chius having seized upon Atarna, there lurked, and lived upon such booty as they could make out of Ionias; wherefore he besieged the place, though strong, and well victualled, and after a siege of eight moneths forcing them to yield, he committed the care of the Town to Draco a Pellenian, and returned unto Ephesus.

57. In the mean while Pharnabazus, after he had made Truce with him, went up to the King, to whom he accused Tissaphernes, as not having repelled the Lacedemonians out of Asia, but suffered them there to continue at his cost and damage, alleging how unworthy a thing it was to fight more with money than Arms, and to restrain an Enemy more with rewards than valour. He advised him to make ready a Fleet, and give the Command thereof to Conon the Athenian, a man of great experience in things that concerned War, who since the disaster of his Countrey sojourned with Evagoras the King of Cyprus. Artaxerxes yielding, gave him 500 Talents to provide ships; and Conon hoping by this means to do some special service for his Countrey, undertook the charge, but the Fleet being not yet ready, he sayled with fourty Phanician Vessels into Cilicia, there to set all things in order. About the same time the Ionians sent to Lacedemon to declare to that State, that if Caria were invaded in which Tissaphernes his principal seat was, there might be hope that he would leave them to their Laws and Liberty. This so wrought with the Spartans, that the Ephori thereupon sent order to Dercyllidas to lead his forces into that Countrey, and to Pharaces their Admiral to sayl thither with his Fleet.

58. Notwithstanding the secret accusations of Pharnabazus, yet still was Tissaphernes trusted by the King, and so far as with the Chief power in the War against the Gracians; insomuch that Pharnabazus, though much against his will, was forced to come to him at such time as Dercyllidas invaded Caria. He first carried him thither, where taking what order their affairs required, and re-inforcing their Garrisons, they returned into Ionias, and Dercyllidas perceiving they had crossed the River Meander, after he had consulted with Pharaces the Admiral about the preservation of the Ionians at that time but naked of defence, he also passed the River after them. The Persian forces were in number 20000 foot, and 10000 horse; Dercyllidas his whole whole Army amounted but to 7000, and though the Peloponnesians well enough behaved themselves, yet such as came from Priene, and out of the Ionian Cities and Islands had lifted themselves under him, some of them throwing their Arms into the Corn (which grew plentifully by the River,) took them to their heels, and the rest sufficiently evidenced what they would do if they came to fight. Yet Tissaphernes having not forgot how such Greeks as followed Cyrus had put them to it, and judging all their Countrymen to be of the same metal, would by no means hear of fighting, which Pharnabazus fore pressed him to; but sent to Dercyllidas, desiring to come to interview. After Hostages given and received on both sides, they met, and an accommodation was made on these terms: That the King should leave all the Greek Cities to their own liberty; that the Greekish Forces should all depart out of his dominions, with all Lacedamonian Governours from his Cities, and that a truce should be for so long a time, till both parties could hear from their Superiours, concerning their resolutions herein. Then marched away the Armies to their quarters, the Persian to Tralles, and that of the Greeks to Lexcophrys.

59. Notwithstanding this truce entred into by these Captains, yet the rigging of a new Fleet went forwards in Phœnicia, and nothing do we hear concerning the confirmation of the Treaty by the King. It hapning that one Herodas a Syracusan, living with a Sea-man in Phœnicia, and taking notice how great diligence was used in preparing a Fleet, which he heard should be compleated to the number of 300 Vessels, he took the first opportunity of a ship and sailed into Greece, giving notice that such a Navy was providing by the King, and Tissaphernes, though he knew not, as he said, upon what design. The Lacedaminians hereat startled, began to look about them, when Agefilas one of their Kings, through the perswasion of Lysander, offered himself to undertake an Expedition into Asia against the Persian, provided they would send with him thirty of his choosing, by whose advice he might manage affairs; give him 2000 men from home, and 6000 more of the associates, which being granted him, together with provisions for half a year, he sailed with Lysander (who had procured himself to be one of the 300, hoping by this means to restore the Decemvirates in the Asian Cities, which he having erected, the Ephori had again dissolved) unto Ephesus with such speed, that he landed his Forces before the Persian Lieutenants knew so much as of his coming, and thereby took them at unawares.

60. At Ephesus he raised new Forces to the number of 4000, and increased his Army to 10000 Foot and 400 Horse, with which he took the field, a great company of rascally men, not inferiour in number to the other, following the Camp out of greedinesse for prey. Tissaphernes sent to him to know the cause of his coming into Asia, to whom he answered, that it was to restore the Greek Cities to their liberty; to which the other replied, desiring a cessation of Arms for so long a time, as he could send to the King, hoping to obtain from him that which he required. Agefilas gave little credit to his bare word, thinking, as indeed it was, that he protracted onely the time; but swearing most solemnly, that without any deceit he would do what in him lay to procure a Peace, he also upon this condition sware to hold the Truce; but Tissaphernes having little regard of his oath, sent onely to the King for new forces to joyn with his old ones, which though Agefilas sufficiently knew, yet kept he his Faith inviolable in preservation of the Truce; and when he denounced war against him, except he would forthwith quit Asia, he gave notice thereof joyfully to his Soldiers, and sent to the Ionians, Eolians, and the Greeks living upon the Hellespont, to dispatch their supplies unto Ephesus. Contrary then to the expectation of Tissaphernes (who thought he would have made for Caria) he invaded Phrygia, where setting upon the Cities at unawares, he got much booty, and without any losse came to the confines of Daschylum, where his Forlorn-hope meeting with a Party of Horse belonging to Pharnabazus, were worsted, losing twelve Men, and two Horses, till he with the Infantry coming in to their relief, the Barbarians retired with the loss of one Man, and Agésilas spending the greatest part of Summer in wasting Phrygia, marched back with his Army mightily enriched, & came back in Autumn unto Ephesus, where he took up his Winter quarters.

SECT. 3.

61. Whilst the Lacedæmonians thus acted in Aja against Artaxerxes, that they might strengthen their interest abroad, they sent to Nepherus the King of Egypt, which now for a good space had revolted from the Persian Empire, to procure him to joyn with them in the War, who sent them 100 Gallies, and 500000 measures of Wheat for a supplie. Pharax then with a Navie consisting of 120 Sail departing from Rhodes, sailed to Canus, where he set upon Conon, who there had forty Ships lying at anchor; but Artaphernes and Pharnabazus coming in to the relief of the Ships and Place with great Forces, he retired back to Rhodes, the Inhabitants of which not long after expelled his Fleet, and revolting to the Persians received Conon and his Navy. It hapned after this revolt, that those that brought the Corn from Egypt being ignorant of what had happened, thrust their Ships into the Haven, which Conon and the Rhodians seizing upon, thereby well furnished the City. Afterwards came in to Conon 90 Gallies more: 10 from Cilicia, & the rest out of Phœnicia, of which the petty King of Sidon had the charge. And here the soldiers of Conon mutinied for want of pay, who therefore more earnestly called for their Arrears, because their service was the stricter under so great a Captain.

62. Agésilas knowing that without Horse he could not well carry on the War, in Champaign places, in the Winter-time took order about it, permitting such rich men in the City as would not fight themselves, to furnish him with each of them an Horse and a Man in their stead. Then upon the approach of the Spring, drawing together all his Forces to Ephesus, he trained and exercised them in the management of Arms, that City serving them as the shop of War, during these Exercises. When he had thus prepared their minds, and encouraged them by rewards, and otherwise, he gave out he would march straight into the most fortified places of the Enemies Country, further to exercise them for the Fight. Tissaphernes thinking this rumor to be spread on purpose to deceive him, again marched into Caria, whither he thought indeed he meant to go; but Agésilas, as he said, invaded the Territories about Sardis, which waiting round about, on the fourth day his men stragling about for plunder, were set upon by the Enemies Horse, which slew many of them. He going in to their relief, understanding the Persians had no Foot there, and considering how he had all things in a readinesse, resolved to make something of it, so that falling on in good earnest, he got a considerable Victory near the River Pactolus, and plundering the enemies Camp, from what belonged to friend and foe, got booty worth above 70 talents, amongst which was Camels which he carried with him into Greece.

63. Tissaphernes at the time of this engagement (if we may believe Xenophon, who accompanied Agésilas in this Expedition, rather than Diodorus or Pausanias) was at Sardis, and upon that account was accused by the Persians to have forsaken and betrayed them. About this time it happened that Conon the Admiral of the Persian Fleet, having to no purpose for a long time solicited the King by letters, for money to pay his men, resolved now himself to go to him, Pharnabazus egging him on that he might accuse Tissaphernes of treachery. Leaving then his Fleet to the care of two Athenians, he came to Thapsacus in Syria, and passing down Euphrates unto Babylon, made application to Tibraustes, to whom hee signified that hee would speak with the King. But none being to be admitted to his presence, except he adored him, he transacted his business by letters and messengers, and prevailed to have Tissaphernes adjudged an enemy, the Lacedæmonians to be prosecuted with War, and to chuse whom he pleased for the paying of moneys; and with great gifts returned he to the Sea, having commission to charge the Phœnicians, Cyprians, and other maritime Inhabitants, with long ships, and having Pharnabazus for his associate, according to his desire, to provide a Navie for the defence of the Seas against the next Summer.

bore him mortal hatred in the behalf of her son Cyrus, that Artaxerxes made Tithraustes Captain General of the War in his stead, enjoying him to make him away, and granting letters to all the Cities and Lieutenants to be obedient to him. He gave him two letters at parting, whereof the one was written to Tissaphernes, being a pretended Commission to him to have full and absolute power in the War: the other to Ariam Lieutenant of Larissa, commanding him to assist Tithraustes in the apprehending of him. He delivered the letter as soon as he came to Colosse in Phrygia, whither Ariam procured Tissaphernes to come, as to advise together about the War, and as he was in the Bath having laid by his scimiter, caused his servants to take him, and sent him to Tithraustes, who carrying him as far as Celene cut off his head, which he conveyed to the King. He sent it to his Mother, who greatly rejoiced at the sight, with her also the Græcians women who had lost their sons or husbands through his fraud; and the whole Nation in the death of their mortal Enemy.

put to death.

65. Tithraustes now sent to Agésilas to acquaint how the incendiary betwixt the King and the Græcians was deservedly punished, so that his Master thought it reasonable that he would withdraw his Forces out of Asia, and the Greek Cities being left to their own laws, should pay their accustomed tribute to him. He denied to do any thing herein without consent of the Lacedæmonian State, whereupon they agreed that Tithraustes paying him thirty talents for the maintenance of his Army, he should depart into the parts subject to Pharnabazus, till such time as he understood the will of his Superiours. Then led he towards Phrygia, when in the way he met with an order come from Lacedæmon, whereby not onely the power at Land, but over the Navy also was given unto him, over which he might make Admiral whomsoever he pleased. He then to gratify the Cities and those who at home studied to pleasure him, made up a Navy of 120 ships, over which he set Pisander his wives brother, a man indeed greedy of honour, and of prompt boldness, but of little experience in such great concernments.

66. Tithraustes taking notice hereof, and how Agésilas did not intend to quit Asia, but rather conceived great hopes of overthrowing the King, resolved there was no way to be taken but to find his Countrymen such work at home, that they must necessarily recall him. To this purpose he sent one Timocrates a Rhodian into Greece, with gold to the value of 50 Talents, to the intent that he might therewith corrupt the leading and the principal men of the several Cities, and engage them into a War with the Athenians against Lacedæmon, which was accordingly brought about. Agésilas in the mean time entering Phrygia, which was subject to Pharnabazus, about Autumn, spoiled the Country, and by fair or foul means took many Cities. Thence marched he into Paphlagonia, which he withdrew from the obedience of the Persian, and received 1000 Horse and 2000 Foot from Corys the King, and after this he went to Dascylium, where Pharnabazus his Palace was, and there, it being a place plentiful of provisions, he took up his Winter-quarters.

67. Whilst his Soldiers straggled abroad for booty in great contempt of the Barbarians, Pharnabazus light on a Party of Horse, and thereof slew 100. Three or four dayes after Herippidas (the principal of the 30 Counsellors who accompanied Agésilas) having notice from Spithridates, that Pharnabazus lay incamped in a large Village named Cave, 20 miles off, procured of Agésilas 4000 Foot and as many Horse-men as he could persuade to accompany him, with which beginning his march as soon as it was dark, by break of day he fell in upon the Enemies Camp, killing most of the Myrians who kept the watch before it. Then the Persians fled; Pharnabazus fearing to be besieged, so that he wandred from place to place like the Scythian Nomades, and Herippidas got much rich plunder, amongst which the costly stuff of Pharnabazus, but seeking out too austerely all the concealed prey, he took from Spithridates and the Paphlagonians all that they had gotten; with which disgrace being exceedingly affected, they went away by night to Arius lying at Sardis, who had formerly rebelled and waged War with Cyrus against the King. most dear to him) *Agésilau*s was so troubled, as also at that of the Paphlagonian Forces, that nothing more vexed him of all things that fell out in this Isianick Expedition. SECT. 3.

68. Afterwards *Agésilau*s and Pharnabazus met together to treat about a Peace by the procurement of Apollonphanes of Cyzicus, who was guest unto them both. Pharnabazus professed that if he were not made General of the War he would revolt from the King; but if he should be, he would carry it on against the other with all his might, and to his utmost ability. *Agésilau*s on the other side promised he would speedily depart out of his Territories, and as long as any other remained to make War upon, would spare him and his estate. Upon the approaching of Spring, he led down his Forces into the Plains of Thebes, where pitching his Tents near the Temple of Diana Astryina, he levied all the Forces he could; for he intended an Expedition into the upper Countries, being confident to turn all in his passage from their obedience to the King, his fame being spread abroad far and near, having spent now two years in the War. But the gold sent into Greece the last year by Tisbraustes, had by this time so wrought upon the humours of the several States there, that they conspired together in a great and dangerous War against the Lacedemonians, who thereupon sent to *Agésilau*s, setting him a day by which he must needs be at home with his Army for the preservation of his Country. It troubled him much to leave Asia, for the conquest of which he was in so fair a way, yet he resolved to obey the call of his distressed Country, seeing (as he himself expressed in his answer to the Ephori) a General then truly and justly commandeth, when he obeyeth the Laws, and the Ephori or whatsoever Magistrates else are in the City. At his departure he is reported to have said, that the King expelled him Asia by 30000 Archers, wittily intimating the same number of Daricks stamped with the effigies of an archer, whereby he had procured the conspiracy of the Gracian Cities against Lacedamon. Plutarch in Agésilau, Artax. & Apotheg. Lacedemonicis. Xenoph. Hellen. lib. 4^o.

69. Having passed the Hellepont, and being come to Amphipolis, he received news of a Victory obtained by the Lacedemonians about Corinth, whereupon he dispatched Dercyllidas presently back into Asia, by these tidings to confirm the associated Cities. In the mean time while he marched through Macedonia and Thessalie towards the Straights of Thermopyla, Conon the Athenian and Pharnabazus, Admirals of the Persian Fleet, lay about Doryma a place in the Chersonesus, with about 90 Gallies, who having notice that the enemies Fleet were about Gnidus, prepared themselves for an engagement. Periarcbus (or Periander) the Lacedemonian Admiral weying anchor sailed from Gnidus with 120 ships to Physeus another place in the Chersonesus, and thence directed his course strait against the Kings Fleet, and at the first had the better of it, but the Persian Gallies coming in apace to the relief of their friends, the Lacedemonian confederates began to shift for themselves. The Admiral thought it unseemely and unworthy of the Spartan valour to run away, and therefore directed his ship to the front of the Enemy, where first killing many of his Enemies, at length he was slain. Then the followers of Conon pursuing the Lacedemonians to the continent, took 50 Vessels, and 500 men, the most part swimming to shore and saving themselves; & the rest of the Gallies with safety recovered Gnidus. By this victory of Conon (who made use of the Kings Forces for the recovery of the estate of his own country) Athens and all Greece which heretofore were under the Lacedemonian yoke, again recovered their liberty. Diodorus placeth it in the second year of the 96th Olympiad, when Diophantus was Archon at Athens; but Lycias in the year following, being under the government of Enbulides, and the eleventh of Artaxerxes. 70. Pharnabazus and Conon for the improvement of this Victory, laboured with the Islands and Maritime Towns of Ionia, to revolt from the Lacedemonians, which they effected, some casting out the Garrisons, and maintaining themselves in their antient liberty, others yielding unto Conon, onely Dercyllidas lying at Abydus at the time of the fight, retained that place, and Sestos over against it, still in hostility against the Persians, though endeavoured also to be reduced. In the next Spring the two Persian Generals invaded the Maritime parts of Laconia, which after they had wasted as they might, and now were about to return, Conon perswaded the other to let him have the Navy, with which he said he would sail to Athens, and there build up again the long walls, and the Piræus or Haven, than which he affirmed nothing could happen more disagreeable to the Lacedæmonians. This he easily obtained, and money also to rebuild the walls, for which sailing thither with 80 Gallies he took order; giving those 50 Talents which he had received of Pharnabazus unto the Athenians.

Antalcidas sent from the Spartans
to Artaxerxes.

The Lacedæmonians having notice of this, being very fearful the Athenian State should again recover it's ancient power, sent away Antalcidas to Teribazus another of the Persian Lieutenants who governed Sardis, if possible to draw him to their Party, and reconcile them to the King. After this was known at Athens, they also sent Conon and others to him, and with them joyned several other States, as the Bæotians, Corinthians, and Argives, who were weary of the power of the Spartans. Antalcidas declared how those that sent him were ready to imbrace a Peace upon such terms as the King pleased, for that they would no longer contend with him about the Greek Cities in Asia, thinking it sufficient, that the rest which were elsewhere situated might be left to their own Laws and liberty: he also laboured earnestly to render Conon suspected to the King, alleging, that at the King's cost he onely promoted the affairs of his own Country, seeking with his Forces to obtain as many Cities as he could for the Athenians, to whom under-hand he went about to restore Ionia and Æolia also. This offer concerning the leaving of the Greek Cities to the King's disposal, so nearly concerned his affairs, that the other Ambassadors in no case admitting it, for private respects returned home, without any thing concluded of; and though Teribazus durst not without commission joyn himself to the Lacedæmonians, yet gave he privately monies to Antalcidas to enable them to build a Fleet, wherewithall to constrain their adversaries to submit to an accommodation, and laying hold of Conon committed him to custody, till such time as going himself to the King he might know his pleasure concerning these things.

71. Some have reported how Conon was carryed to the King, and by him put to death, but others that he made an escape. Whilst Teribazus was yet with the King, he sent Struthas into Asia the lesse, to take care of the Sea-Coasts, who shewing himself very bitter against the Lacedæmonians for the evils which the Provinces had suffered of Agessilus, and favourable upon that account to the Athenians, the Spartans sent over Thymbro to make War upon him. He with 8000 men took Coreffus the high hill some five miles distant from Ephesus, whence he made excursions into the King's Dominions; but Struthas lying not far from him with a great power of Horse, besides Foot, at such time as with a Party he was ranging about for booty, fell upon him, killed him amongst many others, and putting the rest to flight, took many; the other securing themselves where they might best do it. The year after, the Lacedæmonians sending Ecdæus to the aid of the exiles of Rhodes with eight ships, dispatched away with him one Diphridas, with order to passe into Asia, there to gather up the remnant of the Forces, with which, and as many more as he could raise, he was to protect those Cities which had received Thymbro, and to grapple with Struthas. He acted accordingly, and so ordered his affairs, that he proved hard enough for Struthas, and amongst other commendable actions took prisoner Tigranes his Son in Law, as he was going with his wife to Sardis, whom releasing for a great ransome, he seasonably made use of the money for the payment of his Soldiers.

himself King of Salamine, and within a short time growing very rich gathered forces, and by the help of his son Protagoras subdued almost the whole Island. But the Amathusians with the Solians and Citians stood out against him, and by their Ambassadors solicited Artaxerxes for aid, accusing Evagoras for the death of Agyres, who had been confederate with the King, and offering him their help for the possessing himself of the whole Island. He being jealous of the growth of Evagoras, and considering how convenient this Island might be, by reason of its situation, for the promoting of his affairs at Sea, by which especially Asia could be defended, resolved to assist them, and dismissing the Ambassadors to their content, gave order to the Cities upon the Sea-Coasts to build ships with all speed, he himself travelling into the upper Provinces for the raising of a great Land Army.

73. Till he had composed matters with the Gracians, no considerable thing could he attempt upon Cyprus, and though they favoured the cause of Evagoras in opposition to him, yet their enmity one against another hindered that effect which their Union might have produced, to the great impairment of his affairs. The Athenians sent ten ships to the aid of Evagoras; but it hapning that Telemias being sent by the Lacedemonians at that time to succeed Eodius in the Fleet, and to defend their interest in Asia, met with them, and intercepted them all, whereby it hapned that those who were Enemies to Artaxerxes overthrew those who went to make War against him. After this these two Commonwealths contending fore with each other at Sea to their mutual damage, at length Antalcidas was sent by the Lacedemonians to the Government of the Fleet, because they knew him to be in great grace with Teribazus. He coming to Ephesus, left Nicolochus his Lieutenant, and according to his private instructions went with Teribazus to Artaxerxes about a peace, towards whom he so behaved himself (to please him casting off the Spartan gravity, and not refusing to dance before him) that the King, who before could not endure the Spartians, as counting them the most impudent of all men, imbraced him with singular respect and courtesie.

74. He concluded of a peace with him for the Lacedemonian State, in case the other Gracians would not consent to such overtures as the King made, and returned with Teribazus, who giving notice that all who would might accept of the conditions which his master proposed, they dispatched their several Deputies to him. He shewing them the Kings Seals, opened the Letters, wherein was contained, that Artaxerxes the King accounted it meet that the Cities in Asia, and the Islands Clazomenæ (since joyned to the Continent) and Cyprus, should be under his Dominion: as for the other Greek Cities, both great and small, that they should be left to their own liberty; except Lemnus, Imbrus, and Scyrus, which having been subject to the Athenians time out of mind, he thought it reasonable they should so continue. Those that should not receive this peace, he with the rest who would embrace it would prosecute with War to his utmost power, both at Sea and Land. The Ambassadors went home, and made report of what was proposed to the several Commonwealths, who grudged it much that the Cities of Asia, for whose liberty Agesilaus had taken so much pains, should be so unworthily again betrayed. But being necessitated to submit, they accepted of the conditions; and the peace was sworn to at length by all Greece, in the second year of the 96th Olympiad, and the 18th year of Artaxerxes. A. M. 3618.

75. Artaxerxes being thus freed from this tedious controversy with the Gracians, set himself to a preparation for the Wars of Cyprus, from which as yet he had been diverted. Evagoras by this time, through the assistance of Chabrias, whom the Athenians had sent to his aid with 800 Pelasts, and ten Gallies, had brought under the whole Island, having got together also a most numerous Army, whilst the King was kept in play by the Gracians. For he entred into society with Acoris King of Egypt, who furnished him with great store of money, and Hecatomnus the Viceroy of Caria under-hand supplied him with some for the hiring of forein Souldiers; and the King of Arabia with others, who bore no good will to Artaxerxes, sent a great power power of men. He had in a readinesse 90 Gallies, whereof twenty lay at Tyre in Phœnicia, which with other Cities he had got into his hands, and the rest anchored readily furnished before Cyprus. The King gathered together both his Land and Sea forces, the former consisting of 300000 men, and the later of 300 Gallies. Over his Land Army he appointed General Orontes his son-in-law, and Teribazus Admiral of his Navy, who taking up their forces out of Phœcia and Cuma, marched down into Cilicia, whence passing over into Cyprus with great industry they began the War.

Getteth a victory at Sea against Evagoras.

76. Evagoras having 6000 men of his own, many more Auxiliaries, and having hired a great force of strangers over and above, (money being very plentiful with him) first with his Pinnaces well Armed set upon the Enemies ships as they brought in provisions, whereof some he took, others he sunk, or chased away. Hereby it came to passe, that no Commodities being imported into the Island, a great dearth ensued in the Persian Camp; and hereby a mutiny of the Souldiers, especially of the mercenaries, who fell upon their Officers, and killed some of them. This put Glos the Admiral upon a resolution to sayl with the whole Fleet into Cilicia, whence he brought sufficient supply; which Evagoras seeing, and considering his Navy to be far inferiour to the Persian, he got ready other sixty ships, and procuring fifty more from Acoris (who readily furnished him with all things necessary for the War) he made up his Fleet 200 sayl. Then exercised he his men often to prepare them for a fight, and that to the terror of the Enemy who beheld it, and at length as the Persian Fleet sayled by Citium he fell upon it, taking some Vessels, and sinking others, but the Admiral and other Commanders standing close to their tackling, a sharp conflict ensued, in which though Evagoras at the first prevailed, yet Glos with all his power, and with great earnestnesse and valour grappling with him, he was at length after great losse put to flight.

77. The Persians after this victory mustered all their forces, both by Sea and Land at Citium, and presently both wayes laid siege to Salamine. Now Evagoras, though he had had the better of it formerly in some sallies out upon the besiegers, cooled in his courage after this defeat. Though the siege was very straight and pressing, yet resolving to continue the War, he left his son Pythagoras for the defence of the Citie, with full Authority, and departed by night with ten Gallies into Egypt, where he laboured hard with Acoris the King, to perswade him to carry on the War with him, and that with all his power. He granted him some money; but for that he was discouraged by the late defeat, nothing according to his expectation, so that returning, and finding the Citie very much straightned, and himself destitute of succour, he was forced to send about an accommodation: Teribazus offered his consent upon these terms, that quitting all the Cities except Salamine, he should for that pay a yearly Tribute to the King, and be at his command as a servant to his Lord; which though hard, he consented to, except the last, thinking it a great disgrace to be at his back as a servant, and more reasonable to be subject to him as one King to another.

His Captains disagree, and peace is made.

78. Teribazus not admitting of this exception, Orontes his colleague, and emulator, accused him by secret Letters to the King, as well for other matters, as that having an opportunity sufficient to take Salamine, he did not use it, but spent his time in treaties with the Enemy; he farther laid to his charge privately entring into friendship with Lacedemon sending to consult the Oracle about warring against the King, and especially alluring the Officers by honours, gifts, and promises. Artaxerxes believing these things, wrote back to Orontes to arrest Teribazus, and send him presently unto him, who accordingly sent, earnestly desired to be brought to his tryal, but being for the present committed to prison, and the King employed in the Cadusian War, his judgement was still delayed. In the mean time Orontes being now General with full power and authority in Cyprus, finding that Evagoras with great courage still held out, and that his own Souldiers taking ill the imprisonment of Teribazus refused to obey him, sent to Evagoras to treat of peace, offering offering him the same conditions he was formerly willing to admit of from Teribazus. He being thus delivered beyond hope, concluded a peace on these terms; to pay yearly Tribute for the Kingdom of Salamine, and as King, to be obedient to the King of Persia. And thus the Cyprian War ended ten years after the first preparation for it, and after it had been managed 2 years. Artaxerxes after all this time, and the expence of 50 Talents, leaving Evagoras in effect, in the same condition he was before.

79. Gaus the Persian Admiral, after this War, having married the daughter of Teribazus, fearing, lest because of his affinity, he should be suspected also by the King, and suffer upon that account, resolved for a prevention to fortifie himself against him by entring into league with his Enemies. This he did presently with Acoris of Egypt, and wrote to the Lacedemonians to excite them to break the peace, making large offers of what he could do for Greece. They had of late as before cast in their heads how to make themselves masters of all Greece, and finding that they heard ill for the peace concluded with Artaxerxes, in which the interests of their Countrey-men were betrayed, they sought for, upon a new advice, a fit opportunity to renew the War against the Persians, and therefore now not unwillingly accepted of this confederacy with Gaus.

Gaus out of fear conspireth with the Lacedemonians against the King.

80. At this time Artaxerxes made War upon the Cadusians, leading against them an Army of 300000 foot, and 10000 horse. He cast himself into great Straights marching into a Countrey uneven, rainy, and bringing no Corn, but nourishing onely its inhabitants with Pears, Apples, and such like fruits; so that finding there no provision, and not able to come by it from elsewhere, the carriage beasts were killed for meat, an Asses head could scarce be bought for 60 drachms, the Kings ser meals were laid down, and very few horses remained; the rest being all eaten up. Then Teribazus under disgrace saved the King and his whole Army; for there being two Kings of the Cadusians, he himself went to one of them, and sent his son to the other, each of them signifying to him whom he went to, that his Colleague had sent about a peace to Artaxerxes, having left him out, wherefore his advise was, that they should send with him Ambassadors to treat, and conclude a pacification first, which, being both deceived, they did, and a League was entered into by both apart. Then returned he homewards, and in the way, to give a good example to others, alighted from his horse, and with Quiver and Target upon him travelled on foot over the mountainous, and rough places, and coming at length to a place called the Kings Inne, compassed with pleasant Gardens and Groves, because of the extremity of cold, he gave leave to the Souldiers to cut down the Cypresses and other Trees, which because they out of modesty refused, he took an Axe, and himself cut down the most beautifull. But coming home, and upon sence of his great losse, both of men and horses, suspecting he was contemned for his ill successe, he slew many of his principal subjects, of whom he thought he had cause to be jealous.

Artaxerxes invadeth the Cadusians to no purpose.

81. The Cadusian War being finished, he caused Teribazus to come to his tryal, commending the matter to three of his most eminent Judges, who upon consideration of what was alleged, pro and con, and of his former great merits, absolved him, to the satisfaction of the King, who then bestowing on him the greatest honours, expunged the name of Orontes his false accuser out of the Catalogue of his friends, and cast upon him the greatest ignominy. About the same time, following herein the example of Cambyfes his Predecessor, he caused certain Judges convicted of unjust Decrees to be slead alive, and their skins spread over the judgement seat, where the rest heard, and determined causes, that they might have a constant Memento before their eyes.

Not long after Gaus the Persian Admiral, who, as before was said, had entred into society with the Lacedemonians, and the King of Egypt, whilest he was managing his revolt, was slain by some that cunningly laid in wait for him. One Tachos undertook the carrying on of his design, and fortifying himself with an Army, built a Citie in an high Rock upon the Sea, called Lenca,

82. Acoris the King of Egypt, who of late had entred into society with Gaus, and before had given assistance to Evagoras against Artaxerxes, as one who had claim unto his Kingdom, to strengthen himself raised a great Army of Strangers, and for that he gave very good pay, and sought otherwayes to deserve well of Military men, many Gracians gave their names and listed themselves in his service. But wanting still some famous and expert General, he procured Chabrias the Athenian, a man of great command and no lesse valour; though without the consent of the people. Artaxerxes made Pharnabazus (now of late his Son in Law) the General of his Forces, who furnished with money made great preparations for the War, and sent to Athens to complain of Chabrias, who as he said, by his service to the Egyptian, alienured the Kings affection from that State; and desired that they would send Iphicrates to be a Captain in his Wars. The Athenians being desirous to have both the King and Pharnabazus their friend, presently recalled Chabrias, and gave order to Iphicrates to assist the Persians.

83. Pharnabazus spent several years in preparation for the War, of which Iphicrates being weary, told him he wondred, that he being so quick in speaking should be so slow in doing, to which he answered, that the reason was, that he himself was master of his words, but the King of his actions. The Gracians were again fallen into civil dissentions, the former Peace being not long continued through the ambitious practices of the Lacedemonians; which Artaxerxes considering, and how needful their help was to him in this Egyptian Expedition, he sent to them to mediate and take up their differences, which they all liked well and accepted, except the Thebans. At length after three or four years spent in preparation, the King's Forces were drawn down into Ace a Town of Syria, where being a general Muster, three were found 200000 Barbarians, under the command of Pharnabazus, and 20000 Greeks under the Ensigns of Iphicrates: the Navy amounted to the number of 300 Gallies, besides a great number of Vessels of burthen. In the beginning then of Summer they marched for Egypt; the Fleet sailing along the Coasts, and coming near the mouths of Nile, found the Egyptians furnished sufficiently for a War; warning enough having been given them by the delay of Pharnabazus, who (as other Persian Generals) having not the full disposal of things in his power, was constrained to send to the King, to know his pleasure concerning particulars, whose answer not being quickly obtained at a great distance, procured much slownesse in all Expeditions.

84. Nectanebis the King of Egypt (for Acoris was now dead) sent to spie out the number of the Persian Army; but his chieftest hope was in the strength of the Country, which was mightily fortified against any invasion, by the seven mouths of Nile, whereof each strengthened with a Castel, and a wodden bridge to hinder the passage of any ships up the River. But especially he took care of Pelusium the readiest passage from Syria, stopping up such places as might be passed by water, and drowning such as gave access by Land. Pharnabazus his Officers finding Pelusium so strongly fortified, resolved there was no passing there, and to carry the Fleet up to the Mendesian mouth of the River, where landing 3000 men, Pharnabazus and Iphicrates set upon the Castle. The Egyptians brought in 3000 Horse and Foot to the relief of it, and thereby ensued a most sharp encounter; but being at length overpowered by the number of Persians which coming in continually to the fight, fight, encompassed them; a great slaughter was made of them, and many taken alive. The rest betaking themselves to the Fort, Iphicrates his men brake in with them, took it, and razing it, carried the Defendants away prisoners.

85. Iphicrates now understood by these Prisoners, that the Garrison was called out of Memphis the strongest City in Aegypt; whereupon he advised Pharnabazus with all speed to sail thither, before the Aegyptians should have time to unite their Forces. Pharnabazus answered, he would first stay till all his Army arrived, by the which the taking of Memphis would be more easie; but the other replied, that if he would but let him have all the Mercenaries onely in the Army, he would promise to reduce the City. Pharnabazus hereupon grew jealous of his valour, and fearing he might thereby, from his skill and courage bring Aegypt into subjection, denied him what he required; to which refusal he opposed this solemn protestation, that if the Persians should let slip out of their hands this fair opportunity, this Expedition through their fault would prove successlesse. Nothing being procured hereby but hatred and ill words, the Aegyptians by the means of this delay re-inforced the Garrison of Memphis, and with all their Forces came to the Fort which the Persians had demolished; when dividing their men into several parties, they set upon the Enemy, and prevailed so much upon him, that making great slaughters, the Persian Generals, having spent much time about the Place, and now the Nile swelling, and beginning to overflow off the grounds about them; lest they should seem to strive with Nature it self, resolved to retreat out of the Country: And this was the fruit of so long a preparation, and so much expence.

86. Being returned into Asia, the differences betwixt them brake out afresh, insomuch that Iphicrates fearing lest he might be attached as Conon formerly had been, withdrew himself by night, and returned to Athens. Thither Pharnabazus sent after him, to accuse him as guilty of the miscarriage of the Expedition, to which the Athenians answered, that if they found him guilty, they would punish him; but within a while they gave him the command of their Fleet. This year Nicocles the Eunuch slew Evagoras the King of Salamine, and seized on the Kingdom, according to Diodorus, who in no case is to be believed, as to the Author of the Paricide; for though it be confirmed by one (a) that he was killed by an Eunuch; yet it appeareth from another, that his name was Thrasydans; seeing it is clear from Isocrates, that Nicocles (to whom he wrote one Oration; another concerning the Office of a King, he stiled by his name; and made a Funeral one concerning Evagoras) was the very son of Evagoras, and succeeded him in the Kingdom, and is not to be reckoned amongst Eunuchs.

87. The next year, Artaxerxes understanding how Greece was shaken with intestine broiles, which he still looked upon as by it's help to recover Aegypt, sent to compose the differences amongst the several States. They all assented to his offers, except the Thebans, who having a design to be Masters of all Boeotia, would not enter with the rest into the League, which the Lacedamonians ill resenting, and suspecting their ambitious practices for the dominion of all Greece, invaded them as the publick Enemies. Hereupon ensued a great and bloody battel at Leuctra, in which the Thebans had the better, through the conduct of Epaminondas, who so abated the strength of the Spartans, that they sent Agesslaus their King into Aegypt, and Antalcidas to Artaxerxes, to desire a supply of money. But the King, either because they sought to his Rebels the Aegyptians, or upon some other account, slighted the Message, and rejected Antalcidas, insomuch that returning home, when he found that he was laughed at by his Enemies, and fearing the severity of the Ephori, he starved himself to death.

daemonians to meet at Delphos; but the controversy resting about Messene, and the Thebans refusing to consent that it should be under the Lacedamonians, the Treatie had again the same successe: which so offended Philiscus, that he left 2000 Soldiers he had hired to the Lacedamonians, and returned into Asia. The Thebans not long after having a design to bring all Greece into subjection, and knowing their endeavours to be vain, except they made Artaxerxes their friend, or at least induced him to stand neuter, resolved to send Ambassadors to him. Calling together then their associates, they pretended the thing to be necessary, because Euthycles the Lacedamonian was already there, and dispatched away Pelopidas from themselves, Antiochus from the Arcadians, Archidamus for the Eleans, and another for the Argives, which being known at Athens, they also sent Timagoras and Leon from their State.

89. Pelopidas found the most favour at the King's hands, pleading (and not falsely) that the Thebans had onely assisted the Persians at Plataea, and since that had never fought against that Kingdom; and that for this onely cause were they invaded by the Lacedamonians, because they refused to follow Agésilas against the King, having also prohibited him to sacrifice at Aulis, where Agamemnon sacrificed when he passed into Asia and took Troy. The late Victory of the Thebans at Leuctra, and the invasion of the Lacedamonian Territories, did not a little add to the esteem of Pelopidas, who to inhance the renown of his Country, stuck not also to aver, that the reason why the Argives and Arcadians had of late been overthrown by the Lacedamonians, was, because the Thebans were not at the battel. He obtained of the King, that Messene being exempted from the jurisdiction of the Lacedamonians, should be left to it's own liberty, and that the Athenians should withdraw their ships, or else War was to be made upon them, which being read to the publick Ministers of the other Republicks, Leon the Athenian openly said, that the Athenians must find out another friend besides the King, who replied, that if they knew any more equal thing, they should acquaint him therewith.

90. With Pelopidas was joyned in Commission Ismenias the Theban, as we have it from Plutarch. He being brought by Tithraustes a Colonel into the King's presence, and commanded, according to the custom, to adore him, took off his Ring secretly from his finger, and cast it down at his feet, and then stooping down to take it up, as he thereby satisfied the King, and obtained his request; so he thought he provided sufficiently for the credit of himself and Country. Timagoras the Athenian communicated by letter some secrets to Artaxerxes, for which he was rewarded with 1000 Daricks, a costly Supper, and 80 Cows to find him with milk for his health; with a costly Bed and furniture to it, and some Persians that knew how to make it, the Greeks being accounted ignorant in these things. But returning home with the rest of the Ambassadors he was put to death; either because he accepted of these gifts, as Plutarch believed; or for that he adored the King after the Persian manner, wherewith they counted their whole State to be reflected on, or (what is most likely) because of this intercourse betwixt him and Artaxerxes they questioned his fidelity; his Colleague moreover impeaching him at their return for refusing his company, and imparting all the secret of their negotiation to Pelopidas.

91. After the return of the Ambassadors, the Thebans sent for the Deputies of the several Cities, whom, when the letters from the King were read, they commanded, all that would be accounted his and their friends, to swear to the contents of them. The Deputies answered, their Commissions were to hear, and not to take any Oath, which if they would exact from the Cities, they must send to them. This they did, hoping that the particular States would not dare to refuse the society of the King and them; but the Messengers first coming to Corinth, and that City refusing to swear, the rest followed their example, and so this device of the Thebans came to nothing. Then fell the Graecians into great broyls again, making havock of the Territories, stories, and goods of one another, which Artaxerxes still looking upon as against his design for the recovery of Egypt, sent once more and procured a Peace betwixt them, whereby the Laconick, or Ætolian War (as it was called) ended, after it had endured about five years from the first beginning, in the 39th year of Artaxerxes. SECT. 32

Diodorus ad
ann. 3.

92. This Peace yet effected nothing on his behalf, the interests of the several States being at this time so contrary, that they presently after broke out afresh into civil Wars; and what Forces could be spared out of Greece, being not employed for, but against him. For, three or four years after, the maritime parts of Asia revolted from him, and Tachos now King of Egypt made great provision for the War, both by Land and Sea; and hiring many Soldiers out of several Republicks in Greece, drew also to his party the Lacedæmonians, who had conceived displeasure against Artaxerxes, because he made Messene to be comprehended in the general Peace. At the same time had he then to deal with the Egyptians, the Greek Cities in Asia, and the Lacedæmonians; and besides them several of his Lieutenants in Asia revolted; amongst whom were Ariobarzanes of Phrygia (who had lately seized upon that Country after the death of Mithridates) Mausolus of Caria, a powerful Prince, having many strong places, especially Halicarnassus, in his power; with whom joyned Orontes of Mysia, Antiochus of Lidia, and of the Ionian race, the Lycians, Pisidians, Pamphylians, Cilicians: and besides these the Syrians, Phœnicians, and almost all that bounded upon the Sea. The General command over all was given to Orontes. By this so general a defection, half of the Tributes were withdrawn from the King; and the other half sufficed not for warlike preparations.

93. But Orontes having got the chief command, and therewith received a years pay for 20000 men, betrayed those that had entrusted him with so great a power. For promising himself no small matters from the King, he first sent up to him those that brought him the money, and then betrayed many Towns, and a Band of Mercenaries to those who were sent from him for that purpose. At the same time things went in the same course in Cappadocia, accompanied with some memorable circumstances. Artabazus the King's General invaded that Country with an numerous Army, and Datames the Governour thereof, who had revolted, meeting him with a great Party of Horse, and 20000 Foot, pitched his Tents against him. The Captain of Datames his Horse was his Father in Law, who to ingratiate himself with the King, and to provide for his own safety, having first agreed with Artabazus, by night passed over with all his Troops unto him. But Datames not at all discouraged hereby, exhorted his Mercenaries to constancy, and promising them a large donative, presently led them against the Revolters, whom he fell upon just as they were joyning with the Enemy, and with great violence made great slaughter of both. Artabazus being ignorant of the matter, suspected that the Revolters went about again to betray him, and return to Datames, and therefore gave order to his Souldiers to fall upon the Horse approaching; whence Mithrobarzanes (for so was the Revolter called) being shut up in the midst, whilst one part laboured to repel the Traitor, and the other to be revenged upon him for his treachery, was reduced into great straits, and out of extreme despair made great slaughter on both sides, till at length having lost 10000 men, the rest were put to flight by Datames, to whom some returned and asked pardon; others betook themselves to a place, whence being not able to stir they were killed, to the number of 500 men.

94. Whilst these things were thus carried on, Rheomithres was sent into Egypt to Tachos for aid, from whom obtaining 500 Talents, and 50 Gallies, he returned to Leuca, a Citie in Asia, where sending for many of the Officers of the revolters he laid hands on them all, and sent them up to the King, by which Treachery he reconciled himself unto him. Tachos by this time had prepared all things for the War, having obtained out of Greece 200 Gallies, 10000 most valiant Souldiers, and out of Egypt it self raised 80000 foot.

Agefilau the King of Lacedæmon he also procured to come to him, promising him the command of all his forces. Upon the report of his landing, all sorts of presents were dispatched to him; but the Courtiers finding no Train, nor any thing of State about him, onely an old man, little of stature, not at all trimmed, but with coarse and old Clothes, sitting on the shore upon the grasse, they greatly despised him, and were seized with wonder at his poornesse of spirit, when they beheld how amongst the presents, taking the Meal, Calves, and Geese to himself, he gave the sweet Meats and Oyntments to be divided amongst the slaves. And Tachos himself gave him not the chief command according to his promise, deriding him for the smallnesse of his stature, and saying, that the fable was fulfilled in him, the Mountains are in Travel, and a Mouse is brought forth; to which with anger and scorn he answered, that afterwards he should have cause to think him a Lion.

95. With Tachos also was Chabrias the Arbenian, though not sent from the State as was Agefilau, but on his own account, who advised him wanting Treasure, to command his richest sort of subjects to furnish him with as much money as they could spare, and he would repay them out of his yearly Tributes, which course he following got great store of money, and yet injured no man. To him he committed his Fleet, to Agefilau the conduct of the 10000 mercenary Gracians, to Nectanebus his son (or rather the son of his brother, or sister, being called his Nephew;) reserving to himself the command over all; and though Agefilau advised him rather to manage the War by his Lieutenants, and stay in Egypt, he sayled into Phœnicia, the Spartan following him, though against his dignity and disposition. Coming into Phœnicia, he sent Nectanebus against the Cities in Syria, to whom came a message from the Viceroy of Egypt left there by Tachos, signifying that he had revolted, and now invited him to seize upon the Kingdom; to which he consenting, drew presently to his party, all the Officers by gifts, and the Soldiers by large promises. Tachos now being in fear of his own servants, and Agefilau whom he derided, betook himself to Sidon, and thence to Artaxerxes, by whom he was courteously entertained, though not declared General in the Egyptian War, (and so by the help of Agefilau recovered his Kingdom) as Diodorus writeth.

Agefilau having served him, in his return dieth.

96. Another King besides these two was made by the Egyptians of Mendesium, of whom 10000 arose, and for him made War upon Nectanebus. The case being thus, Agefilau took part with Nectanebus, whom he thought more to favour the Gracians, took the other prisoner, and confirmed him in the Kingdom, who importuning him to stay and winter with him, he refused, hasting homewards, for that he knew the Lacedæmonian State to be at this time engaged in a War, destitute of Treasure, and yet to keep strangers in constant pay for want of their own men. Nectanebus when he would not stay, dismissed him with great gifts and honours, giving him 220. or 230 Talents for the maintenance of the War at home, with which taking ship, he sayled homewards, though in the midst of Winter; making haste, lest through his absence the State should do nothing the next Summer; but being carried by Tempest into a desert place, called the Haven of Menelaus, lying betwixt Cyrene and Egypt, he there fell sick and died. His friends laying his Corps in Wax, for want of Honey, carried it to Lacedæmon, where it was buried according to his worth, and dignity.

97. About the time of his death died also Artaxerxes the King of Persia, after he had reigned 43 years. He had 115 sons, of which three onely were legitimate; Darius, Ariaspes, and Ochus, the rest being begotten of Concubines, of which he kept 360. with which yet he could not be contented without the addition of Atossa his own daughter, his own mother to please him becoming a Bawd to his incestuous affections. When he was grown old, perceiving his sons to strive about the succession, and especially Ochus (who although the yungest, hoped by the means of Atossa to procure the Kingdom of him) fearing lest after his death he might do as his Uncle Cyrus had formerly done; contrary to the custom of Persia, which admitted not of two Kings at the same time, he made Darius the eldest, now 50 years old King, whilst he lived, lest his death should involve the Empire in civil broils. It was the fashion for him that was made King, to ask, and receive something at the hands of him that made him, according to which Darius asked Aspasia to wife, which formerly having been Concubine to Cyrus, Artaxerxes took, and afterwards married. He out of indulgence to him first granted his request, for that she being a free woman, and no slave, might chuse whether she would have him, and hoping she would refuse; but she willingly accepting of the thing, and he then repenting of what he had rashly promised, consecrated her as a Nun to Diana, that she might live for the remainder of her dayes a single life. Darius hereby incensed, through the provocation of Tiribazus, (who bore Artaxerxes malice for defrauding him of his daughter Amistis, whom he promised to him, but married her himself) entred with 50 of his brethren into a conspiracy against the life of his father, and the plot being revealed by an Eunuch, was put to death with his complices.

Is put to death.

Ochus his wicked practices for the Kingdom.

Darius being removed out of the way, Ochus was more inflamed with a desire of reigning, to which he was more incensed by Atossa his sister. But he feared two of his brothers; Ariaspes legitimate, and the elder, and one Arfames, who though base born, and the younger, yet was much esteemed for his wisdom, and especially beloved by his father. Both of them he resolved to destroy; the former by his cunning, and the later by down-right cruelty; for he hired some who never ceased to tell Ariaspes, as a great secret, that his father was resolved to make him away by a cruel, and shamefull death, and so often inculcating it unto him as speedily to be done, drove him to that fear and desperation that he poisoned himself. Artaxerxes mourned for him, but knowing the kind of his death, and suspecting the cause, yet through extreme age was unable to search into the matter and find it out: onely he embraced Arfames more affectionately than ever, and not obscurely signified that he onely could trust, and rely upon him. Ochus judging then that no delay was to be used, procured Harpagus the son of Tiribazus (who fell in the treason of Darius) to murder him. Artaxerxes was already so spent with age that he seemed to want but the least furtherance to his death, so that word being brought him of the death of Arfames, he was not able to bear it, but died heart-broken with sorrow, after he had lived 94 years, in the 43th of his reign; in the third of the 104 Olympiad. A. M. 3644. about 360 before the birth of Christ. He was esteemed mild and loving towards his subjects, which opinion was mightily confirmed by the cruelty and parricide of his successor.

SECT. IV.

From the death of Artaxerxes Mnemon, and the beginning of Ochus, to the death of Darius Codomannus, containing the space of 32 years.

1. Ochus succeeded his father, after whom he was also named Artaxerxes, and whose name the Persians put upon his Successors for a memorial of his mild and prosperous Government. Some think him by the Persians to have been called Ochosueros, or Achosueros; and that he is to be taken for that Achesuerus, or Ahasuerus the husband of Esther, mentioned in Scripture, who by the seventy, and Josephus after them, is named Artaxerxes. Some have thought Cambyses to have been the man, but he reigned onely seven years, whereas above twelve are given to Ahasuerus. Neither could Darius the son of Hystaspes be he, if the Jews with others rightly accounted the book of Esther to have been the last in order of all the Canonical Scripture of the Old Testament, and for that Vahsi his wife is thought to be Atossa, the daughter of Cyrus, it cannot be, because he never put put away Aioffa, on whom he begat Xerxes. And although some plead hard for Xerxes, because his wife is called by Herodotus, Amestris, which they take in the Persian tongue to be onely Ham-Esther; yet 'tis apparent out of the same Author, that she was the daughter of Otanes a Persian Satrapa, by Religion an Heathen, and of a most cruel disposition. Besides, Ahasuerus in the seventh year of his reign was at Sushan; but Xerxes in the seventh of his reign was absent in the War with Greece, and though the Greeks corrupted forein names, and might call Xerxes him, whom the Persians named Artachashta, or Artachasta, yet not one in his own language called Achosch-verosch. Neither is it probable that Longimanus could be the man, who is both in sacred, and prophane story called Artachashta and Artaxerxes; but no where Ahasuerus. The same may be said of Nothus, who both by Nehemiah and Greek writers is called Darius, and of Artaxerxes Mnemon, concerning whose wife Staira, such things are written as can neither agree with Vashti nor Esther. Now if that of Esther be the last Canonical book; and Nehemiah lived to the time of Darius Nothus, then is it probable, that Esther lived in the reign of his son, or Grand-son, and cannot so conveniently be assigned for a wife to any as to Ochus.

2. Ochus knowing of how great Authority his fathers name was to his subjects, and how contemptible he should be after his death was known, procured of the Eunuchs, Chamberlains and Colonels to conceal it for ten moneths, and in the mean time sending about the Royal Seal commanded in his fathers name, to proclaim Ochus King. When all owned, and obeyed him as King, he then confessed his fathers death, and commanded a general mourning, according to the custom of Persia, and presently took away all Competition, filled (a) the Court with the blood of his kindred, and relations, no regard being had, either to Sex or Age. Amongst the rest he put to death his (b) sister Ocha, being also his mother-in-law, with cruel torments, and his Uncle with his two sons and Nephews, he caused to be set in an empty place, and killed with Darts, who seemeth well to have been father to Sisigambis (mother to Darius the last Persian King) whose 80 brethren together with their father Curtius reporteth to have been murdered by Ochus.

Artabazus revolteth from him.

3. From Ochus revolted Artabazus, against whom were sent some of the Persian Satrapas with 70000 men, and yet by the help of Chares the Athenian he overthrew them, and rewarded Chares with a great summe of money, which he laid out in the paying of his Souldiers. Ochus knowing of this, expostulated seriously with the Athenians about it, who hearing that he intended with 300 ships to assist their Enemies (with whom they were now engaged in the social War) presently clap't up a peace with them. Artabazus being forsaken of the Athenians, betook himself to the Thebans, who ordered Pammenes with 500 men to passe over into Asia to assist him; by whose help Artabazus again overthrew the King's forces sent against him in two great and bloody battels, which got no small credit to Pammenes, and his Bæotians. Yet a few years after, when the Thebans were engaged in the Phocian War, and reduced to extremity for want of money, they sent to Artaxerxes Ochus, and obtained of him 300 Talents, which he did as it seemeth to put an obligation upon them to assist him in the War, which he renewed against the Egyptians.

He invaderth Phœnicia.

4. Although Egypt had long before this revolted from the Persian Empire, yet Ochus not at all affecting War kept himself quiet; for, having sent some Armies thither, by the treachery, or ignorance of their Captains, they miscarried, so that having several times badly sped, though despised on that account by the Egyptians, yet being a lover of his ease and quiet he submitted to the disgrace. But now at this time (about the eleventh year of his reign) the Phœnicians and Cyprians taking heart, and rebelling also, he resolved to chastise them all with Arms, and that in his own person; and making great provision of all things for the War, raised 300000 foot, 30000 horse, and 300 Gallies, besides Vessels of burthen. The first Tempest of the War fell upon Phœnicia, which revolted upon this occasion. A famous Citie there there was therein named Tripolis, consisting, according to it's name, of three Cities distant a furlong from each other, and inhabited by Lyrans, Sidonians, and Arcadians, in which the assembly General of the Phœnicians met and resolved of their most important affairs. Herein the Persian Satrapæ and Ambassadors, behaving themselves very uncivilly, and abusing the Sidonians, they thereupon resolved to rebel, and persuading the other Phœnicians to side with them for the obtaining of their liberty, sent to Nectanebus King of Egypt to desire him to receive them into confederacy against Ochus. Then to begin their hostility they cut down the Paradise wherein the Kings of Persia, when they came that way, used to divert themselves; burnt the Hay which the Satrapæ had gathered for use in War, and punished such Officers as by whom they had been abused.

5. Ochus having notice of this, longed to be revenged of all the Phœnicians, but especially on them of Sidon; and gathering his Forces together at Babylon, set out thence against them. In the mean time whilst he was on his way, the President of Syria and Mazæus Governour of Cilicia, with joyned Forces set upon the Phœnicians; but Tennes King of Sidon, having received out of Egypt a supply of 4000 Gracians, over which Mentor the Rhodian was General, with them and his Citizens together, fell upon the Satrapæ, worsted, and expelled them out of Phœnicia. Whilst things were thus carried there; another War arose to the Persians out of Cyprus, wherein were nine Cities of good account, having the lesser Towns in their subjection, and each of them a King; but all Subjects to the Persian, all which now, imitating the Phœnicians, revolted. Ochus receiving tidings hereof, wrote to Adriens Prince of Caria (who being newly come to the Government, was by the tenure of his Principality a friend and associate in war to the Persian Empire) to provide Forces both for Sea and Land against them, who accordingly with great expedition making ready 40 Gallies and 8000 Mercenaries, sent them into Cyprus, under the conduct of Phocion, the Athenian, and Evagoras, who heretofore had held the Island as King. These two finding their men, laid close siege to Salamine both by Land and Sea, and the Island having been quiet of late, and for that reason abounding with riches, great numbers flocked out of desire of plunder from Syria and Cilicia, insomuch that the number of the besiegers was doubled. Hereupon all the other Cities submitted themselves; onely Protagoras held out still, and Evagoras thought by force to re-invest himself of that Kingdom, devolved upon him from his Ancestors: But at length Protagoras also submitting, obtained Salamine still; and Evagoras contented himself with a larger Dominion given him in Asia, which ill governing, he fled again into Cyprus, and there taken was put to death.

Rhodian offer-eth to betray Sidon to him.

6. The King was on his march towards Phœnicia, when Mentor the Rhodian understanding what strength he had, and how unable the Rebels were to make resistance, sent one to him privately, offering to betray Sidon into his hands, and to do him especial service in the conquest of Egypt, being very well skilled in that Country and the River. Ochus not onely promised him indemnity, but a large reward, if he would perform what he promised, and placing his greatest felicity in the recovery of Egypt, sent to the chieftest of the Gracian States, to desire aid. The Athenians and Lacedæmonians signified their desire to retain amity and a good correspondence with him, but at present could yield him no assistance; but the Thebans sent him 1000 men, the Argives 3000, and the Greeks in Asia willing to shew their readinesse, furnished him with 6000. Before their arrival the King was got into Phœnicia, and sat down not far from Sidon, which the Inhabitants had by this time strongly manned within, and fortified with a threefold large ditch, and high walls, besides a Fleet of 100 Gallies. For they exceeded by far all their neighbours in riches.

7. But Tennes their King had associated himself with Mentor to betray the City, whom leaving therein with command of a part thereof for the better carrying on of the treachery, he himself with 500 Soldiers went out, pretending to go to the publick convention of the Phœnicians, having with him 100 of the prime Citizens as his Counselors. These he brought straight to Ochus, who put them all to death as authors of the rebellion, and after them 500 more, who came as Suppliants with Olives in their hands, after he had understood from Tennes that the City should be surrendered to him without any conditions, thereby to strike a terror into the other Towns. After this, Tennes easily prevailed with the mercenary Egyptians to let him and the King into the Town, which being done, and Ochus having it in his power, judging him now to be of no use to him, he commanded him also to be slain. The Sidonians before the King approached had burnt all their ships, lest any private person should convey himself away during the Siege. Now seeing themselves betrayed, and their City full of the Enemy which swarmed on every side, they set fire on their houses, and therein burnt themselves with their wives and children, so that (accounting slaves) above 40000 are thought to have perished in the flames. The King sold the rubbish thereof for many talents, much gold and silver being found therein, because it had flourished with great riches. By this Tragedy of Sidon the other Cities being terrified, yielded themselves unto the Persian.

8. The (a) Auxiliaries out of Greece being come to Ochus after the taking of Sidon, he set forward with his whole Army towards Egypt, (b) taking Jericho a City of Judea (as is probable) in his way, and drawing many Jews along with him in his Expedition. Coming (c) to the Lake Sirbonis, he lost part of his Army in the Whirl-pits and Bogs, through ignorance of the place, and at length arrived at Pelusium the first frontier-town, which was held with a Garrison of 1000 men. Now the King divided the Gracian Forces into three bodies, and over each constituted a Captain of their own Nation, and joyned a Persian with him: the other Forces he kept in his own Command, being greatly intent about the main business. On the other side Nectanebus was not a whit discouraged, having in pay 20000 Gracians, and as many Africans, besides 60000 of his own Egyptians, and an innumerable Company of boats for the River. But by his conceitedness and want of skill he miscarried, having formerly prospered whilst he used the conduct of the Gracian Captains, but now his Fortune changing upon his sole managing the War, for which he thought himself sufficiently able. After then he had fortified his Garrisons, with 30000 Egyptians, 5000 Greeks, and half of the Africans, he seized upon such places, as were most advantageous for passage into the Country.

Ochus invaded Egypt.

9. Things standing thus betwixt them, Nicostratus the Captain of the Argives getting some Egyptians for Guides, passed with the Fleet through a ditch, and in a place something remote and out of sight landed his men, and pitched his tents; which being known by the Garrison, a party issued out, and fell upon them; but the Gracians, after a sharp contest, slew their Captain, and of them about 5000 men. Nectanebus upon report made of this defeat was greatly discouraged, fearing all the rest of the Persian Army might be easily transported, and suspecting lest the Enemy should bend his utmost strength against Memphis the Metropolis, was especially concerned for it, and with that party which accompanied him returned thither. In the mean time Lacrates the Theban, General and principal of all the Gracian Captains drained the Chancel by cutting a ditch, and passing over his Soldiers raised a battery against Pelusium, by which the walls being much broken the defendants raised still Pallisadoes in the place, and the Gracians within stoutly defending the Fort, a great contest hapned for several dayes. But as soon as they heard of the Kings departure, they desired a Parley, and Lacrates interposing an Oath, that upon yielding of the place, they should depart with such things as they brought out of Greece, they presently yielded. Then Artaxerxes sent Bagoas an Eunuch of great authority with him, with a party of Barbarians to take possession of Pelusium, who meeting the Gracians took from them many things contrary to the agreement. This they received in great disdain, and called to their gods as witnesses of the Oath, which to keep keep Lacrates fell upon the Barbarians, put them to flight with the losse of some, and defended his Country-men, for which being accused by Bagoas, the King defended what he had done, and punished the Authors of the violence.

10. Pelusium being taken, the other Towns were easily reduced by this stratagem of Mentor the Rhodian, the third Captain of the Gracians. These places being held by Garrisons consisting of two sorts of Nations, Gracians and Egyptians, he caused this rumour to be spread abroad, that Artaxerxes had resolved to deal mildly with all those who should deliver up any Towns, but such as should withstand him, he would prosecute with as great severity as the Sidonians; and he gave in charge to the Sentinels to let as many Citizens go out as would. By this means this report was perfectly spread all over Egypt, and thereupon mutinies followed betwixt the Strangers and Natives in every Garrison, each endeavouring first to betray their trust, and gain credit of the Conquerours by their speedy treachery. Accordingly when Mentor and Bagoas laid siege to Bubastis, the Egyptians secretly sent to the latter to yield to him the Town upon security of a free dismissal. The Gracians suspecting the matter, pursued the Messenger, and getting from him the whole truth, in a great rage fell upon the Egyptians, whereof some they slew, others they wounded, and drove the rest into a corner of the Town. They signified this to Bagoas, and desired him with all speed to come and take possession of the Town, and in the mean time a messenger was sent to Mentor from the Gracians, who advised them as soon as Bagoas should enter the Town to fall upon the Barbarians. As soon therefore as part of his Soldiers with him was entered, they shut the gates, and killing all the Soldiers, took Bagoas himself prisoner.

11. Bagoas (a) seeing his only hope to be in Mentor, earnestly besought him to be the means of his deliverance, promising him to do nothing for the future without his approbation, who procuring his release, and having the Town delivered up into his own hands, as he got the credit of the enterprise, so engaged he Bagoas to him, who entered by Oath into friendship and endearedness, which he also kept to the last, and by which union they both became afterwards the most powerful of all the King's Officers. After the surrender of Bubastis, the other Cities made their peace, but Nectanebus lying at Memphis, and seeing what progress the Enemy made in his conquest, would not endanger his personal safety for a Kingdom, but packing up all his treasures got him away into Ethiopia. Then became Artaxerxes Master of all Egypt, and demolishing the walls of the greater Towns, spoiled the Temples, and got much treasure. He carried away the Writings of the Priests, which afterwards Bagoas restored to them for a great sum of money, he (b) derided Apis and all their gods, and for that the Egyptians had for his dulness (c) called him an Asse, he sacrificed Apis being taken by violence, to an Asse, making his flesh also be dressed up for meat. Then rewarded he the Gracians with great munificence, according to their particular merits, and making Phaerendates Sacrapa of Egypt, he returned laden with glory and spoyl unto Babylon, taking (d) in his way a great number of Jews captive, of whom some he placed at Babylon, and others in Hyrcania upon the Caspian Sea.

12. Ochus rewarded Mentor the Rhodian with 100 talents of silver, and much costly householdstuff, and making him governour of the Coasts of Asia, gave him full power to make war upon his Rebels. He used his power moderately towards Artabazus and Memnon, who formerly had revolted, and now were fled to Philip King of Macedonia: those he reconciled to the King, and sent for them both with their Families; for Artabazus had by the Sister of Mentor and Memnon eleven Sons and ten Daughters, by which number Mentor being much affected, not onely procured him his pardon, but preferred by degrees all the youths to honourable command in the Army. After this promise of pardon he allured Hermias the Eunuch Governour of Atarnus into his hands, whom casting into prison, he took his Ring and therewith signed letters, wherein was commanded in his name, that such as had command of any Castles or Towns should deliver them up into the hands of the bearers, which was accordingly done, and then sent he Hermias up to the King, who caused him to be hanged. Aristotle the Philosopher and Xenocrates the Chalcedonian, (whom he had sent for to him) made their escape out of such places as the Persians had got into their hands. Afterwards Mentor either by force or policy, reduced all such Captains as had revolted.

13. Philip the son of Amyntas at this time reigning in Macedonia, grew very potent, and besieged Perinthus, a Town in Thrace, situate upon the Propontis, with 30000 men, and very strong provision for War; so that he straightly pressed the inhabitants, giving them no rest through his continual attempts.

This Artaxerxes Ochus taking notice of, and being very jealous of his sudden growth, commanded the Satrapas of the Maritime Coasts of Asia to relieve the Perinthians as effectually as might be, which they so performed as he missed of his design; and this afterwards was objected as a sufficient cause, amongst others, for the invasion of Asia.

Affairs of Judea in the time of Ochus.

14. In the reign of Ochus, as some think, hapned those things which are * said to have been done in Judea, during the reign of Artaxerxes, and to have given an occasion of imposing a Tribute upon that Countrey. After the death of Eliashib the Priest, his son John succeeded him in his Office according to his birth-right, who had a brother named Joshua. This Joshua being in great favour with Bagozes, the Kings General, had a promise from him that he should have the Priesthood, by which he was so heartned as to strive with John in the Temple, and so far provoked him as he slew him there. Bagozes hearing this, endeavoured to enter the Temple, and when he was forbidden asked if they counted him more impure than the Carkefs that lay within, and entering by force, took thence occasion to punish the Jews seven years for the death of Joshua. For two Lambs being dayly offered in the constant sacrifices, he imposed upon every one a Tribute of fifty drachms, which amounted to the yearly rate of sixty Attick Talents. But if these things hapned in the time of this Artaxerxes, and he be taken for Ahasuerus, then must this murther have been committed towards the beginning of his reign, and this Tribute of seven years been exacted before Mordecai the Jew came in favour, which was after the fall of Haman, in the twelfth year of Ahasuerus.

15. During the reign of Ochus, in his ninth year, died Mausolus the petty King of Caria, more famous after his death than whilest living, to whom his wife Artemisia succeeding, because he left no Children, burned with such affection towards him, that reducing his bones and ashes into powder she drunk it, desiring to become a quick and breathing monument of her husband. She proposed great rewards to such Orators as would speak eloquently in his commendation, in which did several notable men of that time. For the preservation of his memory she raised such a monument as deserved to be reckoned amongst the seven wonders of the World, and in the work whereof the most exquisite artificers that then could be found were employed. Scopas on the East part, Bryaxes on the North, Timotheus on the South, and Leochares on the West, who notwithstanding Artemisia died of melancholy before the work was compleated, yet proceeded to the finishing of it, intending it as a monument, not onely of Mausolus (upon which account the * Romans called their most exquisite pieces of Architecture Mausolea) but also of the excellency of their Art; to transmit their own names as well as his posterity.

16. Bagoas had risen to that power with Ochus, that he ruled all things at his pleasure, the King doing nothing without his consent. Yet either misdoubting of his security through the cruel disposition of the King, or willing to have a greater power, owing Ochus also some displeasure for killing the Egyptian God Apis (he belonging to that Countrey) poysoned him by the means of a Physician, after he had reigned 23 years. Being dead, he cast him to the Cats to be devoured, another being buried in the Royal Sepulchre, in his stead, and that he might expresse his cruel disposition, of his Thigh-bones he caused sword hilts to be made. In his stead he made King his youngest son Arses, killing all his other sons, that the new King being destitute of kindred & friends, might yield the more obedience to himself. In reality he now reigned, usurping all, except the meer Title; but Arses beginning to look to himself, when he had ground to suspect that he intended to call him to an account for his wickednesse, he made him away also with all his Children in the third year after he had set him up.

Darius Codomannus.

17. All the Children of Arses perishing with him, and the Royal family thereby being desolate, Bagoas made choice of one (a) Codomannus his friend, and placed him in the Throne, whom some Authors would have not at all to be descended of the Royal line, being a Carrier of Letters, but others make him the son of Arsames (brother to Ochus) by Sisygambis his sister, according to the custom of the Persian marriages. Whilest a private man in the Cadusian War he shewed himself valiant, killing an Enemy, who challenged any one of Ochus his Army to a single Combat; and thereby for the present procuring great rewards, honour, and the Government of Armenia, after Arses his death came to be remembered by the people, which made choice also of him for their King, and that nothing of Royal Majesty might be wanting to him gave him the name of Darius. Not long after his prement Bagoas repented him of what he had done, and being much versed in King killing, provided a porion to send him after Ochus and Arses, which he having notice of, called him to him, and in a pleasant humour offered it to himself to drink, and thereto compelled him, satisfying the people sufficiently in that he thus required him, who sought the same way to entrap him.

By this Darius was sent into Samaria, as a Satrapa, Sanballet, a Cuthean by birth, and so of the same Original the Samaritans themselves were. He thinking it good policy to procure Amity with the Jews, his Neighbours, married his daughter Nicaso to Manasses the brother of Jaddus the High-Priest.

Together with his Kingdom espouseth a quarrel with the King of Macedonia.

18. Darius with the Empire of Persia was necessitated to espouse a quarrel with the greatest Monarch then known in the World except himself, and with such a people in combination with him, as easily excelled all others in Military skill and valour. The quarrels which hapned betwixt the Persians and Gracians had been many, and as many bickerings and contests in the field had ensued thereupon, wherein as the Greeks both at home and abroad had constantly had successe agreeable to their dexterity, so each foil of the Persians gave as great a stroak to their credit, insomuch as they were slighted by the other, especially after the retreat of those that assisted Cyrus, who in despite of all Artaxerxes could do, marched through the midst of his Territories as Conquerours, and having seen the great riches of those Countreys through which they passed, carried home a longing desire after them, and an indignation that such things should be enjoyed by those who seemed not in capacity to defend them.

19. The disadvantage of the Persians was the rising of the Kingdom of Macedonia, to that high pitch of greatnesse to which it had been of late advanced by the abilities of Philip the present King, who though he might have pretended a cause where none was, yet was there some occasion of offence given him, though but counted a necessary allay to his rising fortune so terrible to the Persian Empire: For when with great preparations he had besieged Periathus a Citie of Thrace, Ochus gave order to his Lieutenants to assist the besieged, which was so powerfully done, as his design miscarried. Yet he having brought all Greece to his beck, and established his interest sufficiently in Europe, resolved upon Asia, and assembling the estates at Corinth, procured himself to be declared General of all Greece for the Persian War; for which he made mighty preparations, imposing a certain number of Souldiers upon every Citie. The next Spring he sent over as before him into Asia three Captains, Parmenio, Amyntas, and Attalus, under pretence of freeing the Greek Cities there, which hapned the same year that Artes died, and he lived himself not long after, being stabbed by one Pausanias, as he was solemnizing the nuptials of his daughter Cleopatra, with Alexander King of Epirus. Hereupon Darius, who before studied how to turn the War into Macedonia, thought himself secure, despising the youth of Alexander his son and Successor, who exceeded not the age of 20 years.

20. But Alexander being a young man of a great and restless spirit, and of wisdom & valour far above his age, overcame all difficulties, both in Greece and Asia, which his Enemies had raised (getting himself to be chosen in a little time General of the one, as his father had been, and in the other suppressing betimes the sedition of the Army of Attalus, by taking of him out of the way) and most vehemently burnt with a desire of the Conquest of the Persian Empire; from an endeavour after which he might by no means be diverted. Having either by fair, or foul means settled his matters in Europe, he passed over into Asia two years after his fathers death, and landed at Troas with a Fleet of sixty long ships. He first cast a spear out upon the shore, and leaped out in a frisking manner, as taking possession of the Continent. Then presently he made a visit to the Tombs of Achilles and Ajax, to whom he made a parentation, and mustered the Army he had brought over with him. Concerning the number of Forces, those that were there present themselves have not agreed in their relation, but according to the greatest probability, there were of foot 13000 Macedonians, of the Associates 7000. and 5000 Mercenaries, besides of Odrysæ, Triballi, and Illyrians 5000. and 1000 Archers, with such as fought with Darts. Of horse there were 1800 Macedonians, 1800 Thessalonians, and of other Gracians 600. besides a Guard of 900 Thracians and Paonians.

Diodorus ad Olymp. 111. ann. 3. Justin. lib. 11. Arrianus lib. 1.

21. Darius after he had heard how Alexander was declared General of Greece, and was much spoken of for his valour, shook off his former security and buckled himself to preparation for resistance. He got together a considerable Navy, and raised great Forces, for command of which he made choice of most expert Captains, and amongst the rest of Memnon the Rhodian, a man very excellent in Military matters, whom he sent into Phrygia with a band of 5000 Mercenaries to reduce Cyzicus to his obedience. He passed over the Hill Ida, and on a sudden set upon the City, and had well-nigh taken it; but the Defendants making strong resistance, he plundered the Territories adjacent, and then retreated with much booty. In the mean while Parmenio, one of the three Captains sent into Asia by Philip, and who stood close to the interest of Alexander, took by storm Strynium, a Town of Phrygia, and sold the inhabitants. From thence he went to Pitanus to attempt the same upon it, but Memnon coming upon him struck such a terrour into his men that he was forced to raise his siege. After this, Callas with a band of Macedonians and Mercenaries engaged with the Persians in a battel at Troas, but being overmatched in numbers, he was worsted, and betook himself to Rhacum. These things fell out before the passage of Alexander into Asia.

Diodorus ad Olymp. 111. ann. 2.

22. After (a) Alexander was landed, the Persian Captains met to consult about carrying on the War, whom Memnon advised by no means to hazard a battel with him; but to lay waste the Countrey before him, thereby to hinder his march any farther for want of necessaries, and then to passe all their Forces over into Macedonia, and so to transfer the seat of the War into Europe. This wholesome Counsel was rejected as below the Persian courage, and a resolution taken to engage, so that gathering their forces together they marched into Phrygia towards the Hellepont, and pitched their Tents upon the River Granicus (which runneth through the plains of Adraffea) intending it as a defence to them. (b) Alexander in his way thither passed by Lampsacus, the inhabitants of which either having already revolted to the Persian, or else suspected of such an intent he resolved utterly to destroy. As he was thus minded Anaximenes an Historian of that place, well known formerly to his father, and also to him, presented himself to him, to whom he swore in so many

23. Alexander having with great trouble and danger passed the River Granicus, then (a) engaged with the Persians in a great and bloody battel (a) Diodorus wherein much valour was shewn on both sides. Spartachus, a Persian Sa- ibid. where in much valour was shewn on both sides, Spartachus, a Persian Sa- ibid. trapa of Ionia, and Son in Law to Darius, a man of a great courage, with a strong body of Horse fell upon the Macedonians, whom no one being able to sustain, Alexander himself grappled with him, a fierce combat ensued, he wounding the King, who yet at length slew him. But Rufaces his brother coming in upon Alexander, gave him such a blow on the head as broke his helmet and lightly wounded him, and a second had killed him outright but that Clitus, surnamed Niger, a Macedonian, putting spurs to his Horse, in good time cut off the hand of the Barbarian. A great conflict then ensued betwix the principal Persians and Macedonians, and many of the former lost their lives upon the place; amongst which of most special note were Aspex and Phanaces, brother to the wife of Darius, and Mithrobarzanes Captain of the Cappadocians. These being slain, those that opposed Alexander began to fly, and afterwards all the rest; of the 100000 foot which the Persians brought into the field about 10000 being slain, and of the 20000 Horse, 2000. Of Alexander his Army one (b) reports nine Foot-men, and 120 Horse-men to have (b) Justin ex fallen, but (c) another onely 34 in all, amongst which were nine Foot-men. Trago. The King by confession of all deserved most commendation for his valour, and (c) Platarch. ex next to him the Thessalian Horse-men. (d) Arstes the Persian fled into (d) Arstes the Persian fled into Phrygia, and there killed himself, because through his advice, he seemed to lib. 1. have been author of this overthrow.

24. After he had refreshed his Army, Alexander marched through Lydia, Diodorus ut having Sardis delivered up to him, and came to Ephesus, where he dissolved pr. us. the Oligarchical form of Government, and set up a Democratical one in its room, commanding the same to be done in all Greek Cities, which he ordered to be left to their own Laws. The Persians which had escaped at Granicus were come to Miletus with Memnon the Rhodian, against which City he went and besieged it both by Land and Sea, and by his Engines making great breaches in the walls, the Inhabitants yielded themselves to his mercy, to whom he gave both life and freedom, but such Barbarians as he took he either slew or scattered them up and down in the quality of slaves. A little after he dissolved his Fleet, consisting of 160 Ships or more, onely reserving a certain number for the conveying of Engines and other instruments for a siege, amongst which were twenty Auxiliary Vessels belonging to Athens.

25. Memnon, after the taking of Miletus, with the most considerable Persian Officers, and a multitude of Mercenaries, betook themselves to Halicarnassus, the greatest and most elegant City in Caria, which he took upon him to defend for the King, to whom he sent as Hostages his Wife and Children, and thereupon command was given to all the Maritime parts of Asia, to obey him as their Captain General in the War. Alexander in the mean time sent his Engines thither by water, together with provision for his Army, and marched himself by Land thitherwards with his whole Force, setting at liberty in his way all the Greek Cities, which he left to their own Laws, and freed from Tribute, professing that he undertook this Expedition for the freedom of the Greeks. In his way he was met by Ada the Queen of Caria, who after the death of her Husband Idrieus, was deposed by her Brother Pexodarus. She delivered up Alinda, the strongest City in the Country wherein she dwelt, into his hands, and imploring his help for the recovery of the Kingdom, adopted him for her son. He desired it not, and left her the Government of Caria, over which he declared her Queen, by which courtesie the Cities being overcome, sent him Crowns of gold, and delivered up themselves into his power.

kept possession of Halicarnassus, with whom Memnon the Rhodian and other Persians, after the taking of Mileus, joyned themselves. Alexander now besieged it, and with all his might endeavoured the taking of it by assault; but such was the pertinacioufnesse of the defendants, that they held him out, and making a sallie had given him a defeat, if the old Soldiers buckling their Arms to them had not come in in good time, and repulsed them with great slaughter; after which the Soldiers forsook the City, and so he took it, and levelled it with the ground. The Castle he fortified with a wall, and a notable ditch, in which for the defence of Caria he left 3000 forein Foot, and 200 Horse, under the command of Ptolomy; and restored to his adoptive Mother Ada, the Principality of the Country. From thence he proceeded towards Lycia and Pamphylia, that reducing the Sea-Coasts into his power, he might render the Enemies Navy unserviceable to him, which he in a good measure performed, and came in the midst of Winter into Mylias a Region of Phrygia, where he entred into League with the Ambassadors sent to him from Phaselis, and the lower Lycia, who surrendered all the Cities into his hands. Afterwards he went into Phaselis, where he stormed a Castle built by the Pisidians, to infest the Country.

Lyncestes.

27. Whilst (a) he here remained, he understood of a plot against his life, by Alexander Aeropus, called also Lyncestes (from Lyncus a Town of Epirus, as it's probable) who was promised by Darius the Kingdom of Macedonia, and 1000 talents of Gold besides, if he could any way procure his death. His Mother had by letters advised him to take heed of him, and the thing being confessed by Aspines a Persian, whom Darius under a shew of a Message to the Governour of Phrygia, had sent to deal with him in this matter, he committed him to custody, not thinking it safe to put him to death, lest thereupon some trouble should follow, in Macedonia. From Phaselus he marched to Perga on the shore of the Pamphylian Sea, concerning which many ancient Historians reported, that it by an extraordinary providence gave way to him, and herein Josephus hath rather been too credulous, whereas (b) at a low water the place used to be dry, and gave way to passengers; only Alexander hapning to come thither in Winter-season, and trusting all to the goodnesse of his Fortune, would march through before the water was fallen off, so that his men waded all the day in water up to the navel. (c) Subduing all in his passage, at length he came to the Lake of Ascania in Phrygia, and thence in five Encampings to Celena, the Castle of which being held by the Satrapa of Phrygia with 1000 Carians, and 100 mercenary Grecians, after 60 dayes truce (in which they had in vain expected relief from Darius) was yielded unto him.

This Gordium a City in Phrygia, had been the regal City of Midas the Son of Gordius King of this Country (concerning whom notable Stories are related) and herein was a Temple of Jupiter, wherein Alexander heard that there was a yoke belonging to Gordius, the bands of which whosoever could untie, the Oracles promised him the Empire of all Asia. When he had taken the Town he came into the Temple, and asked for the yoke, which being brought to him, when he could not find the ends of the thongs which were hid amongst the knots, left his frustrate endeavour should be ominous, he cut them in pieces, with his sword, and thereby either eluded or fulfilled the Oracle.

about a Peace, and a rumour being spread that he intended to fall upon Eubœa, a great fear seized upon the Inhabitants thereof, and many of the Gracians who envied the Fortune of Alexander, began to take courage, and conceive new hopes, amongst which were the Lacedæmonians, who alwaies had despised both his alliance and that with his Father. Thus prosperously succeeded Darius his affairs under the management of Memnon; but Providence having otherwise determined concerning his estate, Memnon died shortly after, and with him the King's successe was even extinct. He was in good hope that the War would have been translated out of Asia into Europe, by necessitating Alexander to return; but understanding of his death, he consulted with his Friends whether he should manage the War by his Lieutenants, or go himself in person, and give the Macedonians battel.

30. The Persians perswaded him to march in the head of the Army, which thereby would fight with more alacrity, but Charidemus (or Eudemus) an Athenian, a man much admired for valour and prudence (who by the command of Alexander being banished his Country, was come to the Persian Court) advised him not rashly to commit the fortune of his Empire to the hazard of his own life, but keeping the chief power in his own hands to send some expert Lieutenant to the War. He told him that 100000 men would be sufficient for this enterprize; a third part of them being Gracians, with which he doubted not to engage to perfect what already was well begun by Memnon. The King at first gave ear to what he said; but the Persians obstinately opposed it, and so interpreted his words as if he affected the chief command, for that end, that he might betray the Empire to the Macedonians. Hereat he grew angry, and in his passion upbraided the Persians with cowardice, which so far incensed the King, before this exasperated against him, that his anger overtopping his reason, he cast a belt about him after the Persian manner, and commanded him to be put to death, who foreseeing his ruine, cried out as he was led away, that shortly he would repent it, and pay sufficiently for so unjust proceedings. After the cooling of his passion he repented too late of his rashnesse, and considering the valour of the Lacedæmonians, be thought himself what man of worth he might find fit to succeed Memnon; but finding none to whom he might commit so great a trust, was necessitated to expose himself to danger for the preservation of his Kingdom. Then raised he Forces in all places, which he commanded should meet at Babylon, where accordingly were found 400000 Foot, and above 100000 Horse, and with this number (taking his Mother, Wife, one Son of six years of age, and two Daughters marriageable along with him) hee marched towards Cilicia.

Curtius lib. 3.

31. Alexander in the mean while placed Satrapæes over Paphlagonia and Cappadocia, which voluntarily yielded themselves, and hastned towards the Straights of Cilicia called Pyla, which being quitted by those that were there placed to maintain them, he easily passed, and came to Tarsus, which Arxames the Persian also forsook, and waisting Cilicia to straighten the Macedonian Army of provisions, fled again to the King. Here he fell sick of a disease, which (b) one wrote he got by too much toil, (c) others assign no particular cause at all; but according to the general tradition, (d) he contracted it by casting himself all hot and sweaty into the River Cydus, whence such a cold seized upon his Nerves that he fell speechlesse, and so small hopes there were of recovery, that little probability was conceived of protracting the danger. Onely one Physician named Philip an Acaranian, who used a speedy and desperate kind of course in his practice, undertook the cure. But by letters from Parmenio he was lately advised to beware of him, as being corrupted by Darius for a great sum of money to make him away. Yet he counting it safer to commit himself to the doubtful fidelity of the man than perish by a certain disease, put himself into his hands, and taking the potion, gave him the letters of Parmenio to read, fixing his eyes upon him as he drank, whom as he saw nothing troubled at the matter, he took more courage, and recovered the fourth day after.

SECT. 4.

32. Darius having notice of the sicknesse of Alexander halted towards Euphrates, thinking to prevent him, and seize upon Cilicia. But he sending Parmenio before to possesse himself of the Pyle, or Straights that part Cilicia and Syria, followed from Tarsus, and came to Anchiale built by Sardanapalus; and thence to Solus, where he placed a Garrison, and fined the inhabitants 200 Talents of silver for their affection to the Persians. Hence he marched against the Cilicians, inhabiting the Mountains, which having brought under, he returned, and understanding how Ptolomy and Asander his Lieutenants had overthrown Orontobaces the Persian, who held the Castle of Halicarnassus, whereby the parts adjacent were reduced to obedience; upon this good news he sacrificed to Æsculapius, and restored the Democratical Government to the Solians. Then giving order to Philotas to lead about the horse to the River Pyramus, he marched with the foot by the Sea-Coasts, and came thither, whence he passed over to the Cirie Mallos, where he had notice that Darius lay at Sochus, a place distant two dayes march from the Straights. From Mallos he passed to the Cirie Iffus, which being forsaken by the Persians, Parmenio had seized on, and cleared the passage thither, where he consulted whether he had better passe forwards, or there expect his supplies out of Macedonia. Parmenio perswaded him that no place could be more convenient for him to fight in than that straight one about Iffus, because both their Armies would then be equal in effect, such narrow places being uncapable to receive a multitude. After three dayes he passed the Straights and came to Myriander, where much rain falling held the Macedonians in their Tents.

Ameus Cuvius ibid.

33. Darius in the mean while by the perswasion of some Gracians about him, had made choice of the plains of Syria, most capable to receive his multitudes, and opportune for the horse to charge in; and for some time here he continued; but Alexander delaying his march, he was perswaded by his Courtiers that he dared not to adventure any further, or look him in the face, and because Winter approached he would lose no time, and therefore sending away his money and stuff of most value, with such as were not fit for War, unto Damascus, he halted into Cilicia, where he supposed Alexander to have possessed himself of the difficult passages, as not daring to try battel in open field. Supposing that he pretended sicknesse, and hid himself in the straights, he passed over the Mountain, and went to Iffus, most imprudently passing by, and leaving him at his back. Taking this place, and therein such of the Enemy as being sick and weak were there left, he cut off their hands, and then fearing their Arms sent them away to tell their King what they had seen; for he thought now the Enemy to have left Iffus, and fled for fear of him, and for that reason halted over the Hill Pinarus, thinking to fall upon him in the Rear. Alexander knowing for certain that he was passed by, took thence occasion to encourage his Souldiers, who now could not be overmatched by multitudes, and sending a party of horse to view the straights, returned thither by night, and repossessed himself of them. Then refreshing his men for the rest of the night, he set a strong watch upon the Rock, and in the morning went down into the path, and set his Army in order for a battel.

of Iffus.

34. This being done, the Armies joyned ere long, and Alexander seeing where Darius was, made towards him, which when Oxyathres the brother of Darius saw, to prevent him, he placed a Company of most valiant horse-men before the Chariot, which cut off many of Alexander his men, who pressed forwards. But the Macedonians giving way to none in valour, with great violence broke in amongst them, and then a mighty slaughter followed, and a great heap of Carcases lay before Darius his Chariot. Many of the most noble Captains amongst the Persians fell, some of the Macedonians, and Alexander himself received a wound in his Thigh. Darius his Chariot horses being wounded with spears began to fling, & threatened the overturning of him, when fearing he should be taken alive he leaped out, and mounting an horse ready for him, he cast away his Royal apparel, and shifted for himself, after which his horse was put to the rout and ran away. The Infantry discouraged here-herewith made no considerable opposition, the great multitudes being unserviceable in so straight and precipitous a place, and being put to the rout so hindred the flight, and trode one another down, that more damage accrued hence than from the meer strength of the Enemy. Of the Perſian horse Arrianus writeth 10000 to have been slain, and of the foot 90000. With whom others consent as to the number of the horse, but as to the foot there is little agreement, some accounting more, and others lesse: 40000 are reported to have been taken.

35. Of Alexander's men 504. Curtius saith were wounded; 32 foot-men were slain, and of horſe-men 150. which some reckon 1ſte by 10. though another increaseth them to 300. Alexander following the Chæ: was forced to paſſe with his phalange over the Enemies dead bodies, and with 1000 horſe did great execution, but was not able to reach Darius, who rode upon a Mare that had a Foal left at home, and therefore ran with more speed, he being accuſtomed to have ſome kept for ſuch neceſſities. His Tents were eaſily taken, and therein his Mother, Wife, Son, and two daughters; but of money not above 30000 Talents; the reſt being ſent before-hand to Damaſcus. The women hearing that Alexander was returned with the Robe of Darius, made great lamentation, which he underſtanding, ſent Leonatus to them to put them out of fear as to his death; to promiſe them the maintenance of their former dignity, and a Viſit from him to be made the next morning. As ſoon as it was light, he went to them with Hephæſtion his greateſt favourite, both whom when the Mother of Darius ſaw, and knew not which was the King, ſhe made reverence to Hephæſtion, as ſeeming to her from the worth of his Clothes to be the greater perſon, which when ſhe underſtood to have been amiſſe, was troubled at it, and aſked his pardon; to which he answered, ſmiling: Be not troubled Mother, for he alſo is Alexander. This battle of Iſſus was fought in the moneth Mamacterion, Nicoſtratus (or Nico-crates) being Archon at Athens, in the fourth year of the 111 Olympiad, the fourth of the reign of Darius, and the fourth of Alexander. 36. Alexander, after this victory, marched for Syria, and ſent Parmenio before him to Damaſcus to ſeize upon Darius his Treſure, which by Cophenes the Keeper thereof was betrayed into his hands, and for that was rewarded with death by one of his Complices, who ſent his head to Darius. Of Coyn here was found 2600 Talents, beſides 500 pound weight of Bullion, and a World of other riches. Of men and women 30000 were alſo taken, with 7000 beaſts that carried burthens. Then was Parmenio ſent to ſeize upon the Perſian Fleet, and others to take in the Cities of Syria, which upon the report of the ſucceſſe of the battle at Iſſus was eaſily done, the Governours of Darius yielding themſelves with their Treſures. As Alexander travelled into Syria, many petty Kings met him adorned with their Diadems, whereof ſome he received into friendſhip, and others he deprived of their principalities, as they had deſerved of him. When he came to the Citie Marathon, he received Letters from Darius, wherein he deſired the ranſom of his Wife, Mother, and Children, with ſome other conditions of peace; but ſuch as rather became a Conquerour, than one that had now been thrice ſhamefully beaten, nor vouchſaſing, in his direction, to Alexander the Title of King. He diſdained his offers, juſtified his War from the invaſion of Greece by the former Perſian Kings, and the treachery of Darius himſelf, who hired one to murder him, as Philip his father had formerly been by ſome ſet on by them. He promiſed him his relations without Ranſom, if he would come himſelf as a Suppliant for them, and ſafe conduction, he both knowing, as he ſaid, to overcome, and ſhew favour to the Conquered. And the next time he wrote he bad him remember that he did it not onely to a King, but to his own King alſo.

Island Governed it in his absence (he joyning his ships, as the rest of the Phœnician Kings, to the fleet of Darius) & meeting Alexander as he came into Phœnicia, put a Golden Crown on his head, and gave up Aradus, and Marathus, a great and wealthy Town, standing upon the Continent over against it, with Mariamne, and all that belonged unto them, into his hands. But now because he had done this rather for that the will of the people was such, than out of his own inclination, Alexander deprived him of his Kingdom, and permitted his beloved Hephestion to bestow it upon any of his friends. He chose to confer it upon a Sidonian by whom he was entertained; but he refused it, for that it was unlawfull for any but one of the Royal stock to possess it. He wondring at the greatnesse of his spirit joyned with so much honesty, bid him choose any one of the Royal Race on whom to bestow it, who accordingly made choice of Abdalmon (or Abdalomnius) a poor Gardiner who wrought for his living, but of unblameable life, and descended of the Royal family. Alexander admitting of him, said, the habit of his body could not withstand the noblenesse of his stock, but desired to know with what patience he had endured such poverty, to whom he answered, That he wished he could as well bear a Kingdom, and that those his hands had satisfied his desire: whilst he had nothing, nothing was wanting to him. The King being much taken with his carriage, not onely gave him the house-hold stuff of Strato, but most of the booty got from the Persians, subjected the Countrey adjacent unto his power, and afterwards also the Citie of Tyre, according to Diodorus.

Diodorus ad Olymp. III. ann. 4.

38. Now was all Syria in the hands of the Macedonians, and whole Phœnicia also except Tyre, which Citie was seated in an Island about half a mile distant from the Continent. As he marched thitherwards, the Tyrians sent him a Crown of Gold of great value, in a Congratulatory way, and a large quantity of provisions; which he received as from friends, and friendly signified to the Messengers his intention to go into their Citie, to pay some vows he had made to Hercules. They told him there was a Temple of Hercules without the Citie, in the place called Old Tyre, wherein his devotion would be most suitably performed, and so dissuaded him from entrance, that he was enraged thereat, and threatened ruin to the Citie, telling them, that though they were confident in the strength of the place, and despised his Land-Army, yet in short time he would make them find they were in the Continent. And in confidence that their Town, not onely fenced with high and strong Walls, but also with the Sea, was impregnable, they resolved to stand out against him, being encouraged also by the Carthaginian Ambassadors, who after their yearly custom (in token of observance to their Mother City) were come to celebrate the sacred Anniversary, and promised them certain, and speedy supply by Sea, which for the most part at that time was commanded by their Fleets.

39. Alexander yet having not his Navy at hand, and foreseeing that a long siege would be a great hindrance to his designs, sent to them about an agreement; but contrary to the Law of Nations, they slew the Messengers, and threw them into the Sea, with which affront being much moved, he resolved to besiege them. Ere he could do this, such a quantity of earth or other matter was to be cast into the Sea, as to joyn the Island to the main land, which for the depth of the water, & the force of the Current, was a task almost insuperable; but there being great store of stones and rubbish at hand in Old Tyre, he caused it to be utterly demolished, and by the hands of many thousands of his own men, and the people of the neighbouring places, set upon the work. The Tyrians (whose King Azelmicus being absent with Darius his Admiral, had left them to the Government of his son) hindered it all wayes possible, and when it was near concluded, a violent wind spoiled a great part of it, but to repair it he caused great Trees to be cut down in the Mountains, which together with the boughs being cast in, and earth being heaped upon them, resisted the violence of the waves, and at length by the great number of hands, and incredible industry, the Island became but a Peninsula.

Alexander his great attempt for the Conquering of Tyre.

But

But for all this, the Tyrians having the command of the Sea, their City seemed yet to be impregnable, whereupon Alexander had thoughts of gathering together a Fleet; but in the mean time came in the Kings of Aradus and Byblus, who had withdrawn themselves with their Fleet from Autophradates the Persian Admiral, and with them the Sidonian Gallies. Besides these Vessels belonging to Phœnicia (which were 80 in number) at the same time came ten from Rhodes, from Solos and Mallos three, and from Lycia ten, besides one great Gally from Macedonia. All these he pardoned, as having been necessitated to joyn with the Persians. And Azelmicus the King of Tyre now left Autophradates and came home; Arrianus writing that he was taken in the City.

40. From the Mountain Libanus was wood brought for the making of Engines, Towers, and Ships, in which work whilst Alexander his men were employed, some of the wild Arabians fell upon them, slew thirty, and took scarcely so many. He upon notice hereof left the charge of the Siege to Perdiccas, and Craterus, and speedily with a ready Band of men went into Arabia, where when they came to the mountainous parts of the Hill called Antilibanus, they left their Horses and marched on foot. When it grew night, and the Enemy approached, though his men were before, yet would he not leave his School-master Lysimachus being weary and spent, but still drawing him on was parted from the Army, and forced with a few about him to pass the night in a dark and cold place. But seeing many fires to be kindled afar off by the Enemy, he being nimble of body ran to one of them, and killing two Barbarians that there sat, brought away a fire-stick burning to his Companions, who therewith kindled a great fire, and thereby struck such a terror into the Arabians, as all that night they passed in quietness. Then partly by force and partly by agreement he reduced the Country into obedience, and in eleven dayes time returned to Sidon, where he found arrived out of Peloponnus 4000 Greekish Mercenaries, under the conduct of Alexander the Son of Polemocrates.

41. Having then got together a Navy of 190 or 200 ships, he set sail from Sidon and came to Tyre, the Inhabitants whereof refused to fight by Sea, but yet let down none of their courage, though 30 Messengers were come from Carthage to let them know, that that State being hindred by a domestick War, could not afford them any succour. They sent their wives and children thither to be out of the danger, being thereby the more willing to undergo any themselves, which they little regarded, making stout resistance, but at length the City was taken; one saith by treachery, another by a stratageme, but more by plain force; Alexander himself alone first going down from the wooden Tower he had reared, by a bridge laid upon the wall. The Inhabitants, though the Enemy had entred, called one upon another, and fortifying the narrow passages stood out still, till the number of 7000 (the most of those that fought) were slain. The Conquerour condemned the women and children that were found unto bondage, the young men to the number of 2000 he caused to be hanged all along the shore, or crucified, as another telleth us, (which was accounted a servile kind of death) because the Tyrian slaves had formerly conspired against their Masters, and slain them all with their whole families, leaving no free people alive, except one Sirato and his Son, to whom and his posterity they committed the Kingdom. Fifteen thousand the Sidonians saved upon the account of kindred (they reckoning both Tyre and Sidon to have been built by Agenor) from whom the City was again re-peopled, and to such as had fled to the Temple of Hercules, Alexander granted indemnity, amongst which the King and his family were, with some Carthaginians which were come for the honour of Hercules to the Metropolis. This befel Tyre in the moneth Hecatombæon, when Annicetus (otherwise called Niceratus and Nicetas) was Archon at Athens, in the first year of the 112th Olympiad, the fifth of Darius, and the fifth of Alexander, A. docians, and Paphlagonians, attempted to recover Lydia; but Antigonus who there commanded for Alexander overthrew them thrice in several places. At the same time also Aristimenes, who was sent with some ships by Darius to recover the Coast of Asia, lying upon the Hellepont, was wholly defeated by a Fleet of Macedonians which Alexander had sent for out of Greece.

Darius sendeth new proposals to Alexander, which he refuseth.

43. Whilst Alexander lay before Tyre, another Ambassage came to him from Darius, who now offered him 10000 talents as a ransom for his relations, and all Asia betwixt the Hellepont and the River Halys in Dower with his Daughter; which conditions that he might incline him to receive, he sets before him the difficulties of passing into the Eastern Countries, and laid the losse of the last battel to the straightnesse of the place: he sought to terrifie him by threatening to incompass him in the plain Countries, and bad him consider how impossible it was to passe the Rivers of Euphrates, Tigris, Araxes, and the rest, with things of the like nature. The proposals being brought before a select Committee of Alexander's friends, Parmenio who was now old, and full of riches and honour, said, that if he were Alexander, he would accept of them, to which the King answered, that so would he, if he were Parmenio. But he returned answer to Darius, that he offered him nothing but his own, and what victory and his own valour had possesst him of; that he was to give conditions and not to receive any, and that having passed the Sea it self, he disdained to think of resistance in transporting his Army over Rivers. As for his Daughter, he said he would marry her, though without his consent, and if he would taste of his humanity, he should come and refer himself to him. Darius having received this answer, prepared himself anew for the War.

A Temple built by Sanballat on mount Gerizim.

44. Tyre being taken, Alexander invaded Judea, resolving to bring all Palestine into subjection. At this time Jaddus was the High-Priest there, whose Brother Manasses married Nicaso the Daughter of Sanballat, who had been sent from Darius to govern Samaria, being both Sons to John, called in Nehemiah, Jonathan and Johanan, who was Son to Jehoiada. Manasses thus matching himself, the people was displeased at it, and thereupon Jaddus desired him to put away his wife; not only the People but the Law so requiring it. Hereupon he repaired to his Father in Law, and told him, that his wife was dear unto him; but he must either part with her or his Priest-hood, who answered, that he would so bring it about, that he should not onely be Priest, but an High-Priest also, being minded to build for him upon Mount Gerizim near to Samaria a Temple like to that of Jerusalem, which thing he would obtain to be confirmed by Darius. Many becooke themselves to Manasses, being allured with the newnesse of the thing, and the liberality of Sanballat; but Alexander at that time passing the Hellepont, the consultation thereupon was disturbed. After Darius was beaten and retired back into Persia, Sanballat revolted unto Alexander, and going over to him with 8000 men, though now very old, desired of him leave to build his new designed Temple, perswading him it would be for his interest, that thereby the Jews being divided amongst themselves, might be the lesse able to resist him. Alexander yielding to his request, he returned, and falling with great industry upon the work, he died not long after.

45. This was at such time as Alexander lay before Tyre, during which Siege, he sent round about to demand an Oath of Allegiance, and assistance from the several Cities, and amongst the rest the messengers came to Jerusalem. Jaddus or Jaddus the High-Priest answered, That he had entred by Oath into Society with Darius, and whilst he lived he might not by any means break his Faith; with which answer Alexander being moved, after the taking of Tyre (not of Gaza as Josephus thinketh, for then he must have returned backwards) hee invaded Judea. The High-Priest and People then looked for nothing but ruine, but he imploring the assistance of God, was warned in a dream to go out and meet him, adorned with his Pontifical Vestments, with the Levites and People, as in a solemn Procession. Alexander der meeting this long train, lighted from his Horse, and adored the Priest, at which thing all the rest being amazed, Parmenio asked him the reason thereof, to whom he answered, that he worshipped not the Priest, but the God whom he served, for that whilst he was yet in Greece, and consulted about his Expedition into Asia, such an one appeared to him, advised him to it, and promised him successe. Then going up to the City he ascended to the Temple, and sacrificized according to the directions of the Priest, who shewed him the Prophecy of Daniel, wherein was foretold, that a Gracian should obtain the Empire of the Persians. He accounting himself the man rejoyced thereat, and the next day offered to the People whatsoever they would ask of him, who requested they might live after their own Laws and Customs, that on every seventh year in which they sowed not, they might pay no tribute, and that such of their Country-men as inhabited Babylon and Media, might also be left to their own Laws, all which he readily granted them. He offered them also, if they would follow him, the freedom of the exercise of their Religion, whereupon many gave their names to the Expedition; and then leading his Forces to the neighbouring Cities, he was friendly received by them.

SECT. 4.

46. The Samaritans met him in the way, desiring him to visit their City Sicrma, (seated at the foot of the Hill Gerizim, and inhabited by the Runagates of the Jewish Nation) to honour their Temple with his presence, and to remit to them also the tribute of every seventh year, they sowing not therein; for that they were Hebrews, though not Jews, as descended of Joseph and his two Sons Ephraim and Manasseh, all which he referred to his return. By this time his Officers had recovered several places that had revolted, as Callus Paphlagonia, Antigonus Lycaonia, and Balacrus Miletus, after he had overthrown Idarnes the Captain of Darius. Cilicia he had committed to the care of Socrates, the Country about Tyre to Philotas the son of Parmenio, who had delivered his charge of Cehestia to Andromachus, that he might follow the Expedition. All the Towns of Palestine he had got now into his hands, except Gaza, which Batis the Eunuch resolved to hold out against him. This was a City distant from the Sea about two miles and an half, of difficult access by reason of the depth of sand about it, the Sea near unto it being very muddy, being large, seated upon an high Rock, and compassed with a strong wall. Hither, having commanded Hephestion to go before with the Fleet, he came, and sat down before it with all his Forces.

47. Having viewed the situation of the City, he resolved that light kind of earth to be fit for digging of mines, which he commanded presently to be attempted, and seeing that no wooden turrets could be erected by the walls because of the loosenesse of the sand, he made a great heap of earth and stones to be laid, which equalled the height of the walls, on which he planted his Engines for batterie. By the advice of Aristander his Prophet, he contained himself for a time without the reach of the Arrows, but the Arabians whom Batis the Governour (called Babernes by Josephus) had hired, issuing forth set fire to the Engines, and beat away the Macedonians from the Mount, he ran in with the Targetiers to the rescue, and kept his men from running, but he himself received a wound on his shoulder. Afterwards those Engines being come by water with which he had taken Tyre, he caused the whole City to be surrounded with mounts two furlongs broad, and 250 foot high, whereby conflicting both with Engines above ground and below, at length after two moneths it was taken, the wall being broken by a Mine, at which breach the Macedonians entred. Alexander himself led in his men, and when his former wound was not yet quite cured, received a bruise on his thigh with a stone. The defendants stirred not from their places, but fighting to the last, were all slain to the number of 10000. The women and children the Conquerour made Slaves, and furnishing the City with a new Colony gathered out of the places adjacent, used it as a Garrison in the War.

over, because the War though prosperous, wasted his old stock of Soldiers, and he could not so well trust foreigners as his own subjects. Then marched he strait for Egypt, and the seventh day after his removal from Gaza arrived at that place, afterwards called Alexanders-Camp, and came to Pelusium. Here met him great multitudes of Egyptians, who being weary of the insolence and avarice of the Persians, expected his coming, and gladly received him. Placing a Garrison in Pelusium, and commanding that the ships should sayl up the River to Memphis, he having the Nile on his right hand, came, through the desert to Heliopolis, and thence crossing the River, unto Memphis, which when he approached, Mazaces the Persian Governour met him, and delivered into his hands 800 Talents, with all the royal houthold-stuff. Here he sacrificed to all the Egyptian Gods, and celebrated Games, and then sayled down the River to the Sea; and when he came to Canopus sayled about the Lake Marcotis, betwixt which and the Egyptian-Sea, he chose out a place whereon to build a Citie, which he would have called after himself Alexandria.

49. In this place towards the Sea and Haven stood there once a Village named Rhacotis. When the figure of the new Citie was to be delineated, for want of Chalk, they marked out the ground with Meal, which presently was seized upon by an innumerable company of Fowls of all sorts, that from the Sea and Lake came flocking thither, and devoured it all. Hereat the King was discouraged, but his Prophets told him, that it signified the Citie should be exceeding populous and wealthy, and nourish all sorts of men. He himself designed in what place the Forum should be, and where the Temples that were to be Consecrated to the Egyptian and Gracian Gods, and herein used the skill of that noble Architect Dinocrates (called also Stasicles) who was imployed by the Ephesians, in restoring of their Temple formerly consumed with fire. This (afterwards Famous) Citie was founded by Alexander in the fifth year of his reign, and the first of 112th Olympiad, the 417th of Nabonassar, from which year the moneth Thoth, as also the fifth of Darius, the supputation of the years of Alexander is begun by Ptolomy the Mathematician, and a Native of this Citie, A.M. 3673. 329 years before the Era of Christ.

50. Leaving the care of his new designed Citie to fit Overseers, he took a journey toward the Oracle of Jupiter Hammon, situate in the vast sandy deserts of Libya, because he had heard that Percus and Heracles had formerly gone thither; or to know his fortune, or that he might at least have occasion to boast of his knowledge of it. In the midst of the way he encountered Ambassadors sent to him from the Cyrenaans, who brought a Crown with other great gifts, amongst which were 300 excellent horses trained up and taught for the War; which receiving in good part, he entred into confederacy with them. Two great dangers especially to be met with in this journey, viz. want of water in so dry a place, and of being overwhelmed by heaps of sand, which the South-wind threw upon 50000 of Cambyses his army, he escaped wonderfully by abundance of rain which is said to have fallen, whereby the way was made more firm and passable; and two Crows are reported to have been his Guides, and in the night-time when they could not be seen, by their croaking to have given notice which way they tended. When he arrived at the Temple, the Priest, either hired to it, or mistaking the Greek language as it is thought, saluted him by the name of Jupiter's Son. Hereupon he took the name upon him, and to his Mother Olympias as well as others wrote with that Title. She facetiously checked him for slandering, and bringing her in danger with Juno, by making her an Whore to Jupiter. By the rerroure hereof he hoped to do wonders with the Barbarians, & because Hammon was painted with the upper parts like a Ram, and the nether like to a man, he also would appear to be horned, for which reason amongst the Arabians he obtained the name of Dalcamaisn. When he received an answer satisfactory, as he pretended, he returned into Egypt the same way he came, or, as another wrote, by a more direct one towards Memphis.

Amongst other sorts of people the Jews also, whose fidelity he approved, were inrolled inhabitants, having equal privilege with Gracians, and obtaining the name not onely of Alexandrians, but of Macedonians also: and to the Souldiers of Sanballat the Cuthean, who followed him into Egypt, caused he Lands to be assigned in Thebus, which Province he committed to their defence. He greatly desired to see not onely the remoter parts of Egypt, but Aethiopia also: but the War depending yet with Darius, hindred him, and therefore disposing of Egypt, he removed in the Spring thence to Tyre in Phœnicia. Over Egypt he left Æschylus the Rhodian, and Pencestes the Macedonian, with 4000 Souldiers; and the care of the River Nile he committed to Polemon with 30 Gallies. As for the Civil Government, he left it to Dolaspes the Egyptian, to rule according to the ancient Laws.

Taking the Citie Samaria, he gave it to the Macedonians to inhabit, but the Countrey about it to the Jews, for their fidelity to him, with immunity from Tribute. Coming to Tyre, he celebrated Games, as he had done at Memphis, and sacrificed again to Hercules; and nominating several Governours over the places already Conquered, took his journey towards Euphrates.

53. Darius having understood of his design, to find him out whichever he should go, gave out orders for all his Forces to meet at Babylon, whereof some consisted of such Nations as rather seemed to fill up the names of men than to make resistance. This Army being almost greater by the half than that which perished at Issus, many wanted Arms, which were sought for with all diligence. Some have reckoned 1000000 foot, and 400000 horse, besides 200 Chariots, and 15 Indian Elephants; whereas Alexander his Forces amounted but to 40000 foot, and 7000 horse. In the moneth Hecatombeon Alexander came to Thapsacus, where he found two bridges on the River Euphrates; but such as reached not quite over to the further side. Mazæus was sent thither to hinder his passage, with order also if he could not do this, to spoyl, and destroy all things in his way; but upon his approach he made haste away, and Alexander then making up the bridges, transported over all his Forces, and so proceeding through Mesopotamia, having Euphrates and the Armenian Mountains on his left hand, made for Babylon, not the nearest way, but that which was more convenient for provision and moderation of heat. As he went forwards, he was given to understand by some Scouts which he took, that the King had pitched his Camp on the further side of the River Tigris, with intentions to hinder his passage, but coming thither, he neither found him, nor any opposition at all. This River was so swift (being upon that account by the Persians called the Arrow) that by the violent force of its stream it drave many weighty stones before it, and those that lay in the bottom were made so round, and well polished by continual rolling, that no man was able to fight on so slippery a footing, so that the Macedonian foot-men to wade the River, were forced to enterlace their Arms, thereby making one weighty body to resist the fury of the stream; so deep the Chanel was on the further side, that to keep their Bowes from being wet, as also their Arrows and Darts, they were enforced to lift them above their heads, so that Darius might here have easily resisted the Macedonians, and given a check to the fortune of the Conquerour, had not the fate of the dying Persian Empire befottered his mind, and deprived him of all common prudence.

54. On the fourth day after his passage Mazæus sent a party of 1000 horse upon him, which was easily repelled by the Paonian Captain Ariston, who slew their Captain, and bringing his head to Alexander, demanded a Cup of Gold as his fee, according to the custom of their Countrey, to whom he replied, smiling, That an empty one was due, but he would give him one full of good liquor. Two dayes he here continued, giving orders for a march the next morning; but it hapned that in the first watch the Moon was Eclipsed, and seemed of a bloudy colour, whereat (as all other common people long time after) the Macedonians, not knowing the cause, were marvelously affrighted. They apprehended it as a certain token or presage of their overthrow and destruction, and began to murmur, that for the ambition of one man that disdained to own Philip as his father, and would be called the son of Jupiter, they should all perish, being forced to make War, not onely against Worlds of Enemies, but against Rivers, Mountains, and the Heavens themselves. He knowing it to be dangerous to lead his Army to fight whilest it was possessed with matter of terrour, called the Egyptian Astrologers, to assure them that this Eclipse was rather a certain presage of good successe: and he made it out onely by this reason, that the Gracians were under the Aspect of the Sun, and the Persians of the Moon; and therefore the Moon failing and being thus darkned, the Persian glory was to be Eclipsed. Aristander the Soothsayer affirmed the same, promised Alexander good successe, and affirmed a battel was to be fought in that same moneth, for the sacrifices portended victory. Hereby the Souldiers were settled, and their courage redoubled, according to the great influence of superstition upon the common sort of people.

55. Thinking it wisdom to make use of the present disposition of their minds he marched thence, and proceeded, till he heard that Darius was not much above twenty miles distant from him, upon notice whereof he rested there his Army for four dayes. Here were interrupted Letters written by Darius to the Gracians, to perswade them to kill, or betray him, which by the advice of Parmenio he suppressed, and removing thence it hapned that Statira, the Wife and Sister of Darius, through the tediousnesse of the journey, and grief, fell into untimely travel, and died, at which disaster Alexander shed tears, and spared no cost in solemnizing her Funerals, grieving that he was thus deprived of so fair an occasion of shewing mercy. One of her Chamberlaines, byname Tircos, an Eunuch, slipped away, and carried the news of her death unto Darius. He fell of beating his head, and deplored the fortune of the Persians, which not onely suffered the Queen to be taken Captive, but dying in that condition to want the Ornament of a Royal Funeral. Being satisfied that there was no want of any such Ceremonies, or of tears from his Enemy to bedew her Hearse, he fell into a jealous conceit that nothing but unchaste affections had drawn them from Alexander, and lamented his Wife's condition, who had been subjected to the lustfull power of the Conquerour. But being with much ado perswaded of his continency, with hands lifted up to Heaven, he prayed that he might be able to restore the fortune of the Persians to his posterity as he found it, that so he might be able to require Alexander for his noble carriage towards his relations: But if the fatal time was come, and it so seemed good to Nemesis, and the vicissitude of worldly things, that the Persian Empire should receive its period; that none but Alexander alone might sit in Throne of Cyrus.

56. He dispatched away to him then a new Embassy of ten of his principal friends, and offered him for his Mother, and two Daughters Ransom 30000 Talents, and in portion with his Daughter Statira all Asia, betwixt the Hellepont and the River Euphrates. He answered, that sometimes he endeavoured to corrupt his friends, and otherwhiles his Soldiers to destroy him, and that therefore he was to be prosecuted not as a just and fair enemy, but as a pernicious murderer: that what he had already gotten, though now offered to him, was the reward of War, by which the bounds of both their Kingdoms should be limited, and that they should both abide by what the fortune of the next day should assign them. Darius had before this time come to Arbela a City belonging to Babylon, where leaving the greatest part of his baggage, he went to the River Lycus, over which laying a Bridge, he passed over his Army in eight dayes, and proceeding ten miles pitched his Camp upon the River Bumelus, near to a Village called Gaugamela, which in the Persian Language signified the house of a Camel; for that Darius the Son of Hystaspis gave this place to the maintenance of a certain Camel which had been tired in carrying his provisions through the Desarts of Scythia. This was a Champain Country round about, and such grounds as were high he caused to be levelled, to be convenient for the fighting of his Horse, and that he might have a free prospect round about him.

Strabo lib. 16.

57. Understanding from his Ambassadors returning, that he must expect nothing but a battel, he sent Mazæus to defend a passage which he never yet dared so much as to hazard, the rest of the Army he caused to march above a mile farther in battel-array, and there to expect the Enemy. Alexander fortifying his Camp which he left with an ordinary guard, went forwards towards the Enemy, and in his march a pannick fear seized on his Army, by reason of the Lightning of the Heavens in the Summer season, which they took as proceeding from some attempt of Darius; with some pains he undeceived them, and thought good to fortifie himself in the same place that night. Yet in the night he departed thence about the second watch, as thinking to fall on the Enemy by break of the day. Upon his approach Mazæus with his Horse forsook an Hill which he had seized on, and returned to Darius, which place Alexander by the advice of Parmenio chose himself, as safer than the Plain, and from which one might take a full view of the Persian Army. Before the Fight his friends came to him and complained of the Soldiers, because in their conferences they had agreed to take all the profit of the plunder to themselves, without bringing any thing to his treasure; whereat he smiled, and said, they told him good news concerning the discourses of such as were resolved to overcome, and not to flie. Many then of the Soldiers resorted to him, and bad him be of good cheer, and not be afraid of the multitude of the Enemies, which would not endure their very shouting for the battel.

Plutarch in Apophthegm.

58. The two Armies lying in the view of each other, in the eleventh night after the Eclips of the Moon, Darius kept all his men in arms, mustring his Forces by torch-light, which made all the Plain betwixt Niphates and the Gordyeen mountains to be of a flame. Alexander in the mean time whilst his Macedonians took their rest, was busie in his Sacrifice with Aristander. Parmenio and others would have had him fallen upon the Persians in the dead of the night, thereby to strike more terror into them; but he answered them, that he would not steal Victory; which Darius was afraid of, and therefore contained his men in Arms all the night, which not a little injured his affairs the day following. All the night Alexander passed without sleep, being careful for the main chance; but about the morning watch fell so fast asleep, that it being full day he could hardly be awaked, and to his friends demanding the cause thereof he replied, that now he was eased by Darius of all his care, seeing he had gathered all his Forces into one place, and therefore in one day he hoped to put an end to his daily labours and danger. His whole force consisted of about 7000 Horse, and 40000 Foot, over which his chiefeft Captains were Parmenio, with Philotas and Nicanor his Sons, whereof this commanded the Foot Regiment of the Argyraspides, or Silver-Shields; Cænus, who commanded the Elimiots; Perdiccas Captain of the Orestæ and Lyncestæ; Meleager; Polysperchon; Hephestion Captain of his Life-guard; Menidas; Philip the Son of Balaccus; Craterus; Erigynus the Mitylenean; Philippus that had the Thessalian Troups, and Clytus the black who led the Kings Regiment. He himself commanded the right wing, and in both caused the battel to bee made something bending-

59. Darius having marshalled his men according to their severall Nations, took the command of the wing opposit to Alexander, and lead on against him. After a sound to the charge on both sides, and a great shout, the Armies met, and in the first place the scythed Chariots being driven with great fury upon the Macedonians, struck them with great consternation, for that Mazæus the General of the Horse following the Chariots close, made the charge the more terrible. But the Macedonian phalange, according to the King's order, bearing their Targets with their Spears, made such a noise, that the Horses skared therewith bore backwards, and retreated for the most part; and though some went still forwards, yet the Macedonians parting asunder, made a lane and let them passe through, yet with the losse of many whom the Scythes had caught. After the Arrows and Darts were spent, the Armies came to hand-strokes, wherein the Horse was first ingaged. Darius in the left wing was stoutly defended by his followers, who fighting under his eye, laboured all they could with their multitudes to oppresse the Macedonians. And Mazæus in the left wing charging with great valour, at the first onser did great execution. Then sent he a Party of 2000 Caducians, and 1000 of the choicest Scythian Horse, to fall upon the Enemies Camp, where a great tumult following, some of the captive women took their opportunity, and betook themselves to their friends, but Sisygambis Mother to Darius refused to stir, and kept her self quiet in the same place, not thinking it fit to trust her self to the doubtful fortune of an escape, or shew any ingrateful disrespect to Alexander: the Scythians plundred most of the baggage and departed.

Darius flieth.

60. In the mean while, part of the Horse that fought about Darius, with their multitudes pressed fore upon the Macedonians, and forced them back, whereby the second time the Victory seemed to incline towards the Persians. Alexander seeing how he was concernd to relieve his men, broke out with his own Regiment upon Darius himself, and with a Dart slew his Chariot-driver. The Courtiers hereupon crying out, those that were further off supposed the King himself to have been slain, and therewithall betook themselves to their heels, which the next seeing fled also for company. The ranks also about Darius began to be broken, till at length all one side was bared, and then he accounted it also time to fly, and therewithall such a dust was raised, Alexander with his Troops giving the chase, that it could not be discovered which way he fled, using great celerity therein, and for that purpose mounted a Mare that had lately foaled, as he had done before at the battle at Iffus. Whilst these things were thus carried in the left wing, Mazæus in the right fore pressed upon his adversaries, which Parmenio with the Thessalian Horse and other for a time sustained; but being put sore to it, he sent to Alexander for speedy relief. But he could not be found; so that he was forced to use his utmost skill in making the Thessalians endure the brunt; and at length put the Barbarians to flight, after they were disheartned with the report of their Princes fortune.

The number slain.

61. Darius with a few in his company came to the River Lycus, which having passed, when some advised him to break down the Bridge, lest the Enemy should make use thereof in the pursute, knowing that if he should do so, he must leave many thousands of his men as a prey to him, he answered, that he had rather afford way to the pursuers, than take it from those that fled. Here Alexander immediately pursued him, but not being able to reach him, he returned, and fought a more sharp encounter than ever with some Parthians, Indians, and many of the valiantest of the Persians, wherein though he had the better, yet he lost Sixty of his followers, and Hephestion with Cænus and Mendæus were wounded. Of the Barbarians (a) one maketh above 90000 to have been slain, of the Macedonians 500, and many wounded. Alexander declared King of Asia.

Entereth Babylon.

62. Darius fled from the River Lycus to Arbela, where he arrived about midnight, and then concluding that Alexander would march to Babylon and Susa, resolved to flee into the utmost borders of his Kingdom, there to renew the War; and accordingly withdrew himself into Media, beyond the Mountains of Armenia. About midnight Alexander set forwards for Arbela, hoping to take him there with all his treasure; but arriving there the next day, he found not him, but met with much treasure, with his Bow and Targer. Now seemed the Empire of the Persians to all men to be dissolved, and thereupon Alexander was declared King of Asia, and for joy thereof sacrificed with great magnificence to his Gods, and bestowed riches, houses, and Countries upon his friends. Foreseeing that the air thereabouts, by reason of the corruption of the dead bodies might be infectious, he removed with all speed from Arbela towards Babylon, being in his way met with Mazæus the Governour, who gave it up into his hands, and Bagophanes the Keeper of the Castle and the King's treasures, lest he should be exceeded by Mazæus, caused the way to be strowed with flowers and garlands; silver Altars heaped with Frankincense and other odours being placed on both sides. The Townsmen came also to meet him, whom he commanded to follow his rear, and so entered the City and Palace in a Chariot, with his armed men about him. Thirty dayes he spent in * looking over Darius's his householdstuff, all which time his Army glutted themselves with the contentments of the Town. Here the Chaldeans shewed him the motions of the Stars, and the appointed vicissitudes of times: and Calisthenes the Philosopher sent into Greece unto Aristotle (whose cousin german his Mother was) the Cælestial observations of (a) 1903 years. He consulted these men about his affairs, and at their desire caused such Temples to be rebuilt, as Xerxes had out of anger destroyed, after his overthrow in Greece. And especial care was taken for that of Belus in the midst of the City, the ruins of which were so great, that the labour of (b) 10000 men for two moneths was required for the clearing of the ground. He commanded all his Soldiers to lay their hands to the work, amongst which the Jews onely refused to do it, who thereupon received great incommodity, till such time as they were discharged of this task by the King, as (c) Hecateus the Abderite wrote in his Book concerning the Jews, who also at that time lived with Alexander.

To Apollodorus of Amphipolis, and Menetos of Pella, he assigned the Government of the Militia of the Satrapies of Babylon, and the other Countries as far as Cilicia, leaving them 2000 Foot, and 1000 talents of silver, to hire as many Solders as they could; and to Mithrinus who betrayed the Castle of Sardis unto him; he granted Armenia. Of the money which he found at Babylon, to every Macedonian Horse-man he gave seven Minae (each Attick Mina containing an 100 Drachmes, and about 3 l. 2 s. 6 d. Sterling) and to every stranger five; to every Macedonian Foot-man two, and to every stranger two moneths pay, for a reward. Then set he forwards from Babylon, and in his way met with a supply of 500 Horse, and 6000 Foot, sent out of Macedonia, with 600 Horse out of Thrace, and 3500 Foot; and out of Peloponnesus 4000 Foot,

Susa.

64. Drawing near to Susa, he met with the son of the Satrapa thereof, sent unto him with a Messenger that brought Letters from Philoxenus, whom presently after the battel at Gaugamela he had sent thither. The Letters imported that the Susians had yielded their Citie to him, and that all the King's Treasure was safe for him, which Abulites the Satrapa sent his son also to signifie, either for that he sought to obtain favour, or as some thought, being underhand ordered by Darius to do so; that Alexander being busied with such booty, he might have time to consult the better for his own affairs. On the twentieth day after his departure from Babylon he arrived at Susa, where he took possession of betwixt fourty and fifty thousand (as is to be gathered from all Authors) Talents of Silver, besides Gold and Rich Furniture. Many things he there found, which Xerxes had brought out of Greece, and amongst the rest the brazen Statues of Harmodius and Aristogiton, which he sent back unto Athens. He left the Mother and Children of Darius at Susa, with Masters to teach them the Greek tongue, and then committing the Citie to the care of Archelaus, the Castle to Xenophilus, the Treasury to Callicrates, and the Satrapy of the Countrey of Susa to Abulites, in four encampings he came to the River Pasitigris, being resolved to invade Persia.

65. Near to the Countrey of Susa lieth that of the Uxians, running out into the Borders of Persia, and leaving a straight passage betwixt it self and the Susian Dominions. The inhabitants of the low-land Countrey became without much ado subject to Alexander; but the other with some slaughter of them he forced to submit; and whereas they demanded money of him which they used to receive from the Kings of Persia for their passage, he imposed a Tribute of 100 Horses, 500 Cattel, and 30000 Sheep yearly to be paid, they living like Shepherds, and using no money. After this he committed the baggage, with the Thessalian Horse, the Mercenaries and Associates, with the rest of the Army that used heavy Armour, to Parmenio, to lead that way into Persia, that was passable with Carriages, and he himself taking the Macedonian foot with the horse of the associates, and others, with all speed marched a nearer one through the hilly Countrey. Being arrived at the Pyla, or Straights of Persia, he found Ariobarzanes, a Persian Satrapa, seized thereof, by whom he was repelled also with some disgrace and losse, being forced to retreat four miles from the Straights; but at length being led by a Shepherd, another difficult way, he came upon his Enemies on a sudden, and put them to flight. But Ariobarzanes in the midst of near fourty horse, and 5000 foot, with great slaughters on both sides broke through the Army of the Macedonians, which on both sides had beset him, and made for Persopolis the chief Citie of that Countrey, but being shut out by those that kept it for the Conquerour, he turned again upon his Enemies, and with great valour renewing the battel, perished with all his followers.

66. Having private notice from Tiridates the Eunuch, Keeper of the Treasure at Persopolis, that they there had an intention to rifle it upon hearing of his coming, he took the horse, and all the night marched thitherwards. Being a quarter of a mile from the Town, about 800 Grecians met him in manner of suppliants, whom the former Persian Kings had reduced into bondage, and as a token of slavery cut off their Feet, Hands, Ears, or Noses, and having marked them with some Barbarian Letters, kept them as laughing stocks for derision. They besought Alexander, that as he had done by Greece, so he would also deliver them from the cruelty of their Enemies. He offered them to send them back, but they rather chose to receive some grounds to live on, than returning home to carry greater disgrace than comfort to their relations. To each of them then he gave 3000 Drachms, and 10 Garments, with Cattel, Sheep, and Corn, for the stocking of their grounds. The next day he called a meeting of his Officers, whom he he told how there was no Citie more inveterate against the Gracians than that, which had been the Seat of the Persian Kings, and that therefore by the destruction of it they were to make a Parentation to their Ancestors. The Town, all besides the Palace, he allowed the Souldiers to plunder, who made a great slaughter of Captives, and got unestimable riches in that place, which heretofore of all they had been most secure. Entering the Castle, he received the Treasure which there had been heaped up from the time of Cyrus the Great, containing a great quantity of Gold and Silver. Diodorus saith, he took thence 120 Talents, Gold being reckoned at the reckoning of silver, part of which he employed in the present service of the War, and the rest sent to Susa to be kept.

He harrazeth
of Persia.

67. Leaving a Garrison in Persopolis, and a great part of the Army with the baggage there, with 1000 horse, and a party of foot, he made an invasion into Persia. Much rain fell, and grievous Tempests ensued, but he persevered in his purpose, and also when they came to such places as were full of Snow and Ice, and though the inhabitants fled from their Cottages to the Mountains, and killed his stragglers, yet he brought them to submit, and laying waste the Territories of Persia, subdued also the Mardi, a warlike Nation, differing much from the customs of the other Persians; and on the 30th day returned to Persopolis. Then did he distribute gifts to his friends, making no spare of Treasure, and there he wintred four moneths, rather enervating than refreshing his Army with the delicacies of the place. For the celebration of his victories he offered magnificent sacrifices, and feasted his friends Princely; and to the feast admitted Courtisans. Amongst the rest was Thais the Athenian, the Mistresse of Ptolomy the son of Lagus. She gave out that the King would atchieve a most gallant Enterprize, if in a frolick he would with them set on fire the Palace, and thereby in one moment overthrow the glory of the Persians by the hands of women. This finding acceptance amongst the younger sort, now in the midst of their Cups, one amongst them desired that they might now revenge the injuries offered to the Temples of the Greeks with burning fire-brands, which was seconded by others; but yet they said, that so great an affair did onely belong to Alexander. He being moved hereat, was led out by Thais in a dance with the Minstrels, and she receiving a fire-brand from him, first set it to the Palace, after which all the rest followed, and so that structure was reduced into ashes. Thus was the fury of Xerxes against Athens revenged by a Woman, and Native of that Citie, in the same way, though accompanied with derision. But Alexander afterward repented too late, alleging that he should more grievously have punished the Persians, by forcing them to behold him seated in the Palace, and Throne of Xerxes.

Pasagada.

68. From Persopolis he removed to Pasagada, a Citie founded by Cyrus the Great, and the ancient Seat of the Persian Kings, which being delivered up to him by Gobases the Governour, he therein found 6000 Talents. Here he saw the Sepulchre of Cyrus in a Garden, into which he commanded Aristobulus (who wrote the story) to enter, who there found a golden Bed, a Table, and Cups, with a golden Basket, and great store of Apparel, and Robes adorned with Pearl. On this place Cyrus overthrew Astyages the Mede in his last battel, and thereby obtaining the Sovereignty of Asia, in memorial of it built this Citie, and a Palace, which being by Curtius named Persagada, or Pasagada, signifieth the Army of the Persians. Then Alexander either by force, or fair means, became Master of all the other Cities of Persia, about the time of the rising of the seven Stars, from which the ancients used to begin their Summer. He placed over this Countrey Phraortes a Sarrapa, and then, being minded to pursue Darius, set forwards for Media, where he heard he was; but being within three dayes journey of Echatane, there met him Bisthanes the son of Ochus, who reigned before Darius. He assured him that the King was gone thence five dayes before, having taken with him 7000. or 8000 Talents, and being accompanied with an Army of 6000 foot, and 3000 horse.

What Darius did after the battel of Gaugamela.

69. Darius staid at Ecbatane some time to receive such of his Soldiers as had escaped the battel ; and for the furnishing of them with Arms. He raised forces in the Neighbouring Nations, and sent to the Satrapa of Bactria, and the higher Countreys, to retain them in obedience. And he determined, that if Alexander should stay about Babylon, or Susa, to continue in Media in expectation of some better change of fortune ; but if he should pursue him, then to betake himself into Parthia, or as far as Bactria, and lay all the Countrey waste as far as he passed, to cut off the provisions of the pursuer. He sent therefore the women with all his Furniture and Carriages to the Caspian Straights, and staid himself, with such forces as he had raised, at Ecbatane, till such time as Alexander was within lesse then two hundred miles of him. Then thought he of Bactria ; but fearing to be overtaken by Alexander (against whose celerity no distance seemed to be sufficient) he changed his purpose, and though he fled, yet prepared he himself rather for a fight than flight. His Army consisted now (according to Curtius) of 30000 foot (whereof 4000 were Greacians, Commanded by Patron, (a man for his constant fidelity to Darius, never enough to be commended) and 3300 Bactrian horse, under the Command of Bessus the Satrapa of the Countrey.

Curtius lib. 7.

Alexander pursued him.

70. Alexander being come to Ecbatane, sent back towards the Sea the Thessalian horse, and other associates, bestowing on them, besides their full pay, 2000 Talents. To Parmenio he gave in charge to bring all the Treasure out of Persia into Ecbatane to be committed to the trust of Harpalus, whom he left with a Garrison of 6000 Macedonians, besides some horse, and of the associates ; and then afterwards he ordered him to march through the Countrey of the Cadusians into Hyrcania. Clitus he commanded to go with his own Regiment into Parthia whither he himself intended to come, but now with a select party with incredible speed pursued Darius, and in eleven Encampings came to Rhaga. Here seeing no hope ever to reach him, who before this had passed the Caspian Straights) he staid five dayes, and then marched for Parthia, and on the first day pitch't his Camp by the Straights, and on the next having entred them, news was brought to him concerning the Captivity of Darius.

Bessus and others bind Darius.

71. For Bessus the Satrapa of Bactria, and Nabarzanes a Colonel of horse, though his own servants, rebelled against him, and drawing their men to their party, caused him to be bound, with an intention if Alexander should overtake them, to curry favour with him by the delivery of such a prisoner into his hands ; but if they should escape, then to kill him, seize upon his Kingdom, and renew the War. They seized on his money and stuff, and taking into their society Brazus, or Barzaentes, the Satrapa of the Arachoti and Drangi, lead him away Captive in a Chariot, bound in Golden Fetters, as be seemed so great a King, but yet, lest he should be known, they covered over the Chariot with bafe skins, and unknown men drove it, his keepers following aloof off, lest he should be discovered to any that asked of him. The Persians having none now to follow, joyned themselves to the Bactrians, and with the rest owned Bessus for their General. But Arrabazus with his Sons and Soldiers, as also the Greeks (whose Captain was Patron) separated themselves from them, and taking another way towards the Mountains out of the high road, departed, and went into Parthiene.

72. Upon notice of this conspiracy Alexander concluded that more haste was to be used, and therefore taking along with him a party fit for such expedition, he left the rest of the Army to Craterus to come after with more leisure, and travelling all that night, and the next day till noon, gave his men a little time to rest, and then again setting forward, came the next morning to that place where Bagistenes the Babylonian (who brought him notice of the condition of Darius) had departed. Then again marching fast that night, and the day following, untill noon, he came unto the place where Bessus laid hands on Darius, as * one telleth us ; but, as * another, where they that conducted him had rested the day before. himself a fugitive, and fully acquainted Alexander with the King's condition. He hereby was further quickened up to use all expedition, but his men spent with continual travel must needs have rest, and therefore he made 500 Horse-men to dismount, and the Officers of Foot, and others most valiant amongst them to take their Horses, being arrived as before, that so they might be both Horse and Foot-men as need should require.

Alexander's approaching mortally wounded him.

73. Whilst he was thus busied, Ossilos and Mithracenes, two Persians who detested the Paricide of Bessus, came back from him, and acquainted Alexander that he was 500 furlongs off, but that they could lead him a nearer way, whereby he might soon overtake him. With this conduct he began his journey that night, and being come 300 furlongs encountered Brocubelus (or Antibelus) the Governour once of Syria under Darius, who told him that Bessus was but 200 furlongs off, that as he thought he made for Hyrcania, and marched out of order as fearing no danger, and therefore might easily be surprised. He then continued his industry to overtake him, but he and his complices had notice of his approaching, and coming to Darius, bad him mount on Horse-back, and withdraw himself by flight from the Enemy. He refusing to do this, Salibarzanes and Barzaentes threw darts upon him, and leaving him mortally wounded, wounded also the Horses that drew him, lest they should follow far, and killed two Slaves which accompanied him, having none now to follow him but a Dog which he had brought up. Having done this, the murderers with 600 fled with full speed, and that they might not venture altogether, Narbarzanes went towards Hyrcania, and Bessus with a few Horse-men in his company kept on the way for Bactria. The rest of their men stragled, as they were led, either by hope or fear: 500 Horse-men imbodied themselves, not knowing, whether to flie, or to receive and fight the pursuing Enemies.

But Alexander having notice of the fear and anxiety of the Enemy, sent Nicanor with part of the Horse on before, to restrain their flight, he with the rest following after, and when they were come up, so little courage appeared in the Persians, that though they resisted, yet 3000 were presently slain, and the rest stragled about like sheep, Alexander giving command then to his Soldiers to abstain from slaughters. Now appeared an incredible thing, more prisoners than they that took them, whilst the conquered were so stupified that they neither considered their own multitude, nor the small number of their Enemies. In the mean while the beasts that drew Darius having none to drive them, wandred out of the way for half a mile, and being wearied both by their wounds and heat, stood still in a certain Valley. Not far off was a certain Spring, to which Polystratus a Macedonian being directed, came almost spent with thirst, and whilst he was drinking water in his helmer, he espied the Horses fainting away, by reason of the darts sticking in their sides, and drawing near to consider of the matter, found Darius in the Chariot sorely wounded, but yet breathing. He desired some water of him to drink, which though none of the best, yet he said was the best that ever he drunk. He desired him to carry his thanks to Alexander for his great humanity and courtesie towards his relations. As for himself, he desired rather a seemly than noble burial, but bad him put Alexander in mind how dangerous it would be to all Princes to suffer his death to go unpunished. He wished him the Empire of the whole World, and gave his hand to Polystratus as though to be presented to Alexander; after which wishing him a reward, for his kindnesse, from the gods, he expired.

A view of his reign.

This was the end of the Life, Reign, and Empire of Darius, a man who, if we look at warlike matters, was fit for nothing lesse, but in other things did nothing unbeseeming Royal Majesty. And neither could he; for as soon as he began to reign, was he vexed by the Macedonians. Whilst he lived, one crosse presently succeeded after another: neither could he enjoy any rest from the beginning of his reign. For within a while after, he received that overthrow at the River Granicus; then lost he Æolia, Ionis, and both the Phrygiaes: the Lydians also and Carians (all but the Hallicarnassians) and not long

SECT. 4. long after Halicarnassus it self, and then all the Maritime Coast as far as Cilicia. After this he received a great overthrow at Iffus, in which his Mother, Wife, and Children were taken: Phœnicia and Ægypt fell off from him. At Arbela (or Gaugamela) losing a mighty Army consisting of all sorts of people, he disgracefully was forced to flie, then driven from his Kingdom, wandering up and down, and wanting due accommodations, at last he was betrayed by his own servants, and at the same time both a King and Captive, was ignominiously bound in fetters, and perished by the treachery of those, from whom he should have expected safety, as Arrianns writeth. This hapned in the year that Aristophanes was Archon at Athens, in the month Hecatombæon, vvhhen he had lived about fifty years, in the seventh year of his reign, and the 203^d of this Empire, in the third year of the 112th Olympiad, A. Polycrates.

1. IN the time of Cyrus the Great, and afterwards, lived Polycrates the famous Tyrant of Samus, who from a small beginning arrived at such extraordinary power, as no petty Prince of the Greekish Nation was ever accounted equal to him for worldly felicity.

The word Tyrannus or Tyrant whence derived, and whom it significeth,

2. The word Tyrannus (which we English Tyrant) Suidas thinketh to have been derived from the Tyrrheni, a people of Italy, because they were cruel and given to robbery. Others thought it was derived of the City Tyre, by means of it's riches and glory. Most anciently the word was of no ill signification, but was used in a good sense, there being no discrimination betwixt King and it, as * Servius observeth. For, though Homer (who never mentioneth Tyre) either knew it not, or would not use it, yet the Poets who follow him, call those Kings that lived before the Trojan times by the appellation of Tyranni. Afterwards through the dissolute and cruel demeanour of some Princes, and the antipathie of the Greeks towards Monarchy (after they had generally erected Oligarchical or Democratical Governments) it came to be taken in a bad sense. Herein it is especially given to those, who, being once private persons, enslaved their Citizens by invading, without any just title, the supreme power; as to Polycrates, Pisistratus, Dionysius, and Agathocles. It's also applied to the Children who succeeded their Fathers in the usurpation. And it is also given sometimess to those who governed by the desire and consent of the People, as Gelon of Syracuse, betokening, as to this particular, a petty Prince or Regulus. For it is seldom or never in antient Authors, when it is taken in an ill sense, found applied to any but the usurping Lords of Cities (not any notable Kingdom) and such Cities as had before been governed in the way of a Commonwealth. And what is said of those Governours called Tyranni, must be extended to their Government, in the Greek

Greek language called Tyrannis, which we english Tyranny, though not in any ill sense, wherein the Athenians used it not when they would have Solon to take the Tyrannis or Government upon him, though the word was harsh. This is hinted to take off any thoughts of the ignorant, as if the word reflected upon Monarchy, the best of Governments when all shall be considered.

3. Samus is an Island in the Mediterranean Sea, lying over against Ionia, not far severed from it, containing in circuit scarce 100 miles, so called from the height of it by the Antients in their Language. On the West it looks towards the Island Icaria, but on the East the continent of Asia, being near to Ephesus, and the promontory of Mysale, from which it is distant but five miles. The most ancient Inhabitants were Carians differing much from the Greeks both in language and manners. But when the sons of Codrus led out Colonies from Attica, Androclus one of them here settled one, by which the City of the same name with the Island was built; having a very large and commodious Haven. It was presently much beautified with frequency of Inhabitants, riches, and multitudes of buildings, and being very famous for the Temple of Juno, which was especially worshipped in this place, it was reckoned amongst the twelve Ionian Cities, being partaker of the great Council of Panionium, and counted not inferiour to Miletus, Ephesus, or Chius, the most eminent amongst them. From Herodotus it should appear to have at first been governed by Kings, the Inhabitants as he saith, in the reign of Amphicrates, making War upon Ægina which was hurtful to both sides: and this was the cause that in the Age following the Æginetans did as much by the Samian exiles which had retired into Crete. But in what Age Amphicrates lived he doth not mention; yet this is apparent from his words, that the Samians because Islanders remained untouched by the King of Lydia and Persia, when the other Ionian Cities in the continent were forced by them into subjection.

4. But when Cyrus flourished in Asia, and Pisistrates at Athens, Polycrates the Son of Æaces one of their own Citizens offered violence to their liberty. When first he seized on the Sovereignty, he made his two Brothers Pantagnotus and Syloson partners with him, but afterwards he slew the one, and ejected the yonger, and so having all the power in his own hands, he contracted amity with Amasis, who at that time reigned in Ægypt. In a short time his affairs so prospered, that he became famous through Ionia and all Greece, for wheresoever he made War he prospered, with his 100 Biremes or Gallies with two ranks of Oars on a side, and 1000 Archers, invading all his neighbours without any difference, for that he held it for a rule, that he gratified his friend more by restoring what he had taken from him, than if he had taken nothing away. He subdued many Islands and many Towns in the continent. The Lesbians coming to help their friends of Miletus with all their force, he overthrew, and took so many, as served him to draw a ditch round about the walls of Samus. His affairs being thus prosperous, were not unknown to Amasis, but being every day more prosperous than other, at length Amasis suspected that his friend and allie for this prosperous Fortune would have some disastrous end, and therefore he wrote to him, and desired him that to make some certain change therein, he would pick out that which was most dear to him, and in the losse whereof he would be most troubled, and make that away, so that he should never more enjoy it. He accordingly took ship and cast into the Sea his signet, which was an Emerald set in a gold ring; but it so happed, that a Fisher taking a very large fish, presented it to him as onely worthy of it, and in the belly of it his Servants, when they cut it up, found the signet. Amasis hearing this, took such assurance that an unfortunate end must follow such prodigious successe, that lest hee should be troubled with the miscarriage of a friend and allie, hee renounced his friendship.

5. When Cambyses was raising his forces for his Expedition into Ægypt, Polycrates sent to him underhand, to desire him to send for some supplies.

who doing so, he picked out such as he thought were most prone to rebellion, and with them manned out two Triremes, desiring of him that he would not send them back. Yet they after the War withdrew themselves from Cambyfes, and went to Lacedamon to desire aid of that State against the Tyrant, which was granted them, either for that the Lacedamonians were engaged to the Samians (as these pretended) because they had received supplies from them in the Messinian War, or as the Spartans alleged, not out of any kindnesse, but malice to the Samians, because they had in the Age foregoing intercepted certain presents sent by them to Craesus, and to them from Amasis. The Corinthians were also drawn in, having a particular quarrel of their own; the occasion was also given at the same time, the Samians having taken from the Corinthians certain Boyes which they were carrying from Periander their Tyrant to Alyattes King of Sardis to be made Eunuchs.

6. The Lacedamonians coming with a great Fleet to Samus, besieged the City, but endeavouring the storming of it were repulsed with some losse, and having in vain spent forty dayes in the Siege (so valiantly was it defended by Polycrates) they then returned home into Peloponnesus. A story went, that Polycrates stamped some Lead, and covering it over with Gold, with it purchased the departure of the Lacedamonians; but this was the first Expedition which the Dores made against Asia. Afterwards at such time as Cambyfes fell sick, that fell upon Polycrates which Amasis had forewarned him of. At this time one Orates a Persian was Governour of Sardis, Ionia, Lydia, and the Sea-coasts, in the place of Harpagus, who either for that he was upbraided that he got not Samus, so near to his Province, into the King's hand, or for that Polycrates slighted and gave no answer to a messenger which he sent to him (both which are reported) sought earnestly to work his destruction. Knowing he had an ambition to become Master of Ionia and the Islands, he sent to him to tell him that he heard how excellent things he cast in his head, but that he wanted money to accomplish them, wherefore he having now heard for certain that Cambyfes determined to kill him, offered to him, that if he would receive him he should have half of the King's money which he had in his possession, whereby he might get the Sovereignty of all Greece. And if he doubted of his faithfulness, he desired him to send one of his most trusty servants to whom he would give satisfaction.

7. Polycrates with great joy received the message, being greedy after money, and to make the thing sure, sent Maandrius his Secretary over to Orates, who knowing him a cunning and circumspect man, filled several chests with stones, and covering them at the top with gold, thereby deceived him. Polycrates was yet dissuaded by all his friends from going over himself, for that the Oracles were against it, and his Daughter dreamed that she saw him up aloft in the air, where he was washed by Jupiter, and annointed by the Sun; but he was angry with her for her importunity, and notwithstanding all dissuasions went over to Orates, taking with him amongst others, Democedes the Son of Calliphon of Crotone in Italy, the most famous Physician then in his Country. He went over into Magnesia as far as the River Maander, and then Orates laying hold of him, nailed him to a crosse. Of those that accompanied him, the Samians he dismissed, telling them that they must account it for a great favour so to be used by him, but all the Strangers and Slaves he took to himself, and reduced them into the State of servitude. This end had Polycrates, with whom none of the Syracusan Tyrants, or any other of Greece for magnificence were to be compared. Him succeeded one Maandrius his Vicegerent or Procurator, of whom Herodotus telleth many stories, and who by the help of Otanes the Persian Satrapa, being removed, by the approbation of Darius the Son of Hystapes, Syloson the Brother of Polycrates succeeded, Samus paying very dearly for it, what by the War and the ensuing severity of Syloson. When Syloson died, Aeaces his Son succeeded him, by the favour of the Persians; but was not long after thrust from his Tyranny, when Aristagoras the Milesian drew all Ionia into rebellion against the Persians; which hapned about the eighteenth year of Darius.

8. In the second year of Darius, and the first of the 65th Olympiad, the inhabitants of Plæa in Bœotia, who never well accorded with their Neighbours the Thebans, being now irritated with their continual injuries, that for the future they might free themselves from such grievances, sent, and offered themselves to the Lacedæmonians (who then were of greatest Authority in Greece) as Allies and Dependents. But they perceiving themselves to be at too great a distance from them to give any succours when need required, advised them to have recourse to the Athenians as nearer to them, and of sufficient ability to relieve them. They accordingly did so, and contracted a straight league of Alliance with Athens, which became a great eye-sore to the Thebans, and all their party a long time after.

9. In the third year of the 65 Olympiad, and the 8th of the reign of Darius, fell out great stir at Athens, which never ceased till they produced a change in the Government. Pisistratus the famous Tyrant at his death left three sons, Hippias, Hipparchus, & Theſſalus, and the principality (as it should seem from * Hæraclides) to them all; though Hippias, as the eldest, had Supreme Jurisdiction. He had hitherto for the space of thirty years enjoyed his fathers Kingdom, being loving and affectionate towards his brethren, and moderate towards his subjects: Hipparchus was accounted a wise man, and lover of learning, being something given to be amorous, and Theſſalus bold, and head-strong. It happened that Hipparchus fell in love with one Harmodius, a young man of the Citie, and sorely solicited him to unlawfull dalliance, who therewith acquainted one Aristogiton, a man of a middle rank amongst the Citizens, and who most passionately loved him. He fearing he should be deprived of this his dear one, consulted with himself how he might destroy, both Hipparchus and the Tyranny. Hipparchus still going on to sollicite Harmodius, but in vain, at length resolved to be revenged on him, and executed it on his sister, which being on a certain solemnity to carry up the basket that was to be dedicated to Minerva, he put her by as unworthy of the office; though some of late have thought that he ravished her.

10. Harmodius taking this in very evil part, and Aristogiton much worse, prepared all things necessary for their conspiracy; but expected the great feast called Panathenæa, on which day onely the Citizens might be in Armour without suspicion, for discharging the solemnity. They provided not many men before hand, for the more close carrying of the business, and because they hoped all the rest would without any hesitation be ready to come in to them. When the day came, they and their party being ready with their Poniards, espied a man talking with Hippias; Whereupon they thought they were discovered, and therefore resolved to do that, wherein especially they were concerned, if they could, and so rushing in violently upon Hipparchus, they slew him in the place. Aristogiton defended himself for some time from the Guard; but the multitude flocking in, he was taken, after he had received many wounds, and his friend Harmodius slain outright. Hippias having notice of what had passed, came cunningly upon the Citizens that were Armed for the solemnity, and by his Guard picking out such as had Daggers about them, or whom he suspected, thereby prevented at this time all further trouble.

11. Hitherto he and his brethren had not been distrustfull of their own safety, and therefore had used no great Guards about them; not rendring their power very burthensom to the people, but acting according to the rules of vertue and prudence. They exacted onely the 20th part of the publick revenue, exceedingly beautified the Citie, waged War, and left the Citizens to their former Laws; onely some one of them was alwayes Magistrate, and other men held of them yearly Offices, Pisistratus the son of Hippias, and Nephew to the founder of this Kingdom, as it appeareth from Thucydides, having sometimes had the power in his hands. But Hippias after this, fearing himself, exercised his power very severely against the Athenians, putting many of them to death, and to establish himself by forein alliance he gave his daughter in marriage to Hippias, the son of Æantides the Tyrant of Lampſacus, knowing them to be in great grace with Darius King of Persia. To find out the complices of these two young men, he tortured, amongst others, a woman named Loena the Paramour of Aristogiton, but she was so constant as to endure all, and biting off her tongue, spit it in the face of the Tormentors, lest therewith she should discover any one; in memory of which the Athenians afterwards Consecrated in the Castle a Lioness without a tongue, as also Erected Statues to the memory of Harmodius and Aristogiton, as the liberators of their Countrey. These Statues were taken away by Xerxes into Asia, and long after sent back by Alexander, or Antiochus, or Seleucus, as is severally delivered by Historians. They also Decreed that their names should never be given to any slaves.

12. Though these two did not actually procure the freedom of Athens, but perished in the attempt, yet it was attributed to them, because that in the 4th year after, some imitating their example expelled Hippias, & effectually procured it. At this time the Alcmaonide (or those of the family of Alcmaon, who was great Grand-son to Nestor, and being cast out of Messenia by the Heraclide, came and lived at Athens) being driven into exile by the Pisistratide (or Pisistratus his sons) having sometimes endeavoured in vain the recovery of their Countreys liberty, still lay in wait for a more convenient opportunity to accomplish it. Being full of money, they hired the Amphyctiones to let them build a new Temple at Delphos, which was very magnificent, and corrupted the Pythia (or the woman that received and delivered the Oracles, standing in a Tripod, or three footed stool) as often as any of Sparta came thither, still to propose to them to set Athens at liberty. This being constantly done, the Lacedæmonians accounted it a piece of their religion to do it, and sent Anchimolius, a man of prime Rank amongst them, with an Army to expell the Pisistratide, though their friends, and such as had deserved no otherwise than well of them. They being aware of this, had contracted friendship and alliance with the Theſſalians, and now procured from them a supply of 1000 horse, which by a common decree they sent under the Command of Cixæas their King; which falling in upon the Camp of the Spartans, slew amongst many others Anchimolius the General, and beat the other to their ships, in which they returned home.

13. Afterwards the Lacedæmonians sent another Army by Land, under the Conduct of Cleomenes the son of Anaxandridas, who invading the Athenian Territories was encountered by the Theſſalian horse, which he put to flight, and having killed above forty of them, the rest shifted away, and betook themselves as they could into Theſſaly. Cleomenes then coming up to the Citie besieged the Tyrants, being shut up within the Pelaſgick-wall, but being unprovided for a siege, and they furnished sufficiently with provisions, after a few dayes he was about to depart homeward, had not one thing fallen out. As the Children of the Pisistratide were privately to be conveyed out of the Countrey, they were intercepted, which overturned the affairs of their Parents, and forced them to Covenant with the Athenians, for their Ransom, within five dayes to depart out of Attica, which accordingly was done, Hippias going straight to Sigæus, & thence to Lampſacus, from which place he went to Darius, and in the 20th year after returned with his Army, and died (as some say) in the battel at Marathon. Sigæus was a Town situate upon the Helleſpont, which Pisistratus took by force out of the hands of the Mityleneans, and made Hegesistratus his base son, by a woman of Argos, Tyrant there. Hippias was offered from Amyntas the King of Macedonia, either Anthemus, or Iolcor, a Citie in Macedonia; but he refused both, and betook himself to Darius, whose Army he afterwards conducted into Attica.

14. The State of Athens great before, grew greater after this grand mutation, in which two men contended for the chief Authority: Clisthenes one of the Alcmaonide (the Nephew by his Mother of Clisthenes, the Tyrant of Sicyon) and Isagoras the son of Tisander. Clisthenes being too weak for the other's Civil Wars betwixt Isagoras and Clysthenes.

15. Isagoras envying Clysthenes that respect, which hereby he obtained, procured Cleomenes the King of Sparta (with whom he had contracted friendship during the War with Hippias) to come once more against Athens. He sent a Messenger first, and presently procured him to be banished, and yet came thither with an Army, and besides many of the family of Alcmaeon formerly cast out with Clysthenes, now also expelled 700 families proper for War, under pretence of their being contaminated with them in the businesse of the death of Cylon. Then endeavoured he to dissolve the Senate, and commit their power to those of Isagoras his faction; but both Senate and people resisting, Isagoras and he with their men seized on the Castle wherein they were besieged two dayes: On the third the Lacedæmonians with Isagoras had leave to depart, but the rest were cast into prison, and put to death. Then was Clysthenes with the 700 families recalled, who restored the Democratical Government to the Citie, as it was founded by the Laws of Clysthenes restoreth Solon's Laws.

16. To Clysthenes is also ascribed the introducing of the Ostracism into the Athenian State, being generally granted to have been brought in a little after the banishment of the Pisistratide. For, considering the calamities which had hapned in their time, the Athenians for the time to come would have all of equal power and authority. By the Ostracism therefore they forced absence from the Citie for ten years upon the most powerfull amongst them for Glory, Nobility, or Eloquence, lest they should grow too great; without any ignominy, or disgrace; they being neither deprived of Goods, Lands, or any thing, save their presence at home for that time. The form of it was this. Each of the Citizens wrote the name of that man in an Oyster shell (whence it had the name of Ostracism) who seemed to him to be the most powerfull for the overturning of the Democracy, and then brought the shell in as a suffrage into the place designed, and so he that was found to have most written with his name, was for ten years ordered to leave the Citie. But two conditions were required that this judgement should stand in force: That no fewer then 6000 should be at the meeting, and the giving of suffrages; and that those that gave them should be no younger than sixty years old. The first that was banished by this Law, was (as Ælian tells us) Clysthenes the Author of it, though (according to another) Hipparchus, and Charmus Kinsman to Pisistratus: In after times Aristides, because of that great Title Just given to him, and Themistocles for his Military glory.

17. But Cleomenes the Lacedæmonian King perceiving himself damnified both by word and deed from the Athenians, raised forces throughout Peloponnesus, intending (though dissembling the matter) to be revenged upon them, and set up Isagoras as Tyrant over them. He invaded one part, and procured the Bæotians on one side, and the inhabitants of Chalcis on the other, to fall in upon other places. The Athenians thus distressed on all sides, yet first went against the Peloponnesians lying in Eleusine, and when the Armies were about to joyn, the Corinthians, first bethinking themselves of the injustice of their cause, withdrew themselves; and so did Demaratus the son of Ariston King of Sparta, and the Colleague of Cleomenes, having never dissented from him formerly. Then the rest of the associates seeing that the Kings agreed not betwixt themselves, and the Corinthians were gone, drew off off also in like manner : The Athenians then to be revenged, fell upon the Bœotians, of whom killing many, they took prisoners 700, and then passing over into Eubœa the same day, chastized the Inhabitants of Chalcis in like manner. Thus, four times the Dores out of Peloponnesus came into Attica; twice in a hostile manner, and twice to the help of the Athenians. First when they brought a Colony into Megare, which was in the time of Codrus, the second and third times to expel the Pisistratida, and now the fourth, when Cleomenes with the Peloponnesians invaded Eleusine.

The Island
Ægina.

18. The Thebans and the rest of the Bœotians, seeing themselves too weak for the Athenians, desired help of the Inhabitants of Ægina, an Island situated in that part of the Sea, which severed Attica from Argolis, being five miles distant from the former, some eight in circuit, and the Country of Æacus, (whence the Æacida) having a City of it's own name. The Æginetans bearing an old grudge to those of Athens, and puffed up with a conceit of their wealth, easily imbraced their society, and when the Athenians were busie with the other, passed over in their long ships into Attica, and wasted the Coasts thereof. The Lacedæmonians at this time understanding how they had been deluded by the Alcmeonida their corrupting the women that gave out the Oracles, and thereby their losse both of their old friends, and all thanks also as to the Athenians; hearing further by the Oracles which Cleomenes had brought out of the Citadel of Athens, that that State should much distresse them, and especially seeing how weak it was under Tyrants, but now how it increased in strength after the recovery of it's liberty, called back Hippias, resolving to restore him. He was ready at their call, but then it hapned that Sosicles the Corinthian Ambassador and others of their confederates utterly disallowed of this practice, and therefore seeing there was no hope of recovering his former condition, he returned into Asia, and there laboured with all his might to possesse Artaphernes the Satrapa of Lydia against the Athenians, that they might be conquered by Darius his Brother. They sent to Artaphernes, to desire him not to give credence to their exiles; but, as when two or three years before, when they sent to enter into society with the Persians, he told them they must give Earth and Water, as symbols of subjection (which the Ambassadors doing, were much blamed at their return) so now he told them, if they would be safe, they must receive Hippias. They refused the Condition, and chose rather to be professed Enemies to the Persian, and thence presently after joyned with Aristagoras, who withdrew the Ionians from their obedience, which provoked Darius afterwards to invade them, procured the Expedition of Xerxes, and the quarrel of that Empire with Greece. But these things concerning Athens and Hippias, hapned in the first year of the 69th Olympiad, the 18th of the reign of Darius, A. M. 3501.

Darius 18.

19. After the Ionian War was over, and the Græcians in Asia were forced once more to undergo the yoke, Darius in the 27th year of his reign, and the third after his victory, sent into Greece to demand Earth and Water as tokens of subjection. The Athenians and Lacedæmonians threw the Messengers into a well, and bad them thence fetch Earth and Water to carry to their Master, but the Inhabitants of Ægina and other Islanders, for fear of the Persians, promised obedience. The Athenians presently took offence thereat, as judging that the Æginetans did it out of a grudge to them, that they might fight under the conduct of the Persians against Athens, and therefore they sent to Sparta to complain of them as Traitors to Greece. Cleomenes was sent from that State, and came to Ægina, with an intention to apprehend the principal authors of the revolt; but one Crius there openly opposed him, threatening him, in case he laid violent hands on any, for that he knew he did it without any publick decree of the Lacedæmonians, who else would have sent the other King with him. This he said at the instance of Demaratus the other King of Sparta, who disagreeing with Cleomenes ever since the invasion of Attica, now also grievously accused him in his absence. Hereupon Cleomenes returned home, cast out Demaratus, upon pretence of his illegitimation, mation from his Office, and put Leutychides his kinsman in his place.

The birth of Demaratus.

20. The Father of Demaratus was Ariston, of the posterity of Procles, a man as worthy as any of his Ancestors; who having no children by two wives (for which cause he divorced them) to satisfy the desires of the people (which greatly desired some issue male from him) married a third, which already was the wife of his friend Agæus, covenanting with him for her, (she being the most beautiful woman next after Helena) which by the Laws of Lycurgus he might do. Being married, it hapned just after seven moneths, when he was according to the custome sitting amongst the Ephori, his household-servant came and signified to him that he had a Son born, with the suddenness of which thing being disturbed, he rashly swore that it was not his, coming so much within the Time. The Ephori then neglected it, and he afterwards repenting of his rashness, brought up the Child as his own, and because he was so desired by the publick wishes of the People, gave him the name of Demaratus. After his death Demaratus succeeded, a man of great worth, and who obtained a crown in the Olympick Games, which never hapned before to the Kings of Sparta. But that speech of his Father was now objected against him, by his Colleague and Emulator Cleomenes the Son of Anaxandrides, who accused now also for their retreating formerly out of Attica, which occasioned all the difference betwixt them; and all this was aggravated by Leutychides, who sought for his place, and had a private quarrel with him about a wife, of which he had hindred him by taking her to himself.

posed, and Leutychides put in his place.

21. Great contention hence arising, the Spartans resolved to send to Delphos, and enquire of the Oracle whether Demaratus was the Son of Ariston, which being done, Cleomenes procured a friend he had at Delphos to corrupt Pythia, so that being drawn by bribery she gave the answer against Demaratus. Hereby Cleomenes procured him to be removed from the Kingdom, and Leutychides his kinsman to succeed him; yet though thus handled, he ceased not to love his Country, and continuing at home, disdained not to bear inferior Offices, till further affronted by Leutychides, who to insult over and deride him, at such a time as overseeing the exercises of the Boyes, he sent and demanded of him how he liked of that Office after the Kingdom. He answered, that he had tried both, but the other not, and that that question should be the original either of great mischief or happiness to the Lacedæmonians, and then getting him home with his head covered he sacrificed to Jupiter, and sending for his Mother conjured her to tell him the truth concerning his Father. Being assured from her of his Legitimation, he went out of the City, under pretence of going to Delphos; but took the way to Elis, and thence to the Island Zacynthus, and so to Darius King of Persia, the Zacynthians having refused to give him up to his Country-men who pursued him. He was received with great honour by the Persians, who bestowed Lands upon him, to maintain him in a Princely equipage; and there his posterity is reported to have endured a long season.

ill end.

22. Not long after Cleomenes received his just reward, his own hands being his executioners; for his treachery against Demaratus being come to light, and fearing to be called to an account for it, he first fled into Thessalie, and thence returning into Arcadia stirred up the Inhabitants against the Spartans, and attempted to swear them to be true to him whithersoever he should lead them. The Lacedæmonians hearing of this, and fearing what he might do to them, recalled and restored him to his former dignity; but when he was come home, having not had before this time a very settled head, he now fell into a Phrensie, as he met any one in the City, pushing their faces with his Scepter. His friends then bound him with wooden fetters, in which condition, partly by inreaties, and partly by threats, he got a Sword of his Keeper, wherewith beginning at the calf of his leg, he cut up his flesh upwards to the thighs, and, when he ripped up his belly, died, leaving no issue behind him, but a pattern of Justice to all Greece, which being amused at his end, most attributed it to the corruption of Pythia, and that injustice done to Demaratus.

SECT. I.

the Athenians to his invasion of Elenfine, and his destroying the Temple of their gods; but the Argives concluded this judgement to have fallen upon him, because he had basely killed such of their Country-men as escaped from a barrel fought with him, after he had got them out of the Temple of Argus, and had burnt the grove which he had taken. This passage betwixt the Lacedæmonians and Argives, is to be described though in the same order Herodotus hath done it, it having hapned long before the death of Cleomenes, and as Pausanias saith, in the beginning of his reign.

In Laconia.

23. Consulting the Oracle at Delphos, it was answered, that he should take Argos, and hereupon he raised an Army and invaded the Territories of that State. The Argives in their own defence made hast to meet him, but he setting upon them as they were at dinner, put many of them to the sword; and besieged the rest in the grove at Argus, whither they fled. Then learning their names from such fugitives as were with him, he called them man by man out of the Wood to redeem themselves (which at the Lacedæmonian rate was for two minæ a man) and so 50 of them coming out of the grove (in which place they could no see beforehand what was done to their Companions) he put to the sword. At length one of them climbing up on a tree discovered the matter, after which no man would come out; but then he set fire to the grove and burnt it and them together. After this, asking to whom of their gods the grove belonged to, it was answered to Argus, and so he found and acknowledged himself deceived by the Oracle. Returning to Sparta, he was accused as having been corrupted, for that he might have taken Argos if he would; but the major part were satisfied with his excuse and acquitted him. As for Argos it was rendred by this overthrow so desolate of men, that the Slaves governed all things, till such time as the sons of the slain grew up and recovered their Patrimony; after which the Slaves conquered Tyrinthes, and held it, till perswaded by Cleander a certain Wizard, they returned, and made War upon their Masters, which continued long, till such time as the Argives with difficulty remained Conquerours.

Learychides punished for the injury offered to Demaratus.

24. Cleomenes being dead, the Æginetans sent and complained of Learychides for the injury he had done to them, in causing together with Cleomenes ten of their principal men to be kept as Hostages at Athens. He was given up to them, but fearing to carry a King of Sparta away prisoner, though for the present the State had given him up, they took him onely to Athens to procure them the liberty of their Hostages. But the Athenians put them off, as refusing to deliver them without the authority of two Kings, seeing both of them committed them to their custody, and the journey being to no purpose Learychides was dismissed and so returned; but yet he also paid for the injury offered to Demaratus. * For, Menander leading an Army into Thessalie, of which as of the War he had full and ample power, he was corrupted with money, and betrayed the interest of his Country, after which being discovered, as he held the money in both his hands sitting in his tent, he was apprehended and carried to Sparta, where being called to account, he fled to Tegæa, and there died in exile, his house being razed as a traitor to his Country.

* Herodotus
Lib. 6. cap. 72.

25. But the Æginetans, of old, Enemies to those of Athens, were now much more incensed against them for detaining their Hostages, and set themselves to studie a revenge. At that time there was at Sunium (the utmost promontory of Attica) a Gallie which (according to the custome observed every year since the time of Theseus) was then going to Delphos, aboard of which were the principal men of Athens: on this they seized, and taking the men prisoners, bound them all. The Athenians hereat enraged, laboured with all might on the other hand to revenge this, and agreed with one Nicomachus to have the City betrayed to them; yet for that they could not get their Fleet together soon enough, they came a day too late, and missed of that enterprize. But through the counsel of Themistocles, having rigged a Fleet of 70 Gallies (20 of which the Corinthians sold them at an inconsiderable rate, because by the Law they could not give them) they set upon the the Æginetans, and overthrew them in a Sea-fight. They betook themselves for aid to the Argives their old friends, but having offended them not long before, they received a publick denial, yet underhand a supply of 1000 Volunteers, most of whom fell in Ægina by the hands of the Athenians, against whom yet the Æginetans afterwards, reinforcing their power at Sea, in another battel became Victors. But what the issue of this War farther was, is not declared by Herodotus, who yet elsewhere affirmeth, that it gave occasion to the safety of all Greece, by putting the Athenians upon the care of Sea matters, whereby when Xerxes came, they became the bulwark thereof. Probable it is, that this War which was begun before the battel of Marathon, was not compos'd till the time that Xerxes was about to invade Greece, when we read that all the Grecians (and these two States amongst the rest) resolv'd to lay aside all private quarrels amongst themselves, the Æginetans being observ'd by * another to have had the Dominion of the Sea 20 years, untill the passage of Xerxes, which thenceforth they were forced to yield to the Athenians.

SECT. I.

The battel of Marathon.

26. Whilest the Athenians were busie in the War againt Ægina, Darius sent his Forces into Greece against them, and the Eretrians (inhabitants of the Island Euboea) which though they took the Citie of the later, and made them Captives, yet were they overthrown by the former in the battel at Marathon. After the fight 2000 Spartans came to Athens (being hindred hitherto by their superstition, which forbade them from a Law of Lycurgus not to stir out till the full Moon) whence they proceeded to Marathon to see the number of the slain, and then commending the valour of the Athenians returned home. Of these were slain in this fight Callimachus one of the Polemarchs, Cynagirus commended by many Writers, who when the Persians fled, and betook themselves to their ships, held one of them with with his hands till they were cut off, and then with his teeth, till at length he was slain; and Hippias the late Tyrant (who now hoping to recover, after twenty years banishment, his old power, became the conductor of the Persian Forces) though neither Herodotus nor Thucydides make mention of his death, yet is reported by later Authors here to have been slain. Themistocles now a young man behaved himself gallantly in the battel; but the successe is ascribed to the valour, and conduct of Miltiades, to whom, when Aristides one of the Captains had assign'd his day's Government, the rest when it came on their turns did the same, after that by the same help he had carried it in the Council for a battel. Yet did he not fight till his own day came, and then ingaging, overthrew the Enemy in that memorable battel.

His Pedigree
and Actions.

27. His father was Cimon, who in the Tyranny of Pisistratus departed from Athens, and thrice obtained the Garland in the Olympick Games; yet being reconciled to Pisistratus afterwards returned, but after his death was slain by his faction. His eldest son, who was called after his Grand-father Stesagoras, was brought up with their half Uncle Miltiades in the Chersonesus, over which he was Prince. His other son was this Miltiades, so called after this his Uncle, which dying without Children, Stesagoras succeeded him, but not long after was killed by one that counterfeited himself a fugitive, and died also without issue. Then did the Pisistratide send Miltiades to succeed his brother in the Principality of the Chersonesus, and there he ruled when Darius undertook the expedition into Scythia, and he it was that gave the Ionians counsel to break the bridge, and leave him there wandering with his Army. Being ferled, he married Hecestipyla the daughter of Olorus King of Thrace; but the Scythians provoked by Darius, and making an excursion as far as the Chersonesus, he daring not to withstand them fled, and after their retreat was restored by the Thracians. After some years Darius being angry with him, sent a Fleet of Phoenicians to subdue the Chersonesus; whereupon he fled with five Gallies from Cardia, and came to Athens; but as he fled the Phanicians intercepted one of them, and therein his son Metiochus, who being presented to Darius, received from him house, lands, and SECT. I. a Persian wife. Being returned home, he was accused for possessing the Tyranny of the Chersonesus, but was acquitted, and * having perswaded the Athenians to throw Darius his Messengers into the pit, was afterwards declared by the people one of their Captains, and thence had occasion to obtain this famous victory at Marathon.

His fruitless expedition to Paros.

28. Miltiades flourishing in great glory, and grace with the people, obtained of them 70 Gallies well manned, not making known his intention, but professing that he would much thereby benefit the State. He sayled to the Island Paros (one of the Cyclades in the Aegean-Sea, and famous for the best Marble) the inhabitants of which having assisted the Persians at Marathon, he besieged, demanding 100 Talents of them. They would not hear of parting with money, but made provision for resistance, whereupon he harrazed their Territories, and more closely besieged them, and attempted the Citie for twenty dayes, but leaping off from a Wall, he hurt his Thigh, and was forced to return home. There, when he was arrived, he was accused by Xanthippus (the son of Ariphron, and father to Pericles, his Emulator) of Treason, as having voluntarily miscarried in the Enterprize about Paros. He could not be present himself to answer, his Thigh now corrupting, which held him in his bed, but Stesagorus, or Tisagoras, his brother (according to Cor. Nepos) or rather, other of his friends did it for him, bidding the people remember the battel at Marathon, and the taking of Lenus, which he, having expelled the Pelasgians, had subdued under the Athenian power. The people spared his life, but fined him fifty Talents, which sum this expedition had cost them. One tells us it was not out of any regard to his Crime so much, as having lately been under the Tyranny of Pisistratus, they feared now the power of their own Citizens, and him especially, who having been much practised in Magistracy and power, and enclined naturally to a love of it, could scarce as they thought bear the condition of a private life; so that though being called a Tyrant, he obtained that power not by his own seeking, but was ever found to be just, moderate, and humble; yet having a great name for Military matters, and thereby great interest, they chose rather to condemn him though innocent, than continually be in fear, though they might have thought on the Ostracism.

He dieth in prison.

29. After this, Miltiades died in prison of the corruption of his Thigh, as most have delivered, his fine being yet upon the score; upon which account the Athenians would not suffer his body to be buried, till such time as his son Cimon offered himself to bonds in the room thereof. As his father before him, so he was unable to pay the fine, and by the Laws of Athens could not be released untill he had done it. He had then to wife his sister by the father's side (as we are to take it) named Elpinice, * it being lawfull for the Athenians to marry such. One Callias there was in the Citie, a rich man, though of a vulgar cast, who had gained much by the Mines; he being in love with her, offered Cimon, if he would part with her to him, to discharge the fine. Cimon sleighted the offer, but she avowed that she would nor suffer any of Miltiades his Children to die in prison, and that to prevent such a thing, she would marry Callias, if he would perform his offer. Hereby Cimon was perswaded, married her to him, and the fine being discharged, was set at liberty, which he presently improved for his own advancement. These things fell out not long after the battel at Marathon.

Xerxes invadeth Greece.

30. Three years the Græcians had rest, as from without, so within themselves, till the coming of Xerxes; onely the War betwixt the Athenians and Aeginetians still depended, untill common danger drew them to a composure. As the Athenians had given most occasion to the invasion of Greece, so they bore the greatest burthen thereof, and by the means of Themistocles, one of their Citizens, procured the overthrow and flight of Xerxes, in that by his Stratagems the Peloponnesians were brought to fight, and not suffered to depart to their several homes, which would have brought certain destruction to them all. Assistant to Themistocles was another of his Countrey-men, named Aristides, who though banished by the Ostracism through his procurement, for that as they disagreed in temper, so in their way of policy, and Government (Themistocles being quick, bold, crafty, and easily changeable, according to the juncture of affairs; but Aristides constant and grave, onely intent upon Justice, and who neither in jest nor earnest would give way to lying, scurrility, or deceit) yet now with others was recalled by his means for the safety of the Countrey, and voluntarily laid aside all private quarrels which came into competition with the publick safety. The surname of Just which first got this man love, afterward procured him envy, Themistocles whispering this into the ears of the multitude, that whilest he took upon him to censure all things, he had prepared for himself a Throne, in the ruine of the Courts of Judicature, and defended with a sufficient Guard. The multitude puffed up with their successe at Marathon, and designing great things in their heads, could ill bear any that excelled them in fame and glory, and therefore flocking into the Citie they banished him by the Ostracism, cloaking their envy at his glorie with a specious pretence of fear of Tyranny.

31. When they were come together to give their suffrages, a Countrey-man ignorant of Letters, is reported to have given a shell to Aristides (not knowing him, but to be of the common sort) and desired him to write therein for him the name of Aristides, at which he wondring, and asking him if ever he had received any injury at his hands, he said no, but that he was troubled to hear him all over go by the name of Just. Aristides hearing this, answered nothing, but wrote his own name, and gave it to the man, and when he departed out of the Citie, with hands lifted up to heaven prayed (contrary to what Achilles did when he found himself ill used by Agamemnon) that the estate of Athens might never happen to be such as to give them occasion to think of Aristides. But in the third year after, when Xerxes now marched through Thessaly and Boeotia towards Attica, the Athenians repealing their Decrees, recalled all that were banished, especially for fear of Aristides, lest joyning with the Enemy, he might by his Authority draw many of their Citizens to revolt. They were mistaken concerning the mans disposition, for before the Decree for his return was made, he had not been wanting to provoke the Gracians as much as he could to defend their liberty; then joyned with Themistocles, though one most averse to him, and for the publick good advanced him to the highest degree of Dignity. He joyned in endeavours with him for procuring the Gracians to fight; and understanding that Psytalia a little Island before Salamina was possessed of the Enemy, he passed over thither with a party of such as voluntarily followed him, and put all of them to the sword, except some of the chiefest, to whom he gave quarter. He disposed Soldiers so throughout the Island, that on which quarter soever any of either party should light, he might seize upon them, and so preserve his friends, and provide that none of the Enemy should escape: upon which account a Trophy was erected in Psytalia. And when Themistocles to try him after the victory, said, that one brave act was done, viz. the overthrow of Xerxes, but that another remained, which was, by breaking the bridge to take Asia in Europe, he earnestly desired him to reject all such advice, and rather to consider how soon they might expell the Mede out of Greece, lest being shut in with such great Forces, and all opportunity of flight being taken away, he might by necessity be egged on to revenge.

32. After the overthrow and flight of Xerxes, Themistocles having the greatest authority in the fleet, went therewith against such Islanders as had taken part with the Persians, demanding money of them. He urged them with two powerfull divinities Perswasion and Necessity, to which the Inhabitants of Andros (one of the Cyclades) trusting in the strength of their Fortifications, opposed two others as strong as the former, viz. Poverty and Impossibility, whereupon they were close besieged, but it being to no purpose, the Fleet returned to Salamine, Themistocles without the privy of the rest, going to other Islands, from whom by his threats he exacted much money. After they had at Salamine divided the spoil, and consecrated part thereof to their gods, they went to the Isthmus, there to reward him who should be thought to have best in the War deserved of Greece. When the Captains severally came to deliver their minds in writing at the Altar of Neptune, each one ascribed to himself the first place in merit, but to Themistocles assigned the second, which amounted to as much, as if by a silent confession they had acknowledged his merit to be principal. And though by the envy of the Captains his glory was depressed, yet was he accounted the most prudent man of all Greece, and being invited down to Lacedamon, by the judgement of that severe State, as the praise of valour was given to their own Eurybiades, so that of prudence and dexterity unto him. They gave him a crown of Olives, and the best Chariot they had, as a reward, and what before was not done to any mortal man by them, at his departure, to do him honour, they sent 300 Horse to conduct him to the borders of their Dominions. After this, the Gracians overthrew Mardonius, whom Xerxes had left behind him, at the battel of Plataea, and the same day the Persian Fleet at Mysale a Promontory of Ionia, which they hereby restored to liberty, Xanthippus being Archon at Athens; in the second year of the 7th Olympiad, and the seventh of the Reign of Xerxes. Learned Men.

33. As for learned men which flourished during this period; some of the seven Wise Men of Greece lived in the time of Cyrus, and about the beginning of the Persian Empire. These seven were, Pittacus of Mirylene, who was born about the 32th Olympiad; Bas of Priene, Chilon of Lacedamon, and Cleobulus of Lindus, all who flourished about the 47th Olympiad, with Thales of Miletus, who being born about the first year of the 35th Olympiad, foretold an Eclipse of the Sun, which hapned about the third year of the 48th, in the reign of Alyattes, and Astyages, and about the beginning of the 58th having helped Croesus over the River Halys, by draying it with a ditch, then died. The sixth was Solon of Athens, who died the same year with Thales, and the seventh Periander of Corinth.

34. Besides these there was Xenophanes the Colophonian, who being born in the 40th Olympiad, came into Sicilie when Hieron and Epicharmus flourished, about the 70th Olympiad. Epicharmus lived 97 years as Lucian writeth, and invented the Comedy eight years before the beginning of the Persian Empire. Phocylides flourished at the same time, to whom a Poem yet extant concerning Laws is ascribed, though Scaliger thinks it made by some Hellenistick Jew. Besides these, Anacreon the Teian Poet, who as Pliny writeth, was choaked with the stone of a raisin. Simonides a Poet of the Island Ceos, where he was born in the City Inlis. Having lived some time at Athens with Hipparchus the Son of Pisistratus, he went into Sicilie unto Hiero, by whom being asked what God was, he demanded a dyes time to consider of it, and after that another; still professing that the more he studied the point, the more he was to seek in it. Some say he found out the Art of Memory, and that being very covetous, he first exposed the Muses to sale. In the second year of the 58th Olympiad, and eight before the Persian Empire, died Anaximander the natural Philosopher of Miletus. Anaximenes his Scholar flourished about that time. Theagenes of Rhegium the most antient Chronographer. Democedes of Crotone a Physician, being taken Captive with Polycrates by Oetes the Persian, was carried as a slave to Darius, with whom he lived in great esteem, after he had cured his foot and the breast of his wife Atossa.

* Lib. 7. cap. 7.

35. There flourished also in Darius his time, Cadmus of Miletus an Historiographer, there having been another of this name and place, according to Suidas, who in four Books wrote the History of Miletus and all Ionia; and Strabo nameth Cadmus, Phercydes and Hecataeus as those who first of all Greeks wrote Prose. Hecataeus flourished at this time, and gave light to Herodotus. Pirynichus the Athenian, a tragical Poet, who first caused a woman to be periorated, and invented the verse with four feet. Heracleus the the Ephesian, a contemner of Heathenish Idols, who out of fear wrote his Book of Nature in such an obscure manner, that thence he got the name of Scotus or Dark. Zeno of Elea, or Velia, in Italy, Scholar to Parmenides, who conspiring against Nearchus the Tyrant, endured torments to death, rather than he would discover his complices. Pythagoras the son of Mnesarchus the Samian, but born at Sidon in Phœnicia, about the 53 Olympiad. Being twelve years old he learnt of Thales and Phocylides, from the later taking the transmigration of Souls. Travelling into Egypt and to Babylon, he drunk in the learning of both places. About the 68th Olympiad he went into Italy, where he lived first at Crotone, and then at Metapontus. Here he taught and constituted the Italian School or Sect, as Thales had done the Ionick. Whereas others suffered themselves to be called Sophoi, he would be called out of modesty Philosophus. In the 67th Olympiad he found out the nature and course of the Planet Venus. In the fourth year of the 70th he died at Metapontus, where he was so admired, that his house was made a Temple, and that part of Italy called Magna Græcia. Amongst his Scholars was Milo the famous Wrestler; and women through him became famous for learning, their Epistles being yet extant.

SECT. II.

Of such things as fell out amongst the Græcians, from their Victories at Platæa and Mycale, until the beginning of the Peloponnesian War, containing the space of 48 years.

1. THE Persians being overthrown in Greece both at Sea and Land, and so driven utterly out of Europe; and those that fled into Asia in ships being also defeated at Mycale, Leutychides the Spartan who there commanded in chief, returned home with his associates of Peloponnesus. The Athenians with the Ionians, and those that inhabited upon the Hellestone, besieged Sestos, which the Persians had seized on, all Winter, and reduced it; after which they also all departed home.

2. The Athenians having brought home their wives and children, after the overthrow of Mardonius, had the popular Government restored by Aristides, and set themselves to rebuild the walls of their City in a greater compass, and stronger than had been formerly, being thereto especially induced through the persuasion of Themistocles. The Lacedæmonians above all others were hereat exceedingly troubled, as considering that having obtained so great glory by the two Victories at Marathon and Salamina, the Athenians would contend with them for the Principality, and upon that account they wished them as weak as might be. They dissuaded them therefore from going on with their work, alleging that it was dangerous for Greece to have any fortified place without the Peloponnesus, which the Barbarians might seize on, and possess. They said they would send answer by Ambassadors of their own, and Themistocles took the business upon him. He first went alone, and ordered that the rest should follow, but not till the wall was brought to a reasonable height; that in the mean time both bond and free should ply the work; and sparing no place, whether holy or prophane, private or publick, take all such stuff for building as they might soonest light on. When he came at Sparta, he demanded no audience, but sought to protract the time, pretending he expected his Collegues. The Lacedæmonians complaining that nevertheless the work went on, and that he went about to deceive them, the other Ambassadors arrived, of whom after he knew that the fortifications were almost finished, he laboured to perswade the Ephori (who now had the chief power in that State) that the things were false, which they were made to believe, desired them to send persons considerable whom they might trust to make inspection, and keep him as an Hostage till their return.

3. They sent accordingly three of their principal men to Athens, and with them Themistocles his Collegues, to whom he gave in charge that the Lacedæmonians should not be dismissed till his return. After their departure, he demanded audience of the Magistrates and Senate, and then freely and openly professed, that the Athenians by his advice, & agreeable to the common-Law of Nations, had fenced their publick and private gods with a wall, that they might more easily defend them; and neither could that be to the damage of Greece, of which Athens was the bulwark against the Barbarians, for here the King's Navy had twice suffered Shipwrack. He told them, they did ill to regard more their private ambition, than what was profitable for all Greece; and, to conclude, if they expected the return of their Ambassadors, they must dismiss him, or else never expect to see them return; which accordingly they were forced to do with much private regret, though ashamed to own the cause. He advised his Country-men further to finish the work of the Piræus or Port of Athens, which they had begun a long time before, whilst he was Archon; for he perswaded them first to apply themselves to Seamatters, as the way to obtain Dominion, and commended to them that place as most convenient for their design, having three natural Havens. The wall he caused to be made so thick as two Carriages loaded with stones might passe by each other; but brought the height of it but to half of that which he had designed. And with so great a desire was he carried out for the enlargement of the Dominion of that State, that observing the Lacedæmonian Navy to be drawn up at Gytheum, and so, easie to be set on fire, he much desired to have it done, and told the people he had a thing of great moment in his head, but such as was not to be divulged. The People appointed Aristides to confer with him, and if he approved it, resolved he might prosecute it; but he making a report that Themistocles advised a thing, than which nothing was more profitable, and more unjust, he was commanded to desist.

4. A little after these things, Pausanias the Lacedæmonian, famous for the Victory at Platæa, was sent with a Fleet of twenty Peloponnesian Gallies, and thirty of Attica, against Cyprus, where he took many Towns, and Byzantium afterwards, held by the Persians. He was very imperious towards the associates, inasmuch as he carried himself more like a Tyrant than a General, and being sorely complained of to his Superiours, he was by them recalled to give an account of it. He gaped after the Kingdom of Greece, and to that end entred into conspiracy with Xerxes, whose Daughter he asked to wife, and being accused of much favour shewed towards the Persians, yet for that nothing could be proved, he was dismissed, having the government of the Fleet onely taken from him. Yet returned he to the Hell'spoint, under pretence of the War to continue his intelligence with Xerxes; but being expelled from Byzantium by the Athenian Soldiers, he returned not to Sparta, but staid at Troas, and for that was again complained of, as holding clandestine consultations with the Persians, and not having any just and warrantable cause there to remain. Hereupon he was called home by the Ephori the second time, and cast into prison, but appearing again to his tryal, he was the second time dismissed.

to themselves.

5. The Lacedæmonians sent Dorcis with others to succeed Pausanias in the Fleet; but the associates would take no notice of him; for Aristides the Just, Captain of the Athenians, so moderately behaved himself, and wrought crosse to the actions of Pausanias, that all the Cities of Asia hating the others pride, joyned themselves to him, so that he became the means of transferring the chief Command at Sea, which (together with that at Land also) had hitherto been enjoyed by the Lacedæmonians, unto his own Country-men, the Spartans, at this time not being unwilling, or opposing it in the least, so ashamed were they of the carriage of their own Citizens. The Athenians being thus advanced by the associates for their moderation, under pretence of revenging the Stares upon Xerxes, obtained also liberty to lay a Taxe upon them all, how much money one, and how many ships another should find. Officers they appointed to receive the Tributes, the sum of all which amounted ted to 460 Talents: Delos was appointed for the Treasury, and the place to meet in, to deliberate of the Affairs of all the free States. This assesse (as Plutarch writeth) was made by Aristides at the desire of the Gracians, who relied upon his integrity; and his moderation so much appeared herein, that afterwards the Athenians enslaved the States, and drawing the Tributes to their private use, first doubled, and then tribled the sum. For now, whereas the whole Tax imposed by him amounted but to 460 Talents, Pericles added almost a third part (as Plutarch reckoneth) and increased it to 600. and after his death it was brought to 1300 Talents.

6. The Athenians having settled the Tribute, under the conduct of Cimon Thucyd. the son of Miltiades, took from the Persians Eione, a Town of Thrace, situate upon the River Strymon, which they deprived of its liberty. Then expelled they the Doopians out of Scyrus (an Island in the Aegean Sea) and therein planted a Colony of their own; then waged they War with the Carystians in Eubœa, for denying them obedience (which was composed) and besieged the Naxians that had revolted from them, whom they forced to submit. This being the first of all Greek Cities, which, contrary to the League, was subjected to bondage, after it others were as occasion served, which was taken by the Athenians, either for that they sent not the full Tribute, or ships, or would not serve in the War when affairs required it. The Athenians also severely exacted what had been appointed, and compelled such as refused, having forgotten their former mildness, now in power, and carrying it very imperiously towards their associates whom they could order as they pleased. And this was also effected by the Greeks themselves: for, to shun the labour of it, most of them chose rather to send money than ships; whereby the Athenians, who had Vessels enough, and alwayes in readinesse, increased their strength, and upon occasion found them unfit for resistance.

7. In the mean time Pausanias, who had been called home to Sparta, give not over his conspiracy against his Countrey, though he changed his associates. For he now sought to draw the Helotes, or publick slaves, into rebellion with the allurement of liberty, and hereof being detected by one Argilus (whom he had unchastly loved, and now being sent with Letters to Artabanus, suspected he carried a Warrant for his own death, and so opening them, discovered both his plot against himself and the State) he took sanctuary in the Temple of Minerva, and there the door being made up (to which end his own Mother is said to have brought the first stone) was starved to death. After his death the Spartans sent to Athens to accuse Themistocles of the same Crime, who being before this banished by the Ostracism, lived at Argos in great esteem, and was much envied by the Lacedæmonians for having done many things in his Countreys behalf, which they looked upon as tending to their prejudice. 'Tis said that certain Letters were found in Pausanias his Coffers, intimating a correspondence berwixt them for promoting the affairs of the Persian King, which though he assented not unto, yet discovered not the thing, hoping Pausanias would either be deterred from his design, or the thing would come out some other way. But the Spartans laying it heavily to his charge, and his own Citizens envying his glory, though he sought to purge himself by Letters, yet was he condemned, and the people perswaded to send some to lay hold of him, and bring him up. He perceiving this, fled to Coreyra, and thence to Admetus King of the Molossians, with whom, not being able to continue in safety, he went to Artaxerxes Longimanus, by whom he was honourably received, and bountifully entertained (having three Cities given him, one for bread, another for wine, and a third for victuals, to which others add two more for Clothes and Linnen) and died at length at Magneſia a natural death, though some wrote, that seeing he was not able to perform his promise to the King of Conquering Greece, which by this time had many expert Captains (amongst whom of most especial note was Cimon) he poisoned himself.

SECT. 1.

The Thasians envied by the Athenians for the Mines.

The Lacedæmonians distressed.

The beginning of malice betwixt the Athenians and Lacedæmonians.

The beginning of the hatred betwixt Corinth and Athens.

The Mycenæans and Argives fall out.

Offices, yet he died so poor, that he scarcely left wherewith to be buried; Thucyd. lib. 1. yet so gratefull was the State towards his memory, that his Children were provided for at the publick charge. Eight years after the bartel of Plataea, Cimon being sent out by the Athenians, obtained in one day two notable victories at Sea and Land, over the Persians at Eurymedon, a River in Pamphylia, which brought him and the State no little credit. After this they fell out with the Thasians, who by their Colonies had taken possession of the rich Mines of Silver and Gold, which were in that part of Thrace, lying upon Macedonia, betwixt the two Rivers Strymon and Nysus. For these Mines the Athenians envied them, and raised such a contention, that they withdrew themselves from the association; whereupon they presently commenced War against them, and overthrew them in a Sea-fight, and afterwards besieged them by Land. The Thasians besieged, sent to the Spartans, desiring them to invade Ætica, thereby to divert the Athenians from them; and, having promised, they were ready to perform it; but that they were hindred by an Earth-quake, which sorely afflicted them, and whereupon the publick slaves (called Heleotes) of the posterity of the Messenians, took their opportunity, and rebelling, seized upon Ithome in the Territories of Messenia, being acted by that impression, which Pausanias not long before had made upon them. Diodorus ad Olymp. 77. ann. 4. Thucyd.

9. The Spartans much distressed by this rebellion, having lost 2000 men by the Earth-quake, besides a great losse in their buildings, after three years the Thasians were no longer able to hold out, and yielded to such hard conditions as the Athenians laid upon them. The Lacedæmonians proceeding but slowly in their War, sent to the Athenians for aid, which was sent them, but through sinister suspicions they sent it back again, and this was taken as an affront by the Athenians, who were very much moved at it. This was the beginning of that mutual malice and enmity which thenceforth passed betwixt these two States, and proved the rise of abundance of mischief. For, the Athenians, presently after the return of their men, forsook the League, which they had entred into with the Spartans against the common Enemy, and made an Alliance with the Argives their Adversaries, in which they also comprehended the Thessalians. And they that were besieged in Ithome, at length in the tenth year, being forced to yield, and banished Peloponnesus by the Spartans, the Athenians kindly received them with their Wives and Children, and gave them Naupactus to inhabit, which they had lately taken from the Locrians, called * Ozola. A little after this, another great accession was made to the strength of the Athenians, and that with the detriment of the Spartans; for the inhabitants of Megara, Neighbours to the former, being fallen upon with War by the Corinthians, betook themselves to them for aid, though heretofore they had been the Allies of Sparta. This opportunity the Athenians imbraced, and thereby got Megara into their hands, with Paga, a Mirt-Town adjoyning to it; and fortifying Megara as far as Nisaea upon the Sea, therein placed a Garrison of their own. And this was also the beginning of that inveterate hatred betwixt Corinth and Athens.

10. During the War betwixt the Lacedæmonians and their slaves, happened another in Peloponnesus, betwixt the Argives and the inhabitants of Mycena, upon this occasion. The Mycenæans standing high upon the ancient Eminency of their Cite, would not be subject to the Argives, as the other Cities of Argolis were, but would live according to their own Laws and Customs, having nothing to do with the Commonwealth of Argos. Moreover, they contended with them about the Temple and Rites of Juno, challenged to themselves the Right of Administring the Nemean Games, and whereas during the War with Xerxes, the Argives had made an order not to help the Lacedæmonians at Thermopyla, except they would yield them part of the Command, the Mycenæans alone joyned themselves to them. These things made the Argives jealous that their power increasing with the return of their ancient spirit, they would contend with them for Empire it self, and and therefore of a long time they desired to destroy their Citie. Now seeing they had a good opportunity, whilst the Spartans being busied at home could afford them no relief, they raised a great Army out of their own, and the Neighbouring Cities, and therewith setting upon them, overthrew them, and laid close siege to Mycena. They stoutly resisted for some time, but being exhausted by the War, and the Lacedaemonians (being busied with the Helotes, and lately distressed by the Earth-quake) not being able to relieve them, the Defendants being most spent, the Citie was taken and levelled with the ground, the inhabitants being made slaves, and the tenth part of them consecrated to the god of Argos. So, this Citie happy in more anient times, a Nurse of famous men, and renowned for worthy exploits, was brought to destruction, and continued desolate to the time wherein our Author lived.

Diodorus ad Olymp. 78. ann. 1.

Mycena destroyed.

11. The difference raised betwixt the Athenians and Corinthians, about Megara, proceeded so far, as the former invaded Peloponnesus, and joyning battel with the Corinthians and Epidaurians, were worsted; but engaging the second time at the Island Cecryphalea, obtained a victory. Not long after, the War betwixt the Athenians and the inhabitants of Agina was again renewed, wherein the former obtained a great victory at Sea, and took seventy Vessels from the Islanders, and then besieged the Citie, to the relief of which 300 men were sent out of Peloponnesus. Now the Corinthians judging it a fit season to be doing something, for that they were both occupied in the War of Agina and Egypt also, (where their Forces were assisting Inarus the son of Psammetichus against Artaxerxes) invaded the Territories of Megara. But things hapned otherwise than they expected, for the Athenians left not the siege at Agina, but sent out of the Citie of Athens such as were both above and under age for the War, to the aid of Megara, which at length carried away the victory, and forced the Corinthians to return home with great losse. At this time the Athenians began to build their long Walls from the Citie to the port.

Diodorus ad Olymp. 80. ann. 2. & 3.

The difference betwixt the Athenians and Corinthians, about Megara renewed.

12. After this arose a War betwixt the Phocians and the Dores. The Lacedaemonians being Patrons to the later, sent to their aid 11500 men, which Army forced the Phocians and brought them to terms, but being about to return home, it dared neither do it by the Crissaean Sea (or Gulf of Phocis) nor through the Isthmus, for fear of the Athenians, and so staid in Bootia for an opportunity: especially being desired by some principal men of Athens, who hating the popular Government, hoped by the help of this Army to dissolve it, and hinder the building of the long Walls, which made much for the interest of the people. But the Athenians hearing of this stop came out of the Citie to a man against them, having with them 1000 Argives, and a great number of other Allies, so that the whole amounted to 14000. who when the Thessalian horse joyned with them gave battel to the Lacedaemonians near Tanagra, a great and famous Citie of Bootia, not far from Thebes. The Thessalian horse revolting to the Lacedaemonians, they obtained the victory, and then presently marching into Megaris, wasted it, and so returned home through the Isthmus. Yet the Athenians resolving not to give way to Fortune, 72 daies after this defeat marched again into Bootia to revenge themselves, which by the overthrow of the inhabitants they reduced together with Phocis; raised the Walls about Tanagra, and compelled the Opuntians of Locris to give them 100 Hostages of their richest men. At this time they perfected their long Walls; Agina was yielded to them, the Walls of which they pulled down, took away their shipping, and imposed Tribute upon them for the future. And Tolmides their Captain coasting Peloponnesus with a Fleet, burnt the Lacedaemonian Arcenal at Gythium, took Chalcis, a Town of the Corinthians, and landing his men, overthrew the Sicyonians in fight.

Idem ad ann. 4. & ad Olymp. 81. ann. 1.

13. But in Egypt the Athenians had bad successe, Inarus being taken and Crucified, and few of their men after six years returning home: fifty Gallies also being sent to their relief were most of them taken and sunk by the Phœnicians.

Thucyd. lib. 1.

SECT. 2.

Phœnicians. Other Expeditions they made also with like success, save that they overthrew the Sicyonians again in battel; which made them after three years willing to make truce with the Peloponnesians for five years, by the advice of Cimon, whom being banished by the Ostracism they had recalled, during which time they warred in (b) Cyprus under conduct of Cimon, and in Egypt in the service of Amyrteus the King, with good success. (c) After this followed the Holy War, as they called it, the Spartans taking the Temple at Delphos from the Phocians, and giving it up to the Delphians, from whom the Athenians again took it and restored it to the Phocians. Afterwards the (d) Ræotians revolted from the Athenians, who thereupon in great indignation under conduct of Tolmides invaded them, took Charonia and other Towns, in which putting a Garrison, and returning homewards light upon the Enemy, who killed and took them all, and amongst others Tolmides was slain, who had made this bold attempt, contrary to the advice of Pericles the Son of Xanthippus, who now had begun to grow eminent. Hereat the Athenians exceedingly dashed, to redeem their prisoners parted with all Bœotia, and not long after all Eubœa revolted from them, their credit being now on the decaying hand. To the recovery of this Island Pericles was sent, who scarce being landed, news came that Megara had also revolted, and that the Peloponnesians were about to invade Attica.

The Athenians forced by bad success to make a Truce with the Peloponnesians.

They part with Bœotia, & Eubœa revolts.

Pericles reduces Eubœa, and various fortune inclineth both sides to an accommodation.

14. This constrained him to return, and the Peloponnesians accordingly invaded Attica under the command of Plistonax the son of Parfarias the Lacedæmonian King. They wasted all as far as Fleusire; but Pericles there opposing them, corrupted Cleandridas Counsellour to Plistonax with gold, whereby they were deterred, and returned home, where Cleandridas was rewarded with death, and Plistonax with banishment. Pericles having so easily dispatched his affairs here, returned into Eubœa, which he wholly reduced, pulled down the walls of Chalcis, and banished onely the Inhabitants of Hestiea, which he peopled with a Colony of his own Citizens. This various fortune inclined both sides to an accommodation, and procured a League to be made for thirty years betwixt the Athenians and Lacedæmonians, with their allies on both sides, whereby Nisea, Abæia, Page, and Tæzene, were set free by the Athenians, and it was made lawful for any City that had not been associate with either part, to joyn it self to which it best liked; which Article afterwards was urged by them of Corcyra to Athens, whereby they demonstrated that they ought not to deny them the Liberty of association.

Stirs in Samus. Pisistratus victorious there.

15. Six years after, a War arose betwixt the Inhabitants of Miletus and those of Samus, about Priene a Town in Ionia, under the Mountain Mycale. The Milesian affairs going down the wind they sent to Athens, where they grievously accused the other, with whom joyned also many of the Samians themselves, who not being employed in the Government, desired to have it changed. The Athenians being perswaded by them, manned out forty ships against Samus, by which power Pericles restored the Popular Government, exacted 80 Talents, and taking for Hostages 50 Boys, and as many Men, which they kept in custody at Lemnus, put a Garrison of their own into Samus it self. But some of the Citizens who had withdrawn themselves into the continent, entered into a conspiracy with the greatest in the Town, and associating to them Pisistratus the Governour of Sardis for the Persians, with 700 Auxiliaries passed over by night into the Island, and setting upon the People on a sudden (of which they overthrew the major part, and having their Hostages delivered to them by stealth out of Lemnus, delivered up the Athenian Garrison with the Officers into the hands of Pisistratus) and brake out into open rebellion, and drawing in the Byzantians to their party, made War upon Miletus.

16. The Athenians, having notice of this, presently dispatched away 60 Gallies against Samus, with 44 of which Pericles and his nine Colleagues sailing for Miletus, ingaged with the Samian Fleet consisting of 70 Vessels (whereof twenty were laden with Soldiers) at the Island Tragia, and obtained obtained the victory, and afterwards with the other part of the Fleet, and a new supply of 40 ships, sailing to Samus, overthrew the Inhabitants, and closely besieged them both by Sea and Land. Pericles, whilst things were thus ordering, heard that the Phenicians were coming to the relief of the besieged, to meet whom he took away with him 60 Gallies, and bent his course towards Caria, after whose departure the Samians perceiving the Guards thinner than usual, broke out of the Haven, put to flight the ships that lay nearest, overthrew the next, and so recovering the mastery of the adjoining Sea, for 14 dayes exported and imported what they pleased. But Pericles being returned with 60 other ships from Auica (commanded by excellent Captains) besides 30 others from Chios and Lesbus, they were besieged closer than ever, and being spent with the War, in the ninth moneth of the siege yielded up the City. The conditions were hard enough, viz. To demolish their Walls, give Hostages, deliver up their ships, and pay the charge of the War. Byzantium affrighted at this successe, returned also to it's former obedience.

17. Shortly after this, fell out those motions which occasioned the Corinthian, and so by consequence laid the foundation of the Peloponnesian War, about the second year of the 85th Olympiad, and the 25th of the reign of Artaxerxes Longimanus.

Olymp. 85. an. 2.

The Inhabitants of the Island Corcyra, who were a Colony of the Corinthians, some 85 years after their plantation in that Island (formerly called Phaeacis, situate on the Illyrian shore, and being very populous) sent out a Colony which built a City called Epidamnus, and afterwards Dyrrachium, but not without the leave of Corinth the Metropolis, which at their request had assigned a Citizen of their own (Phalrus of the posterity of Hercules) according to the Law and custome, to be Prince of the Colony; and out of the number of their own Citizens and other Dores made up the number. This new Colony seated in a very convenient place, in a short time flourished exceedingly, and abounding with plenty of all things, as usually it hapneth, fell out of luxurie unto civil dissensions about the Government, and hereat occasion being taken by their next neighbours the Taulantians (who made War upon them) suffered no little damage. At length the People incensed against the great ones expelled them the City, who thereupon betaking themselves to the Taulantians, procured them to distress Epidamnus both by land and sea, by which the people being straightened sent to the Corcyreans their Founders, and Patrons, humbly to beseech them that by their authority they would make an accommodation betwixt them and their exiles, and bring the Taulantians to cease their Hostility. The Corcyreans, whether disapproving the cause, or minding something else, rejected their petition, who then by direction from the Oracle at Delphos, betook themselves to the Corinthians, Founders of them both, and gave up their Colony into their hands. They were glad of this occasion, and presently promised them all assistance, being angry with the Corcyreans, who upon their good fortune were grown insolent, and paid not the respect to them which was due from a Colonie to the Metropolis; for they were so rich and strong, that giving way to no City of Greece in the former respect, they had also 120 Gallies readily furnished, which drew envy upon them from the Corinthians, insomuch that now by the help of their Friends they resolved to chastise them, and sent a Party of Soldiers to defend Epidamnus, together with new planters to be imbodyed into the Colony.

18. The Corcyreans took this heavily that they should intermeddle with the affairs of their Colony, and being solicited by such exiles as had fled to them, sent a Fleet to Epidamnus, commanding it to receive the exiles without delay, and cast out the new Planters with the Corinthian Garrison. But the Epidamnians refusing to do it, and the Corinthians making great provisions for the War, they sent their Ambassadors to Corinth with some Spartans and Sicyonians to bear witness of the matter, and offered to put it to a reference before equal Judges: But the Corinthians neglecting their message, as resolved for War, they also made preparation for it. before Epidamnus, the Corinthians sent a Fleet of 75 Gallies, armed with 2000 fighting men thither, but leaving 40 for the carrying on of the siege, vvith 80 more they ingaged vvith them in a Sea-fight near the Promontory of Actium, and got the Victory. The same day Epidamnus vvvas yielded to that party they had left at the siege, and so hereby getting the dominion of the Sea far and vvvide, and growing proud upon their good fortune, they invaded the Territories of the allies of their Enemies, to succour vvhom the Corinthians manned out another Fleet, and landed an Army at Actium. They pitched also there their Tents against them, but Winter dravving on, they both departed vvithout any act of Hostility; the Corinthians all that year and the year followving, out of hatred to the other, using all their endeavours for rigging a nev्व Fleet, and procuring plenty of rowvers out of Peloponnesus and other parts of Greece.

They enter into society with Athens.

19. The Corcyreans before this time not joyned in alliance vvith any other State, nov्व began to look about them hov्व they might strengthen themselves. They sent to Athens, desiring to enter into society vvith that State, and to have assistance from it; and the Corinthians having notice hereof, sent their Ambassadors to oppose them. The Corcyreans vvvere first heard, making a large discourse, and then the Corinthians larger than they. The matter vvvas brought vvvice before the People, vvvhich at length resolved that a defensive League should be made vvith them of Corcyra, that the one should assist the other in case they vvvere assaulted by an Enemy: but to make any invasion assistance vvvas denied, lest they should break the Leagues formerly made vvith other States. The Athenians resolved on this course, for that they sav्व plainly they must have War vvith the Peloponnesians, and therefore desired to have the Corcyreans vvvhov्व vvvere very poverful at Sea, on their side; and they thought it vvould be for their interest to have the Corinthians and their associates spend their stock upon those of Corcyra, vvvhich Island they also looked upon as very commodious for passage either into Sicilie or Italy. Ten Triremes therefore vvvere decreed to assist the Corcyreans, in case they vvvere in any danger, and three Captrains sent, one of vvvhich vvvas Lacedæmonius the son of Cimon, vvvhom Pericles envying for his fathers sake, procured that no more assistance should be sent, that so the businesse might miscarry under him; but afterwards out of plain shame he sent another Squadron of ships vvvhich came too late. These Generals had in charge by all means to decline the fight vvith the Corinthians, except they set upon the Corcyreans, vvvhom then they vvvere to protect to the utmost.

overthrown
in a Sea-fight.

20. This Squadron of ten ships joyning vvith the Corcyreans made up their Fleet 120 sail, vvvhich they gave battel to the Corinthians (vvvhov्व had 90 of their ovvn, and 60 from their allies) betwixt the Island Corcyra and the continent of Epirus. This fight (described most accurately by Thucydides) was the most valiantly fought, and with the greatest number of ships, of any that to those times had happened betwixt the Græcians themselves. The Athenians mindful of the charge received from their Superiours, at the first rather sought to deter, than to fight with the Enemy, succouring the Corcyreans in some places; but they being fully worsted and put to flight in that wing wherein they stood, they then with all their might fell upon the Corinthians, and spoiled their Victory in that part, and rendred it ambiguous as to both sides. On the same day both parties rallied for a fresh ingagement, and they were sounding to the charge, when unexpectedly the Corinthians espied riventy Athenian ships which Pericles had now sent to assist with the other ten, at which fight being utterly discouraged (as fearing more might follow them) they fell off again, to the admiration of the Corcyreans, who knew nothing of the coming of these ships. Great slaughter was made on both sides; the Corinthians lost thirty ships, and Corcyreans seventy, besides 1000 of their men taken prisoners, whom as the Corcyreans carried homewards, they took Anactorium (a Town situate upon the Bay of Ambracia) in their way, and therein left some Planters of their own. This battel was fought in the 29th year of Artaxerxes Longimanus, the tenth of the 86th Olympiad, and

21. Eight hundred of the Prisoners which had been formerly slaves they sold, and the rest (many of them being of the chiefest Rank of the Corcyraans) they kindly entertained. Thus was Corcyra as it were made victorious, and the Athenian ships dismissed, which proved the first cause of the Corinthians making War upon the Athenians. Others followed, which not only enraged them, but the other Peloponnesians against the Athenians. Potidaea, a Town situate in the Isthmus of Pallene (formerly called Plegra, and afterwards Cassandrea from Cassander King of Macedonia) was a Colony of the Corinthians, but associated with the Athenians. The Inhabitants thereof were now commanded by the later to demolish that part of their Wall, which was next Pallene, to give hostages, and to cast out the Magistrate which every year the Corinthians used to send them, and receive no more from them afterwards. This the Athenians did, for that they perceived the Corinthians to be much exasperated against them, and feared that joyning with Perdiccas King of Macedonia, with whom they were at odds, and upon whose Kingdom Potidaea bordered, they would sollicit the place to revolt, and by its example would entice the rest of the Towns thereabout from their alliance. But Perdiccas being first aware hereof (against whom the Athenians had Armed his brother Philip and Derdas) in great wrath sent to Lacedamon to stir them up with the other Peloponnesian States to make War upon them, and invited the Potidaeans to revolt, with other Towns in Thrace.

22. The Athenians being not ignorant of all this, to prevent the revolt of the Towns, sent order to the Captains of the thirty Gallies lately sent into those parts, first to see the execution of their Commands laid upon Potidaea, and take all possible care that the other places should not give ear to any sinister advice. They of Potidaea sent to Athens, desiring earnestly that nothing of extremity might be put upon them; but yet they dispatched also Ambassadors (together with some from the Corinthians their founders) to Sparta, to desire aid thence, that they might provide for the worst. Having no good answer from Athens; but affrighted with the coming of the Fleet; and on the other hand being promised by the Lacedemonians, that in case the Athenians fell upon them, they would straight invade Attica, they took the advice of Perdiccas, and revolted with the Chalcidians and Bottiaens. The Athenian Fleet having notice hereof departed from Thrace, where they had arrived, and sayling to Macedonia, joyn their power with Philip and Derdas against Perdiccas. The Corinthians to help their friends at Potidaea, sent 2600 men, partly of their own, and partly hired out of Peloponnesus, of heavy Armour; and 400 besides light Armed, who fourty dayes after the revolt of the Town came into Thrace, under conduct of Aristeus, the son of Adimantus.

23. The Athenians hearing of this aid, to give greater strength to their affairs in Thrace, sent to their former Forces 2000 Armed men, with a Fleet of fourty Gallies, under the Command of Callias, the son of Calliades, with whom were joyned in Commission four others. Being arrived in Macedonia, they found their friends who had joyned with Philip to have taken Therma, and now intent upon the siege of Pydna, and joyned themselves to them; but seeing how their affairs would be endangered by the Conjunction of Perdiccas with the Corinthian Forces and Potidaea, they made up a peace with the King, and attempting Berrhaa in their way, made haste towards Potidaea, and pitched their Tents at Gigonum, whither another Athenian Fleet of seventy Gallies also came. Perdiccas the Macedonian King again revolted to the Potidaeans, and joyned himself with the Corinthian Army, betwixt which, and that of the Athenians ensued a fight, wherein the Athenians were worsted in that Wing wherewith they fought with the Corinthians; but got the better against Perdiccas, which Aristeus the Corinthian General seeing, after he returned from the pursuit, broke through, and fled into Potidaea. nians were slain 150. amongst whom Callias the General, but of the contrary part few lesse than 300. The Athenians after this victory drew a line against the Town, and a supply of 1600 fresh men being sent as from Athens under the Command of Phormio, closely besieged it both by Sea and Land. These were the mutual causes of the heart-burnings of the Corinthians and Peloponnesians against the Athenians, & of the Athenians against them, about Corcyra, and Potidea, both of them Colonies of the Corinthian, of which the Athenians defended the former against its founders, whilst they endeavoured to chastise it, and they again incited the later, with other Towns which were Tributaries to Athens, to renounce their allegiance to that State.

24. Potidea being thus blocked up, the Corinthians were highly concerned, both for the Town it self, and such of their own Citizens as were therein; and resolving that it was no time now to be idle, sent to their associates of Peloponnesus to meet them at Lacedæmon, where they grievously inveighed against the Athenians. Liberty being given to every man to speak, several others also sharply accused them, but especially the Deputies of Megara, for many injuries, and chiefly for that, contrary to the agreement made with them, they had interdicted them the Ports and Market of Athens. The Corinthians cunningly suffered the rest to speak first, that by them the Lacedæmonians might be incensed against the Athenians, but then, after all, more fully and earnestly laid open their faults, aggravated the injuries received from them, pressed the great danger which threatened Peloponnesus from their power, checked the Lacedæmonians for their too much remissness in vindicating the cause of their distressed friends and allies, and plainly declared, that if now they would not do it, they must strengthen themselves with other confederates.

Their Ambassadors answer in their behalf.

25. It hapned at this time that there were at Lacedæmon some Ambassadors sent from Athens upon other business, who understanding how things went, desired also to be heard, and this being obtained, sought to allay the stomach of the Peloponnesians by calm and prudent reasons. They desired not to be understood, as though they came to plead the cause of their State which they neither could acknowledge as guilty, nor own them as their Judges: but desired, and advised them not rashly to resolve upon any violent course, nor give credit to all that was objected, untill such time as they could thoroughly understand the case; for that things being once confounded could not easily again be composed. They mentioned the commodities of peace, and the evils that come by War; charged these calumnies upon the envy of their accusers, who could not behold the power of Athens without prejudice, though it was obtained no otherwise than as the reward of vertue, as the associates themselves could not but witness, who knew well enough how the Athenians merited at Marathon of all Greece, as afterwards at Salamine; and they averred, that they had used their power so moderately, as none had any reason to complain. That they had increased their strength they denied not, which to endeavour was agreeable to the Law of nature, as also that the weaker should obey the more potent; so that it was without injury, though not without force, which was absolutely necessary for the maintenance of any command, and was practised not onely by themselves, but the Lacedæmonians also, and would ever so be in the like cases. Again, they laid before them the uncertainty of the event of War, and concluded with a religious protestation, concerning their innocency, and desire of peace.

Archidamus
King of Lac- dæmon his prudent discourse.

26. The Lacedæmonians having heard both parties, debated the business amongst themselves. They were generally inclined to make War presently upon the Athenians as the Authors of many injuries, which Archidamus, one of their Kings, and a very prudent, and moderate man observing, by a grave speech dehorred them, not from undertaking a War for the safety of their Allies, but rushing into it; for that the strength of Athens, and of their own State (as he said) being compared, there was need of a sufficient time to make provision for it, in which not onely the assistance of the Græcians, but of the Barbarians also was requisite. He shewed that the Athenians could not be subdued subdued by the wasting of Atica, having all provisions in a readinesse, and that it was no policy for them being unprovided to deal with such an Enemy: but that rather the thing was to be deferred till things could be in a readinesse, in which time the Athenians might perhaps be in a better mind, and give satisfaction without constraint; and this could not turn to the disgrace of the Lacedemonians, in that they followed the example of their Ancestors: Lastly, that by how much they took Arms with more advice, they should by so much conclude with more happiness and celerity. But Sthenelaidas one of the Ephors, and who spake last, dissenting from the judgement of Archidamus very sharply perswaded the people to take up Arms against the Athenians, as violators of the former Leagues, and War was decreed accordingly, not so much at the instance of their confederates, as out of fear of the growing power of Athens. This was done in the 14th year after the ending of the Eubœan War, and the Truce made for 30 years.

Which is crossed by Sthenelaidas, and War is decreed.

27. The Lacedemonians acquainted the Deputies with what was resolved; but withall told them they would signifie it to all their associates, that if so be the War should be decreed by the common consent, it might be carried on with their joyn^t force: then departed they to their several homes to know the minds of their Superiours, and the Athenian Ambassadors returned. After their departure, the Lacedemonians, before the matter should any further proceed, sent to Delphos to enquire of the Oracle concerning the event of the War, whence receiving such answer as they wished, they again sent for their Allies, and propounded the business to them, who unanimously decreed the War, which was exceedingly pressed by the Corinthians, who, before this meeting, for fear of the losse of Potidea had sent about it. It being not expedient to begin the War unprovided, all were desired to repair home, and make all provisions possible (in which was almost spent a year) and in the mean time Ambassadors were sent to Athens to make demands, of which, if any were denied, a more specious pretence might be obtained for the War.

The Lacedemonians enquire at Delphos about it.

28. In the first Embassie they demanded the expiation of a piacular offence, in which Pericles was involved by his Mothers kindred. For, knowing him to be a man of great Counsel and courage, by all means they endeavoured upon this account to have him banished; but the other objected to the Lacedemonians, that they had drawn out of the Temple of Neptune some of their Hei^lots, and slain them, and starved Pausanias to death in that of Pallas Chalcicea, where he took sanctuary. After this the Spartans sent to require them to abstain from Potidea, to set at liberty Ægina, and especially they pressed them to let the Inhabitants of Megara have the liberty of their Port and Market, without which they must expect nothing but War: but to none of these demands was there given any satisfying answer, the Megarians being accused for appropriating to their own use the ground which belonged to the goddess of Eleusine, and receiving such fugitive slaves as fled from Athens. In the third message Ramphius and his Collegues added but this to the other demands, that the Lacedemonians were desirous of peace, and would grant it, in case the Athenians would suffer all the Græcians to be free, and live according to their own Laws. These things thus often the Spartans demanded, to amuse the other party till they themselves could be provided, and to catch at a specious pretence for a quarrell.

29. The Athenians upon the last message called the Assembly of the people to deliberate about the matter, that they might send a clear and positive answer once for all. Many speaking pro and con, at length Pericles the most excellent of all the Athenians of that age, both for doing and speaking, with his eloquence (wherewith he was said by the Poets to Thunder and Lighten) easily drew the multitude to his mind. After he had inveighed against the Lacedemonians as swollen with envy, he excused themselves, and encouraged the people from their ability to undertake the War. He advised that this answer should be returned: That the

SECT. 2. decree against them of Megara should be rescinded; in case the Lacedæmonians would give such freedom of their City to the Athenians and other of the associates: that they would set all Cities under their jurisdiction at liberty, which were free before, when the League should be entered into; provided the Athenians by the advice of Pericles, gave a positive answer once for all by way of denial. Spartans would do the same, and suffer such as were under them to live according to their own customs, and not to be tyed to those of Laconia: and lastly, that they were content to be judged concerning the things in controversy, according to the leagues; neither would they first make War, but effectually defend themselves. He added, that this was both just and honourable, and if they undertook the War cheerfully, they should find their Enemies less considerable: that out of the greatest extremities the greatest honour was wont to accrue both to their State in general, and to each Citizen in particular, which he made good by instancing in the Median War, at which time the City was far less considerable than at the present, and whence it arrived to that pitch of greatness: he told them it was fit they should imitate their Ancestors, and leave not the Empire received from them diminished unto posterity.

30. Why Pericles should be so earnest for the War (a) several reasons have been alleged, and this (b) amongst the rest, that he was not able to make account for the publick money he had received to build a Port in the Castle to the honour of Minerva. He consumed abundance of treasure in this work, and none looking after him, diverted the publick money taken up under that pretence to other uses. Whilst he considered hereof, and far sorrowful at home, Alcibiades a Boy and his Sisters Son (whom after his Brother in Laws death he brought up in his own house, and who afterwards became very eminent) came and asked him why he was so sad, to whom he answered, because he knew not how to give an account of his Office, at which the Boy replied, Study therefore rather how thou mayst not need to give an account of it. This most prudent man destitute of advice from himself, used this of a child, and for this reason perswaded the people to the War, that being intangled therein they might have no leisure to call him to account for the disbursement of the money. What ever his motives were, the People (c) decreed what he proposed, and answered the Lacedæmonians particularly according to what he said, and in general, that they would do nothing they had enjoined them, but were ready to acquit themselves of those matters laid against them, before equal and indifferent Judges; and with this answer the Ambassadors returned to Lacedæmon, whence no more came. These were the quarrels which foreran the War, being begun about the affairs of Epidamnus and Corcyra. Notwithstanding this disagreement, yet they continued commerce with each other, went to and fro without any publick Officer, or Herald; but yet not without jealousy of one another. For these things that hapned made confusion in the Leagues, and ministred matter for War.

2. In the second month of Pythodorus his Government, and the beginning of the Spring, 300 Thebans seized upon Plataea, by the treachery of some in the Town, being associate to the Athenians; for they perceiving a War to be drawing on, and knowing that Town to be always in peace adverse to them, thought good to make sure of it betimes. The Inhabitants thinking more to have got in, than indeed did, at the first yielded it, but then again apprehending the truth, resolved to rescue their liberty, and set by night upon the Thebans, whom they knew to be weary, ignorant of the Town, and would be much troubled with the dirt, by reason of abundance of rain which fell that night. The device prospered, and they slew almost half the number, taking the rest prisoners, which were 180, and amongst them Eurymachus the Author of this Expedition. It hapned that from Thebes another Party came too late to the help of their fellows if need should be, who seeing what was done, considered whether they should not set upon such Plataeans as were abroad in the Country, and waste it round about, thereby to redeem their friends. The Plataeans (as the Thebans said) sent to them, being afraid of this, and offered them to release the prisoners if they would forbear to spoil their grounds; but in case they did, threatened to put them to death; whereupon the Thebans withdrew; and yet for all this the Plataeans put their friends to death. The Plataeans on the other hand alleged, that they never made any promise to dismiss them; but in case they should agree in treaty. But they sent to Athens to give them notice there of this attempt made upon their Town.

3. The message being carried before the Thebans were put to death, the Athenians sent word to Plataea, that they would do nothing against them till they heard further from them; after they had first seized upon such Boeotians as were in their Dominions. Then after the truth was known, they sent an Army which victualled the place, and taking out the uselesse multitude of both Sexes, put a Garrison therein. Thus the League being plainly broken on both sides, both parties prepared themselves for the War, both sent away Ambassadors to the Persian, and other Barbarians, and set themselves to obtain new alliances. And who with the Athenians.

The Provision of the Athenians for War.

which they interpreted according to their affection. Most were inclined towards the Lacedæmonians, who professed themselves the vindicators of the liberty of Greece, and hating the Athenians, either for that they desired to shake off their yolk, or feared to undergo it. On the Lacedæmonian side were all the Peloponnesians except the Argives and Achaans, who were friends to both, all but the Inhabitants of Pellene amongst the latter, who at the beginning sided with the Lacedæmonians, and afterwards the rest also joyned themselves to them. Without Peloponnesus the Megarians, Phocians, Locrians, Bæotians, Ambraciots, Leucadians, Anactorians. The Corinthians, Megarians, Sicyonians, Pellenians, Eleans, Ambraciots, and Leucadians, furnished them with ships; the Bæotians, Phocians, and Locrians, sent out Horse-men, and the rest of the States supplied them with Foot.

4. With the Athenians stood the Cbians, Lesbians, Plataeans, Messenians inhabiting Naupactus, most of the Acar-nanians, the Corcyreans, Zacynthians, and the rest of the tributary Cities all over, the Carians inhabiting the Sea-coasts, the Dorians their neighbours, Ionia upon the Helle-spont, several Towns of Thrace, and other places not few, the Islands lying betwixt Peloponnesus and Crete towards the Sun-rising, and all the Cyclades except Melus and Thera. The Cbians, Lesbians, and Corcyreans, afforded shipping, the rest, men and money, as Thucydides writeth, who in this Catalogue passeth by Eubœa and Sar-nus, though they abounded with shipping, and sided with the Athenians. Presently after the action about Plataea, the Lacedæmonians sent abroad to their associates to meet at the Isthmus, which they did accordingly, two third parts out of each of the Cities. Here Archidamus the Spartan King and Captain General, having first gravely advised them not to trust too much to their own strength, though they made up such an Army as the eldest of them had never seen, sent to Athens to see if that City would now remit any of it's former rigor; but the messenger being sent back without hearing, he marched for Attica, the Bæotians at the same time having invaded the Territories of the Plataeans.

5. Ere Archidamus invaded Attica, Pericles his friend, who by the Athenians with nine others was appointed General, foreseeing that if he should spare his Villages, either upon the account of their particular friendship, or by order from the Spartan State, to render him suspected, it would create him abundance of envy and ill will, to avoid all suspicion, called the People together, and gave the said Villages to the Commonwealth, and advised them to gather all their things out of the Villages, and contain themselves within the City, to take care of their shipping, and not to neglect their confederates, from whom they might be supplied with money, which together with good counsel and advice is the sinews of War. He told them that they had 600 Talents of Tribute yearly coming in, besides other revenues; that they had in the Castle left 6000 Talents of Silver ready coyned, besides in bullion and plate 500 Talents more, and money in the Temples, besides forty pound of pure Gold about the statue of Pallas, which it was lawful to use in extremity, making it up again afterwards. They had ready 19000 Foot-men, and 1200 Horse, besides others that used bows on Horse-back, and 6000 Archers on foot: of Gallies fit for sail 300, and he added other things to make them courageously begin the War. They obeyed him in fetching their goods into the City, and shutting up themselves there, though much to their prejudice and trouble; but such authority had he with the people, having first, to ingratiate himself, enlarged the authority and liberty of the multitude, whereby afterwards in effect he ruled alone. They set themselves also with all their might to the rigging of their Fleet, and gathering together the forces of their Confederates.

6. The Peloponnesian Army entred Attica by Oenoe a Castle of the Arbe-nians, upon the frontiers of Bœotia, and there Archidamus staid, providing all things for the storm. Being somewhat long in his preparations, his adversaries thence found matter wherewith to accuse him, as one who affected the the Athenians, and on purpose before at the Isthmus, and now also protracted the time till they should have removed all their goods out of Attica. He indeed thought they might be inclined to a composition for the saving of their goods, and therefore did delay his march, but finding no message sent, and not being able to take the Castle, he removed about 80 dayes after the Thebans entered Plataea, in the height of Summer, Corn being now ripe, and invaded Attica, which he wasted as far as Acharna, the strongest Garrison of all the Countrey, and but seven or eight miles distant from Athens. When they in the Citie understood this, having not suspected he would have peirced so far, and afflicted for the losse they sustained, they began to be much moved, (especially they of Acharna, who seemed to themselves a considerable part in the State) and tumultuously gathering together, now began to rail at Pericles, for that he being General did not lead them out against the Enemy. He would not call the assembly nor any Company together, for fear they should resolve rashly upon any thing; but was very carefull of the defence of the Citie, and sent out a party of horse, of which some were Thessalian Auxiliaries, to restrain the excursions of the Enemy into the parts adjacent, which was beaten back with some losse. At length the Peloponnesians seeing the Athenians would not come out to fight, removed from Acharna, and wasting other places, departed through Bœotia into Peloponnesus, and went severally to their own homes.

The Athenians send a Fleet into Peloponnesus to divert their enemies.

7. Whilest they were yet in Attica, the Athenians, to divert them, sent out a Fleet of 100 Gallies, on which were aboard 1000 Soldiers of heavy Armour, and 400 Archers, with which the Corcyraens joyned 50 Vessels more, and other associates contributed their numbers. Coasting the Peloponnesian shore, besides other harm done, they landed in Laconia, and had taken Methone, then unwall'd, and meanly manned, but that Brasidas the Spartan with 100 men brake through, and getting into the Town, defended it so, as they were glad to retreat to their ships. Then went they to Elis, where they seized on Phia, and staying there two dayes, harrassed the Countrey, and overthrew such as were sent to restrain them: but their ships being sorely tossed with a Tempest, and hardly recovering the Haven of Phia, and understanding also that greater forces were coming against them, they departed thence, and grievously distressed such places as they came to. At the same time also another Fleet was sent from Athens to infect the Locrians, and defend Eubœa, which did much harm upon the Coasts of Locris, took Thronium, took Hostages with them, and overthrew the Locrians that came out to resist them. In the same Summer the Athenians cast out the Inhabitants of Ægina, for that they imputed to them the especial cause of the War, and judged that Island convenient for them to place a Colony therein of their own. The Lacedæmonians out of requital for the kindnesse received from them during the Earth-quake, and War with their slaves, and out of hatred to the Athenians, gave them Thyrea and its Territories to inhabit (which separate Laconia from the Countrey of Argos, reaching as far as the Sea;) but such of them as this place for its straightnesse could not receive, were dispersed up and down Greece it self.

They eject the Inhabitants of Ægina, and plant a Colony of their own in the Island.

An Eclypse of the Sun on the third of August.

8. This same Summer, at the change of the Moon, hapned such an Eclypse of the Sun (at which time saith Thucydides, it is judged that it can onely happen) that at Mid-day the Stars were seen, which according to the Julian account hapned on the third day of August, as the Astronomical Tables demonstrate. About the same time the Athenian Fleet of 100 Gallies having in Acarmania taken several Towns, came to Cephalonia, an Island lying over against Acarmania and Leucas, which being inhabited in four Towns, they reduced without one stroke, and so returned home. In the beginning of Autumn, the Athenians with a vast Army invaded Megaris, which wasting in an hostile manner they returned, and so they did once a year, till they got Nisæa into their hands. At this time also they placed a Garrison in Atalante, an Island belonging to the Locrians of Opus, which hitherto no body had peopled, lest it should prove an Harbour for Robbers that from Locris might prey upon Enbea. In Winter, according to their custom, they solemnised the Funeral for those that first died in the War on this manner. First, their bones for three dayes were laid out to be seen in a Tent, where it was lawfull for their friends to come, and do such duties as was usual to the dead. Then when they were carried out, each Tribe came, and putting the bones of their fellows into Cypresse Coffins, carried them away on Chariots, and one Chest was carried empty for such as had not been found; the women of their kindred making lamentation as for them. Then were they buried in a publick Sepulchre, in the most famous Suburb of the Citie, called Ceramicus, where all slain in War were constantly buried, except they that fell at Marathon, who for their greater honour were buried in the place of the fight. After they were buried, some one Eminent for prudence and eloquence made a Funeral Oration in commendations of them, which at this time was most excellently performed by Pericles. The scope of his speech was to shew they deserved immortal glory for shedding their blood in their Countreys behalf, and to excite the living to seek after such renown. With this Winter ended the first year of the Peloponnesian War, whose History for its influence into the whole is the more considerable.

Attica the second time invaded, when it was seized with a fearfull plague.

9. In the Spring the Peloponnesians again under conduct of Archidamus their former General invaded Attica, at which time fell also upon it, a most fearfull plague, as it is described by Thucydides, who was sick of it, as seldom hapned; during the rage of which they plundered and wasted the Countrey all over. Pericles returning to his former Counsel, hindred the Citizens who were very desirous to issue out and fight, and provided an hundred ships, with which and fifty of the associates of Chius and Lesbus, armed with 4000 foot and 300 horse, he departed to Peloponnesus, the Coasts of which he sore wasted, and forced the Army to return home to defend it, which they were willing to do also because of the plague, after they had been in Attica forty dayes. After the return of Pericles, his Army was sent under the Command of Agnon and Cleopompus, against Chalcis and Potidaa, at the later of which it was seized by the pestilence, and greatly diminished, and Agnon with 1500. which remained of 4000, returned home. But the people being sore afflicted by the plague and War together, were angry now against Pericles, as him that moved them to take up Arms, who calling them together sharply reprov'd them; and they confessed what he said to be true, and that he had advised them upon good grounds, but being enraged at their private discommodities, they fined him 80 Talents, and banished him the Citie, and yet presently after, according to the inconstant nature of the multitude, recalled, and created him General with full power.

Potidaa delivered up to the Athenians.

10. In the same Summer a Navy from Peloponnesus of an hundred Gallies fell upon Zazynthus, an Island addicted to the Athenians, which wasting, and being not able to do any more, they returned home. The Peloponnesians also in the end of Summer sent Ambassadors to the Persian King to desire aid, who were also commanded to go to Sitalces King of Thrace, to desire a League of confederacy with him; but they were taken near the Hellepont by some Athenians, through the assistance of Sadocus the Kings son, and free of Athens; and being brought thither, in revenge for some Athenians, Merchants, and others, slain in Peloponnesus, they were put to death. In Winter twenty Gallies were sent from Athens to Naxos to secure the Straights lying betwixt Peloponnesus and Æolia, and other six to Caria and Lycia, to gather money, under Command of Melesander, who in a fight was there slain with part of his forces. Potidaa now also being in despair of any supply from Peloponnesus, and sore afflicted with famine (which raged so far as they ate man's flesh) yielded to the Athenians. Of the besieged such as were Males had liberty to depart with one Garment apiece, Females with two, and a little provision. The Citie being thus emptied was replenished with a Colony from Athens, to which state this siege stood in 2000 Talents. And so the second year of the War ended with this Winter.

11. In the next Spring Archidamus the Lacedæmonian King marched against Plataea, and besieged it. The Plataeans sent to him to desire he would forbear to use any extremity against them; but he returned them very harsh conditions, requiring them to forsake the Athenians, to give up their Citie, and all they had, for the time of War, and in the mean time to go and dwell somewhere else, promising that as soon as the War should be over, they should have all entirely restored to them. They desired a Truce, till such time as they could send to the Athenians, their associates, and know their mind, who being utterly against it, they then sent Archidamus word, that they were resolved to undergo whatsoever the chance of War should lay upon them, for that they neither could, nor would revolt from the Athenians. He then fell of waiting their grounds, and with all his might attempted the Citie, which was as valiantly and powerfully defended by the Inhabitants. No way taking, at length the Spartans attempted it by fire, which consumed most part of the Town, leaving but a few houses for the Plataeans to live in. Yet still the matter succeeded not, and at length despairing to take the place by force, they raised a Wall round about it, which they fenced with a double Ditch to shut them in, and leaving sufficient Guards, departed home. Before this the Townsmen had sent out to Athens all their uselesse Company. This same year the Athenians fought with various successe in Ibrie and Acarnania.

ad ana. 3.

12. In the later end of this Summer, and the 6th Moneth of the year died Pericles, of the Epidemical disease, or the Plague, as Plutarch reporteth, though not by its sudden force as others, but in a way of Consumption, which, if so, was extraordinary. As he drew on towards his end, some of the principal men of Athens that were left alive of his ancient friends, as they sate by him, not thinking that he understood any thing, discoursed much of his great and many victories and Trophies which he had erected, placing therein the main of his commendation. He understanding the discourse, interrupted them, saying, that he wondred they should especially take notice of those things, which fortune made common to him with others, and make no mention of that which was most worthy and remarkable, for No man, saith he, upon mine account hath put on a black Garment. A man he was to be had in constant admiration, not onely for his equity and mildnesse, which he shewed in so many businesses of concernment, and such enmities as were exercised against him; but also for his greatnesse of spirit, that this he especially charged upon himself, nor to indulge his anger in so great power, or his malice; neither to be implacable towards his greatest adversary: and this seemeth to be the reason that he enjoyed the surname of Olympius without envy, because he was of so sweet a disposition, & in the greatest power preserved his life unblemished. The great misse the Athenians had of him made them soon perceive what man he was, whose power whilst alive they ill bore, as dalling their eyes; when dead, and they had experience of others, they confessed that no man could in that height of place have carried himself more moderately, or in that modesty more gravely, and that height of power which used to be branded with the name of Tyranny, appeared in him to have been the wholsom preservative of the Commonwealth; such depravednesse of manners, and excesses of wickednesse falling upon all things after his death, which he weakning and keeping under as long as he lived, procured that it exceeded not the strength of the remedy.

dation.

13. The Summer following being the fourth year of the Peloponnesian War, rising, the Peloponnesians and their confederates made the third invasion of Attica, when Corn was now ripe, under the Conduct of the same Archidamus, which they wasted up and down as long as their provisions lasted. In the mean time all the Island Lesbus (except Methymna) revolted from the Athenians, having had a great desire to do it before the War, but that the Lacedæmonians would not receive them. A Fleet of fourty ships were then presently dispatched from Athens, and War was denounced to the Inhabitants of Mitylene, except they delivered up their ships, and Hereupon they desired a Treaty, and obtained truce to send an Ambassage to Athens about a Peace: but in the mean while they sent underhand Ambassadors to Lacedæmon, to desire a straight League and alliance, with present aid. The Ambassadors being ordered by the Spartans to stay at Olympia at the time of the solemnity of the 88th Olympiad pleaded there their cause, and in the name of their City were received into the League, and assistance out of hand was promised to them. Another Expedition was then resolved on into Attica, but the Spartans being ready, at the Isthmus, whereas their associates loitered, and the Athenians then with a Fleet of 30 ships preid upon Peloponnesus, they being advertized of the loss they sustained in Laconia, returned home.

The Athenians besiege Mitylene.

14. Yet the Peloponnesians in performance of their promise made to the Mitylenæans, dispatched away a Fleet of 40 Gallies, which found another from Athens to oppose it, consisting of 100; for the Athenians now abounded in shipping, having ready furnished 250 Gallies, on which they expended much, so as to defray their expences, they now first of all were assisted, exacting yet from their confederates the usual Tributes, which they paid with much repining. At the same time the Mitylenæans and the rest of the Lesbians made War upon the Methymnæans, who persisted in their obedience to the Athenians. These understanding of it, sent at the latter end of Summer a band of men into the Island, which drew a line round about Mitylene, upon which Guards being set, the Inhabitants were straightly besieged. In Winter the Inhabitants of Plæa being greatly distressed for want of victuals, and despairing of any aid from Athens, resolved to break through the Enemies Fortifications, though exceeding difficult to be passed, and save themselves by flight. Many for the difficulty of the thing changed their minds, but 300 stood firm in their resolution, and taking advantage of an exceeding dark and tempestuous night, with remarkable courage and constancy brake through, and (the rest being repulsed into the City) came safe unto Athens. Towards the end of Winter Sarabus was sent from Lacedæmon to Mitylene, to encourage the besieged to hold out, by promise of help; and another Expedition to be made by the confederates into Attica. And so the fourth year of the Peloponnesian War ended.

Attica invaded the fifth time, and the Mitylenæans yield.

15. In the beginning of the fifth year, the Peloponnesians sent 40 ships to Lesbus to the relief of the Mitylenæans, under the conduct of Aleidas, and they themselves with an Army, over which Cleomenes (Uncle and Guardian to Pausanias their young King yet under age) was Captain, invaded Attica the fifth time, which they most grievously distressed; but hearing nothing from Lesbus that they liked, and being in scarcity of victuals, they returned the sooner into Peloponnesus. The Mitylenæans being sorely distressed in the same manner, whether the Magistrate would or not, yielded themselves to the mercy of the Athenians, which the Peloponnesian Fleet understanding before they arrived at Lesbus, went over to the Coast of Asia, and there having cast many things in their heads, without anything of note performed, returned, through the perswasion of their General, into Peloponnesus, being from Lesbus in vain pursued by Paches the Athenian Captain. He returning from the pursuit, settled things in Lesbus according to his own mind, sent Salathus the Lacedæmonian messenger (whom he took in the Town) with the authors of the revolt, and some whom the Towns-men sent to intercede for them, unto Athens, staying there himself for further orders. Salathus was presently put to death, and the people being called together to consult about the Mitylenæans, resolved, at the instigation of Cleon, a man of bitter severity, that all those of rife age should be put to death, as well as they that were sent to Athens, and all the women and children should be made bond-slaves; and this decree was without delay sent to Paches to be put into execution. But considering of this rash and cruel sentence, they repented of what they had done, and the next day met to advise further of it, when again Cleon a man in great grace with them, pressed vehemently the former decree.

A severe sentence against them.

But

But Dionotus one of a milder spirit opposed him, and having endeavoured the day before to no purpose to do it, now by very few voices carried it from him.

Reversed.

16. Then was there dispatched a swift Galley, with order if possible to get before that which carried the former Decree, and command Paches to abstain from putting it in execution. Yet the former arrived at Mitylene first, having set forth a whole day before it; but whilst Paches was considering of the sharpness of the Decree, and how to perform it, the latter arrived, and so the lives of the multitude were saved, being so near to destruction, as scarce any thing nearer. But to punish the revolt, above 1000 of those whom Paches had sent to Athens as authors of it, the People commanded to be put to death, Mitylene was deprived of it's walls and ships, all Lesbu. except the Methymneans had hard conditions imposed upon them. The fields were taken from all the owners, of which the tenth part being dedicated to the gods, the remainder was distributed to the Citizens of Athens, the tillage thereof being left under a vast rent to the Lesbians: and all such Towns as were now subject to the Mityleneans, the Athenians reduced under their Dominions. The same Summer they seized upon Minoas, an Island lying before the shore of Megaris, and the Port of Nisa, and fortifying it, made the Coasts more safe and convenient to all intents. In the mean time those that were left in Plataea were forced by meer famine to yield themselves and City to the judgement of the Lacedaemonians, who sent five men to hear their Orators, and the Thebans their Enemies. These men adjudged them all to death, which accordingly was executed upon them to the number of 200, with whom were slain 25 Athenians found in the Town, and the women adjudged to slavery. The City for some time was given to some exiles to inhabit: then, scarce a year being past, was by the Thebans utterly destroyed, an Inn only being built out of the ruins of the Temple of Juno, and the Temple it self enlarged, all the grounds being seized on by the Thebans. This was the fortune of the Plataeans (who thought they might have had some favour shewed them for the merits of their Ancestors in the Median War) after they had continued 93 years in the society with Athens, and no more is to be heard of them till Plataea was rebuilt by Alexander the Great.

Plataea at length yielded and destroyed.

A lamentable sedition at Corcyra.

17. During these things, a most lamentable sedition hapned at Corcyra, part of the Citizens being for Popular Government, and the rest for that of a few or the most potent; the former trusting to the aid of the Athenians, as conformable to their policy, and the other to the Peloponnesians. Twice within the City did they fight, and both the Athenians and Peloponnesians sent their Fleets to the assistance of their Friends; but the Athenians being stronger at Sea, and sending 60 Gallies more to the help of the former Navy, the Peloponnesians withdrew themselves, having only lightly skirmished with the Enemy in the sight of Corcyra, before the latter Fleet arrived. Then those for the Popular Government, strengthened by the assistance of the Athenians, cruelly raged against their adversaries, no mercy being shewn to such as took Sanctuary, or hung upon the Altars, neither from Parents to their own Children, insomuch that the City was almost shaken to pieces and made desolate, and a grievous Sedition indeed came afterwards proverbially to be termed a Corcyraean. And it was not only fatal to Corcyra, but to all Greece besides, being drawn into example by other States which afterwards broke out into factions.

Stirs in Sicilie of which the Athenians make advantage.

18. At the same time the Greek Cities in Sicilie fell into dissensions, some being of the Dorick, and others of the Ionick faction, the head of the former Syracuse, and of the latter Leontium, which two made War upon each other. The Leontines craved aid of the Athenians, for that they were not only of the Ionian stock, but conjoynd with them in an ancient League of confederacy. The Athenians willingly took the opportunity to get some footing in Sicilie, to hinder thereby the exportation of Corn thence into Peloponnesus, and especially to make way for their power and dominion there.

At

SECT. 3. At the end of Summer they sent thither twenty Gallies. In Winter these ships assisted with ten more from Rhegium in Italy, invaded the Aeolian Islands near to Sicilie, and wasted such as refused to yield. At the same Season the Plague began again at Athens, which took away a great number of Soldiers, but much greater of the common people: Earthquakes also hapned in several places. And with this Winter the fifth year of the Peloponnesian War ended.

The sixth Summer of the War.

19. In the beginning of the next Summer, the Peloponnesians came the sixth time to the Isthmus, with intent to invade Attica, under the conduct of Agis the Spartan King; but being affrighted with the frequent Earthquakes, they returned. In the mean while the War in Sicily variously proceeded. Laches the Athenian Captain taking some Towns. The Athenians sent out one Fleet to infest Peloponnesus, and another the Island Melus, which stubbornly withstood their commands, both which did nothing of very great concernment. The Spartans planted the Colony of Heraclea, in the platform of old Trachiniae a City in Thessalie, being for the convenience of it's situation upon the Sea, and the Haven, very fit for carrying on the War against the Athenians. These received a great losse from the Aeolians, but in Winter thrice overthrew the Ambraciots, who were forsaken by their friends the Peloponnesians, which made them now imbrace a Peace with their adversaries the Acarnanians and Amphilochians (who called in the Athenians against them) and entred into a league and society for ten years with them. The war proceeding all this while in Sicily, a greater Fleet was sent under conduct of Eurymedon and Sophocles, to oppose the Syracusians, towards the end of Winter, at which time the Hill Aetna belched out great store of fire into the Territories of Catana, 50 years after it had the last time so done. Thus the sixth year of the Peloponnesian War ended.

sixth time invaded,

20. In the beginning of the next, the Peloponnesians under the command of Agis the Son of Archidamus the Spartan King, again invaded Attica. The Athenians having furnished 40 ships for Sicilie, gave order to the Captains, in their way to have an eye to the Corcyraeans, who were much infested by their own exiles, and were in fear of 60 Peloponnesian Gallies sent thither: and to Demosthenes was given the command of some ships wherewith he should infest Peloponnesus. As all the ships sailed by Laconia, Demosthenes a man of a prompt and earnest disposition, advised the other Captains to fortifie Pylus, which is a ragged Promontory joyned to the main by a little neck of Land. Before it lies a small barren Island of lesse than two miles compasse, and within that a Creek which is a good harbour for ships, the force of weather being born off by the head-land and Isle. The Promontory having anciently belonged to the Messenians, and now desolate, he pressed fore that they might seize upon, and make their own, being very convenient for the wasting of Laconia; but the other Captains dissented from him, hasting for Corcyra, when in the mean time such a tempest arose as forced them to take into the Harbour. Then did he again urge his former advice, and though he nothing more profited with the Captains, yet the Soldiers desirous to make some stay there, and seeing the commodiousnesse of the Haven, fell upon fortifying the place, and with wonderful diligence and pains perfected the wall in six dayes. Then was Demosthenes left there to keep it with five ships, and the rest directed their course for Corcyra.

21. The news of these doings at Pylus drew the Peloponnesians in all hast thither out of Attica, fifteen dayes after their arrival, and they brought their whole Force both by Land and Sea to recover this piece of ground, which they well foresaw how bad a neighbour it might prove in time. In the Island named Sphacteria, they placed a number of men all Spartans, which were to keep it by their turns, and stopped up the Haven on both sides, that there might be no entrance in for the Athenian ships: then furiously did they assault Pylus both by Land and Sea, but it was as valiantly defended by Demosthenes; So that with several new onsets the storm was continued till the next day, and then the Peloponnesians drew off to recruit themselves, and provide provide for a new onset. In the mean time came in forty Athenian ships (to which Demosthenes had before-hand sent to acquaint them with his condition) and with them some belonging to their Allies, which first offered fight to the Peloponnesians in the open Sea; but that being refused, set upon them in the Haven, brake, and sunk many of their Vessels, took some, and forced the rest to run themselves on ground, about which afterwards ensued a great contention, whilst the Athenians would become masters of them, and the Spartans out of shame, and grief for their friends in the Island, laboured with more earnestness to get them off, which they effected by some, and the rest fell as prize to the Enemy, who now closely besieged the Spartans that were left in the Island.

22. Pylus being now secure, but the Spartans in the Island as good as lost, the Magistrates were sent for from Lacedemon into the Camp (as the custom was in great dangers) who perceiving that there was no other way to rescue their Citizens, than by composition with the Enemies, took Truce for a time with the Captains, till they might send to Athens about a peace. The conditions of the Truce were, that the Peloponnesians should deliver up to the other all their ships, as well such as were upon the Coast of Laconia as there, to be restored to them if the peace should not succeed, and that they should attempt nothing upon the Fort, nor the Athenians against their Camp. That a certain quantity of victuals should be daily carried into the Island, but no ships should passe into it secretly; that the Truce should end at the return of the Ambassadors, and if in the mean time it should be broken in any one point, it should be esteemed utterly void in all. The Ambassadors coming to Athens put the people in mind of that moderation all men ought to shew in prosperity, & with what credit they might now, at their request, make a peace. But Cleon a man very vehement, and much in request, withstood it, so that instead of a peace on equal terms, and recompence for harm received, the Athenians demanded certain Cities, which had been by the Spartans long before this War taken from them, and refused to continue the Treary, except the Spartans in the Isle were delivered up to them as prisoners. The Ambassadors returned without successe, and the Truce being ended, both sides betook themselves to their Weapons again about Pylus.

23. The Peloponnesians demanding their sixty ships which they had given up, and now at the end of the Truce were to be restored to them in as good a condition, were put off, under pretence that they had broken the Truce. The Island was also afresh besieged, and the Spartans valiantly standing out, things went on but slowly, so that Cleon himself, who much vaunted what he could do, was by the people, who now began to relent of their not imbracing a peace, forced, whether he would or not, to command a new supply of men thither. He, and Demosthenes (whom he chose for his Colleague) first offered conditions to the Spartans, and then upon their refusal forced them, after the losse of 128. to yield themselves to mercy. The number of those that yielded were 292. (whereof 120 of the Nobility of Sparta) which were carried to Athens, and being closely imprisoned, it was resolved, that when the Peloponnesians next invaded Attica, they should all be slain; and then was a Garrison of Messenians (the old Inhabitants, and bitter Enemies to the Spartans) sent into Pylus. The Lacedemonians sorely discouraged by these Events, and fearing worse things, sent to Athens again about the liberty of the prisoners, and delivery of Pylus, but the Ambassadors were often rejected, and nothing done, the Athenians being still more puffed up by their good successe. This Summer they overthrew the Corinthians in the Isthmus. A Fleet being also sent for Sicily, assisted the Corcyreans in their way against their Exiles (who having got footing in the Mountains, annoyed them) and by their help they now utterly subdued them, and using them with unwonted cruelty, the sedition here had an end. Anachorinum a Town of Corinth, upon the Bay of Ambracta, they also took. In Winter Artaphernes a Persian being sent from his Prince to Lacedemon, was intercepted in Thrace, and brought to Athens, where his Letters being opened and read, they contained no secret, and he was sent back with Ambassadors to Ephesus to the King of Persia, Artaverxes Longimanni, concerning whom they there had intelligence that he was dead, and so the Ambassadors returned home. The Inhabitants of Chius being suspected by the Athenians, were commanded to demolish their new Wall; with these things the seventh year of the War ended.

A partial Eclipse of the
21st of March.

24. In the beginning of the eighth year hapned a partial Eclipse of the Sun, which the Astronomical Tables shew to have fallen out on the 21st day of March after the Julian account, before noon, half of the Diameter or above being obscured, the fourth year of the 88 Olympiad now drawing to an end; and an Earth-quake hapned on the first of the Month Munichion, which some make to fall in with the same day. The Athenians this year fell upon the Island Cythera, lying near to Laconia, and inhabited by a Spartan Colony, which they took, and putting therein a Garrison for a time, thence made excursions into Laconia. Afterwards they took thence a great part of the Colony, and took, and burnt Thyrea, standing upon the Confines of Laconia and Argolis, given by the Spartans to the Æginetans, whom now they took away, and plundering the Town set it on fire. Carrying their prisoners to Athens, the Æginetans were condemned to death, and the Cytheraans being dispersed throughout the Islands, such as they left in Cythera were subjected to a great Tribute. But in Sicily, at this time, an Universal peace was made, and embraced by all the Cities, through the earnest perswasion of Hermocrates a Syracusan; so that the Athenian Forces were driven to quit the Island, for which at their return two of the Generals were unjustly banished, and the third underwent a great fine.

An Universal peace in Sieily.

25. The Exiles of Mitylene with others of Lesbus, and some Mercenaries, seizing upon Rhægium in Asia, took Antandrus; but selling the former again to the Inhabitants, they were drawn out of the later to fight, by Aristides, and Demopholus (or Symmachus, as Diodorus calleth him) who overthrew them, and took the Town from them. These two were Captains of the Fleet, which gathered Tribute from the Islands; their Colleague Lamachus being gone into Pontus against the Heracleans, who being in League with the Persian King denied Tribute. His ships, by the vehemency of water which ran down the River, were shattered, and he lost the greatest part both of them, and his Forces; so that he could not move thence, either by Sea, or Land; whereupon the Heracleans thinking it a more honorable part to do good than to take revenge, furnished him with provisions, and sent him away with a Convoy, esteeming that the wasting of their grounds would be well recompensed if they should make friends of their Enemies. With this Convoy he passed through the Countrey of the Thracians in Asia, and so came to Chalcedon.

Megara.

25. At this time the Inhabitants of Megara were much distressed, what by the several inroads of the Athenians, and their own Exiles whom they had cast out, and now preyed upon them from the Villages. Wearied with these continual disturbances, they thought of recalling the Exiles; but the Magistrates understanding that, and presently apprehending what danger might arise to themselves from those of whose banishment they had been the cause, conspired with Hippocrates and Demosthenes, the two Athenian Captains, to betray the Town to them. The Gates were opened, and the Athenians had been Masters of the place, but that some of the Conspirators changed their minds, and obstructed the business, which the other seeing seized upon part of the long Walls, and casting up a cross work against the Town, set themselves with all their might to compass about the Nisæa, or Port, hoping, if they could get it, the more easily to obtain the Town. And the Garrison in it being presently discouraged by the stopping of victuals, which they were wont daily to receive out of the Town, yielded; the Spartans to mercy, and the rest upon condition of liberty to Ransom themselves. Then the Athenians provided for setting upon the Town: but were hindered by the coming of Brasidas the Spartan, who hovering about Corinth, upon notice how things passed passed here, halted, thinking to prevent the taking of Nisæa, and after he had heard of its surrender, yet used all expedition, hoping to save the Town, and to recover it. But when he came the Megarians were divided in their affections, yet both parties feared to let him in, for that they thought it best to reserve themselves for that party that should have the better, and Govern themselves according to Occurrences, and therefore he was forced to depart at this time without having done one thing or other.

26. Not long after, the Bœotians came, and joyned themselves to Brasidas, and thereupon followed an Engagement with the Athenians, which ended with equal successe to both sides. That party of the Town which favoured the Exiles, being encouraged with the presence of their friends, sent for Brasidas, and other Peloponnesian Officers into the Town, to consult with them, who confirming them in their resolutions then departed home: The Athenians also following, such as sided with them for fear betook themselves to flight. Then were the Exiles recalled, having first taken an Oath to forget all things past, and not consult their own passion, but the good of their Countrey; but having got the power into their hands, and having the Guards of the Citie at their disposal, they caused 100 of those they suspected to be apprehended, and being condemned by a forced judgement of the people, they put them to death. Then taking all the Government to themselves, it continued in an Oligarchical way a long time.

27. At the same time, several amongst the Bœotians attempted to change the frame of their Government, being much desirous of Democracy as it was established at Athens; and to this purpose held correspondence with them there, plotting to betray several places into their hands; but the matter being discovered succeeded not, but onely to the losse of the Athenians, who were overthrown in battel. In the mean while the Lacedæmonians being invited by Perdiccas King of Macedonia, and some of the Inhabitants of Chalcis (who promised them some pay for their men) resolved to send some Forces into Macedonia and Thrace, to divert the power, and design of the Athenians, who now began to be ill thought of by many in those parts, and feared by reason of their growing strength. They made choice of Brasidas for their General, a man of approved valour, and remarkable integrity. They did a thing at this time, which is noted with cruelty and injustice. Being something down the wind in their Fortune, they suspected the power and number of their slaves the Helotes, lest in this their weaknesse they should attempt something against them, and took occasion at this expedition, by offering all such of them liberty as would chearfully imbrace the service, to observe who amongst them were most active, and when they expected to be manumised, instead thereof they made away (though how is not known) about 2000 of them, and sent 700 away with Brasidas, together with 1000 Mercenaries hired out of Peloponnesus.

28. Brasidas after his arrival, by fair means reduced Acanthus and Stagirus (both Colonies of the Andrians) from the Athenians, and then in Winter set upon Amphipolis a famous Colony of theirs, situate upon the River Strymon, which almost compassing it gave an occasion to the later name of it, being before called Nine-ways. In a dark night he seized on the bridge, and all but the Citie it self, and 'tis thought had taken it also had he led his Soldiers on, but such as had conspired with him to betray it being overmatched, and stirring not, he onely wasted the grounds about it, and attempted nothing further for the present. The Inhabitants who affected the Athenians, being more in number, sent to Thucydides the son of Olorus, and the Writer of the History of the Peloponnesian War, then the Athenian General, lying in Thasus, an Island inhabited by a Colony of the Parians, half a dayes sayl distant from Amphipolis, who with seven ships hasted thither to prevent the delivery of it, or however to save Eione. But Brasidas being aware hereof, to obtain Amphipolis before his coming offered them most large conditions; that all should there remain, and live in the same State as formerly, as well Athenians as others; or if they liked better to remove, it should be free for them so to do, which they accepted of, hearing nothing from Thucydides, who yet came to Eione that very night, and saved it, whereas Brasidas else had taken it the next morning. Yet he took three other Towns near to Amphipolis, and left them to be Garrisoned by Perdiccas.

29. The Athenians were much moved for the losse of Amphipolis, which had been of great use to them in affording them Wood for shipping, as well as money, and besides this, how a free passage seemed to be open to the Lacedæmonians to invade their confederates, who thereupon might be induced to revolt by Brasidas, who being a very moderate, and just man of himself, gave out, that his design was to set Greece at liberty. And even so it fell out, for the Cities hearing what had hapned, and great commendations of Brasidas, sent to him to hasten his march towards them, with promise to revolt, thinking they might safely enough do it, for that they falsely perswaded themselves, that the power of the Athenians was not so great as they found it afterwards, when it was too late to repent them of their rash and inconsiderate resolution, into which they were hurried by an earnest desire of liberty. The Athenians having intelligence of this, used all diligence to send Soldiers into all of them, as the shortnesse of the time, and the Winter season would bear. Brasidas sent to Lacedæmon for a new supply of men, but little heed was given to his message, partly because the great ones there envied his glory, and especially because the people being well wearied now with the War, desired to have their men that were taken in the Island, and to make peace. Yet he having made provision for the building of ships upon the River Strymon, went on with the War, drew all the Towns on the Mountain Athos, except two, to submit, and then by surprise taking Torone, a Town of Chalcis, and tributary to the Athenians, he stormed the Castle the third day after. The remainder of the Winter he spent in fortifying the places taken already, and providing for taking of others which he designed. And thus the 8th year of the War ended.

Brasidas envied by his own Country men.

30. In the beginning of Spring the Lacedæmonians for the reasons above mentioned were desirous to come to a composition, and they hoped that now the Athenians, something discouraged by what Brasidas had done in Thrace, might not be averse to it. And indeed they were inclining to a cessation of Arms, that they might stop his proceedings till such time as they could recruit themselves, intending to Govern themselves in reference to the length of the Truce as their affairs should comport, and so a Truce was concluded for a year, the Articles of which imported these things especially. That what both sides possessed at this time they should enjoy; that free access and regresse should be given to Ambassadors and Herald, and their Confederates, to treat about a peace: that Runagates should not be received; that all controversies should be decided by Law, and not by force: and something was added concerning the use of the Sea; In this Truce the Confederates on both sides being comprised. During this Cessation several Treaties were held about a League, but something hapned which disturbed sorely the minds of the Athenians. For Scione a Town of the Peninsula of Pellene of its own accord revolted to Brasidas, and was followed by Menda. Brasidas ignorant of the Truce, after the revolt of the former, laboured sore with the later, and Poridaa, to reduce them also; but then news came to him of the Cessation, and much contention there was about the places; for that the Athenians said that Scione revolted two dayes after the Truce was sworn to, and concluded. Being nor able to recover them by words, they sent an Army to effect it by deeds, and Menda they recovered, whilest Brasidas was absent, assisting Perdiccas the King of Macedonia in his War with Archibæus, where such dissatisfaction passed betwixt the King and him, that thenceforth Perdiccas began to joyn himself to the Athenians. Who compassed Scione about with a Wall, which having finished in the later end of Summer, a sufficient Guard being left, the rest of the Army was brought home. The Winter following all was quiet betwixt the two States by vertue of the Truce; but the Mantineans and Tegeatans fought a battel with equal successe, both parties erecting their their trophies. The Spring drawing on, Brasidas attempted by night to surprise Potidaea, but missed of his purpose. And with this Winter the ninth year of the War ended, in which the Temple of Juno at Argos was burnt through the negligence of Chrysis the Woman-Priest, which flying for it, another was placed in her room, after she had during this War continued eight years and and half therein.

Thrace, is up.

31. The Truce being expired on the day of the Pythian Games, the seventh of the month Thargelion, Cleon having himself perswaded the Athenians to undertake the Expedition, was sent into Thrace with a Fleet of thirty ships, aboard of which were 1200 Foot, and 300 Horse, besides Confederates. Hearing that Torone was but manned with a mean Garrison, he departed from the siege of Scione, and set upon it with such earnestness, both by Land and Sea, that in the same day he took it, and though he attempted Siagirus in vain, yet he effectually did it upon Galopsus, a Colony of the Thasians, after which he staid at Eione expecting some Auxiliaries out of Macedonia, and Thrace. Here he grew very secure, being exceedingly puffed up with his late success, and that at Pylus, which he arrogantly imputed to his own wisdom; but his men disdained to lye idle, and pretended to be wearie of his Government, as thinking him unfit to command. Herewith he moved from Eione in a secure posture, thinking of nothing less than fighting, which was taken notice of by Brasidas, who having fewer men than he, and less experienced, thought it not wisdom to trie a battel with him, nor at once to let him have a fight with all his Forces; but pouring them violently upon him by degrees, thereby to confound and overthrow his Army. He had a discovery of Brasidas his intents, and began to retreat, but then he fell upon him out of Amphipolis in the manner aforesaid, and without much ado put his men to the rout. Cleon himself flying was slain outright, and Brasidas before this was mortally wounded and carried to Amphipolis, where he died, after he had heard how his men had got the Victory, being honoured by the Towns-men, as an Heroe, by Sacrifice, anniversary Solemnities, and naming a Colony after him, which they did to ingratiate themselves with Sparta, because of the fear they stood in of the Athenians. Of the Athenians were slain 600; but of the Conquerours but seven; such disadvantage was there in the battel.

Both the Athenians and Lacedaemonians desire peace,

32. In the beginning of Winter Ramphias with others in commission with him, was sent from Lacedaemon with new Forces, and came as far as Pieria an hill of Thessalie; but there the Thessalians opposed his passage, and news of Brasidas his death arriving, other causes also moving him (whereof this was not the least, that the Spartans before his coming from home were inclined to a peace,) he returned into Lacedaemon. And after the action at Amphipolis, and his return, came to be known, both sides for weighty and urgent reasons were much more enclined to it, Cleon and Brasidas being both slain, whereof the one was a man of a turbulent spirit, and the other a great soldier, who sought after glory in Military matters. The Athenians having received two great blows, at Delium first (when the change of the Government was to be made in Boeotia) and now at Amphipolis, had learnt not to trust too much to the smiles of their fortune: therefore they who before would hear of no conditions, as certain of Victory, now were much abated in their confidence, and repented they had not imbraced peace, when it was offered them upon such honourable terms, after the action at Pylus, for that they feared their confederates would be encouraged by this change of their fortune to change their affections. On the other side the Lacedaemonians who thought they should have ended the War, and brought the Athenians to terms by an invasion of Attica, now found they were much mistaken; the defeat in the Island they had ever before their eyes, and felt the excursions from Pylus and Cythera; they feared their slaves, lest they should rise against them; and another danger pressed them sore; for the State of Argos which had ancient enmity with them, was now after a truce of thirty years well-nigh expired, and likely to take the benefit of their present troubles, by joyning with those who alone found them work enough, being so powerful at Sea. Above all, the liberty of the prisoners at Athens, whereof most of them were of the greatest quality, provoked them to a pursuit after peace.

Which is concluded.

33. The business was much helped on by Plisfonax the Spartan King, and Nicias the Athenian, the former being weary of those calumnies which were raised against him upon any miscarriage in the War, and the other much enamoured of Peace, by the obtaining of which he thought he should be famous to succeeding Ages. Several treaties all the Winter were on foot about it, and towards the Spring the Lacedæmonians to make the Athenians the more readily imbrace it, gave out, that they would with the whole force of all their confederates invade Attica, and fortifie a Castel therein. After much sticking about it, a peace was concluded for fifty years, upon these terms especially: that a restitution of places and prisoners should be made on both sides, except Nicaea, which the Athenians might still keep from the Megarians, and Plataea, which the Thebans refused to restore to its Inhabitants. The two States swore to the performance of it, and all their allies and confederates (except the Bæotians, Corinthians, and Megarians, who liked it not) and it was concluded at Sparta, upon the 26th day of Ariemistus Pleistolas being Ephorus, at Athens, upon the 24th of Elaphebolion, Alceus being Archon, in the beginning of the Spring, presently after the Bacchanalia; ten years and a few dayes being past since the first invasion of Attica, and the beginning of the War.

Several Cities dissent,

34. The Lacedæmonians were by lot to make restitution first; which they presently did of persons, but as to places, Amphipolis was the cause that they could not perform it; for neither the Inhabitants, nor the rest of the associates would suffer it, though the Spartans drew out their Garrison, and did all that in them lay to restore it, they being unwilling to come again under the dominion of their old Lords, and counting it unreasonable for the Spartans to desire it. The deputies of the dissenting Cities were at Lacedæmon, and being desired to sign the League, flatly refused, except some things were changed in it. Which the Spartans hearing dismissed them, and very prudently applied themselves to the Athenians, making an offensive and defensive League with them, thereby to retain them from joining with the Argives and Peloponnesians, which confederacy it behoved them above all things for to hinder. After this straight League, the prisoners taken in the Island were set at liberty, the eleventh year of the War now rising, and the peace was observed according to agreement; but all the late confederates of Sparta took this exceedingly ill, and let out all their hatred, formerly conceived against the Athenians their professed Enemies, upon their unjust friends. The Corinthians especially took it in great disdain, who had been the greatest incentives to the War, out of envie to the State of Athens, and as their Deputies departed from Lacedæmon they took Argos in their way, where to the principal Citizens they inveighed grievously against this League, saying, it was made with design to enslave Peloponnesus, whose vindicators they the Argives must needs be, and that it was incumbent upon them to decree, that all free Cities which would, might enter into an alliance with them for their mutual safety, which if they would so do, they were sure that many, out of hatred to the Spartans, would give their names to it.

And the Deputies of the Corinthians apply themselves to that City.

Those of Peloponnesus apply themselves to that City.

35. After their departure the thing was first referred to the Magistrates, and then to the People, who chose twelve men, to whom they gave power to make a League with any City or State, except the Spartans, and Athenians, with whom nothing was to be concluded, without the advice and consent of the whole body of the People. This they did, because they foresaw a War to be made with Sparta after the end of the Truce, and hoped by this means to become master of Peloponnesus; for as the Lacedæmonians were now condemned for their bad success (and the rather more for that all had such vast conceits of their courage, that they thought they would have submitted to no conditions, but have cut out all by the Sword) so they who had been of neither party in this War, but allied to both, had bettered their condition, and and now flourished exceedingly. The Mantineans first, who livin^g in Arcadia, stood in fear of the Spartans whose confederacy they had shaken off, entred into an alliance with them, and after them the rest of the Peloponnesians, who thought they might understand more of the matter than themselves did, and had high thoughts of this great and rich City, conceiving it able to do much, because that of so long it had done nothing. They were grievously incensed against the Spartans, and this offended them especially, that in the straight League betwixt them and Athens it was provided, that by mutual consent they might add new conditions, or alter the old at their own pleasures. This proviso they looked upon as made to enslave Peloponnesus, by the assistance of Athens, for that if any thing was to be changed, it were but just that it should be done by consent of all the Confederates who were concerned in it.

The Lacedemonians vindicate themselves at Corinth.

36. The Lacedemonians knowing well how much they were concerned in these courses, sent Ambassadors to stop the matter at Corinth, whence they well perceived the mischief to have proceeded. They expostulated with them for what had been done, and laid perjury to their charge, in case they left their society and betook themselves to Argos, and blamed them for not admitting the League with Athens, because it was formerly agreed, that what the major part should conclude, it should oblige all; except some divine impediment interposed. The Corinthians replied in the Assembly of the Agents of those Cities which refused the League, that in general the Lacedemonians themselves had not fully performed the conditions of the League, who had not taken order that the places forced from them should be restored, and that for their part they could not desert their confederates in Thrace, whom they perswaded to rebel against Athens, and taken into protection, and to whom they were obliged by oath taken more than once, which to them appeared to be a sufficient divine impediment why they could not enter into a League with Athens. And as for their conjunction with Argos, after they had advised with their friends, they should do what was right and fitting. After their departure, in the next assembly they entred into a League with the Argives, and so did the Eleans with the Corinthian Colonies, and those of Chalcis in Thrace.

Dissatisfaction betwixt the parties.

37. All the Summer of the eleventh year, the Athenians and Peloponnesians had commerce with one another, though great consultations were on foot, and, the associates bickered with one another, and both parties wanted not dissatisfaction. For, the Lacedemonians restored not Amphipolis, neither procured the associates in Thrace, the Bæotians, nor Corinthians, to sign the League, though they ingaged joyn^{tly} to cause them to do it, and that if within a certain time they did it not, both were to hold them as Enemies. The Athenians seeing that they performed not these things, suspected they dealt deceitfully with them, and for this cause refused to surrender Pylus, repented they had dismissed the prisoners, and with-held other places till the Spartans had first performed the Covenants. They excused themselves, for that they had done as much as in them lay, having set at liberty their prisoners, drawn out their Forces from Thrace, and omitted nothing in their power, in which the restitution of Amphipolis was not: and as for what concerned the Bæotians and Corinthians, they would do what they required. They earnestly desired that Pylus might be restored, or, at least, that the Helots and Messenians might be taken thence, which after much adoe was granted, and these men were conveyed into the Island Cephalenia.

38. In Winter the Deputies of the Confederates came to Lacedemon, and laboured in vain to dissolve the League betwixt that State and Athens. But now other Ephori having entered into their Office, who had nothing to do in making the straight alliance, and were also much averse unto it, they dealt secretly with the Bæotians and Corinthians, to perswade the former to joyn themselves to Argos, and then all to enter into a League with Sparta, which they were sure would purchase this willingly, with a breach betwixt them and Athens, for that then the War would be more easie out of Peloponnesus; only

SECT. 3.

The designs of the Bæotians
were frustrated.

onely they desired much that the Bæotians would deliver up Panaëtus into their hands, that therewithall making exchange with the Athenians for Pylus, they might with lesse difficulty make War against them. As the Ambassadors were in their way, two of the principal men of Argos met them, and were very earnest with the Bæotians to imbrace their society, which, when they came home, they laid open to the Bæotarcha, and Ambassadors followed from Argos to perswade them to it, who were kindly entertained and dismissed with hope that some Ambassadors should follow them to conclude upon the business. In the mean time the Agents from Corinth, Megara, and Thrace, agreed with the Bæotarcha, that they should bind themselves by Oath to assist him who should want it, and not to begin, or finish any War without the joynt consent of all, and upon these terms, that the Treaty should be signed. But ere this could be done, the Bæotarcha were to refer the matter to the four Councils of Bæotia wherein lay the supreme power, which not being made acquainted by them what advice the Ephori and others of Sparta had given, for fear they should give that State offence by joyning with Corinth which had revolted, they judged the contrary, and so by the means of the Bæotarcha, who took it for granted that the Councils would act according to their advice, the matter proceeded no farther now, and afterwards was neglected by them.

Panaëtus demolished.

39. This Winter also many Treaties were held betwixt the Athenians and Lacedæmonians, about the restitution of the places; and the Spartans hoped, that if Panaëtus was but restored to the other, they should recover Pylus. But such Towns as their old Allies had gotten by their means in the late War, could not be restored without their consent, and therefore Ambassadors were sent earnestly to request the Bæotians to deliver up Panaëtus with the Athenian prisoners. They stoutly refused to do it, except they would enter into as peculiar and straight a League with them, as they had done with the Athenians. Now this could not be legally done, because in the League with Athens it was provided, that neither should make either League, or War, without mutual consent. Yet being possessed with an inflamed desire of recovering Pylus, and the more, for that they something now were moved by the Ephori, and others that desired a breach with Athens, they struck up a League with them. Then did the Bæotians utterly demolish Panaëtus instead of giving it up, and so the eleventh year of the War ended.

The Athenians
thereat, and otherwise offended.

40. In the Spring the Argives hearing nothing of the Bæotian Ambassadors promised to be sent but great talk of the demolishing of Panaëtus, and the League betwixt them, and the Spartans, whom they thought to have drawn them in with the consent of the Athenians, were much perplexed, thinking they now should be run upon by all, though they formerly promised themselves the Dominion of Peloponnesus by forsaking the alliance of Lacedæmon. They therefore sent presently thither, and struck up another League with them for fifty years. In the mean while three were sent from Sparta to receive from the Bæotians the Athenian prisoners and Panaëtus, who yielded both persons and place, but this utterly demolished, pretending for their excuse, that by an ancient League it was to be held by neither of them in particular, but be common to both. The Athenians received their men, but were much moved that Panaëtus was demolished (though the Ambassadors put it off by telling them they needed not now then to fear any thing from it) being sensible of a double injury received, both as to the Town, and the League made without their knowledge, and then they called to mind other breaches of the peace, and were jealous that they were circumvented by the Spartans. An occasion was hence taken by such amongst them as bare no good will to the peace, to seek all manner of wayes to destroy it. Amongst these was Alcibiades the son of Clinias by the sister of Pericles, who though a young man, yet eminent for his Nobility, Riches, and Favour with the people, bare a secret grudge against the Lacedæmonians, for that despising his youth, and having no regard to the ancient friendship betwixt them and his family (which his his Grand-father having dissolved, he sought to restore by kindnesse shewed to the prisoners taken in the Island) made use of Nicias and Laches in the conclusion of the League before him, which he thought was much to the prejudice of his honour.

Are incensed
by Alcibiades,

41. He cried out, that their design was first to suppress Argos, and then to do as much for Athens, and at this time there being no good agreement betwixt the Argives and Spartans, he sent to them privately, exhorting them, as they tendered their own safety, to enter into a League with Athen. They who were now not consulting how to become masters of others, but how to save themselves, were well pleased with his message, and though they had Ambassadors now resident at Lacedemon about the League with that State, yet did they send away others to Athens, together with the Eleans and Mantineans, to make one offensive and defensive with them there. The Lacedemonians hereat were at a stand, seeing well, that such a Combination tended to their hurt. To keep in with the Athenians the Ephori thought that more was done already than stood with their honour or profit; others held it the wisest course, seeing they had done so much, not to stick at a little more, but rather by giving full satisfaction, to retain the friendship of that State, which was more to be valued than all the rest of Greece. This resolution prevailing, such were sent away to Athens as had most affection to peace, who said in the Senate, that they came with full Commission to conclude all, excused the League entered into with the Boeotians, as having been done onely to pleasure them in the regaining of Panattus, and assured them of the readinesse of their State to give all satisfaction, being much grieved that things went otherwise than according to their pleasure. Alcibiades taking notice that they said in the Senate, that they came with full Commission to conclude, feared that thereby the people might be drawn to a peace, & interposed by a notable stratagem. He perswaded the Ambassadors of his friendship towards their Citie, and advised them to take heed that their absolute power to conclude might not be known to the Commonalty, lest the multitude should thereupon grow peremptory, and yield to nothing, except they could draw them to unreasonable conditions.

42. The Ambassadors believed him, and ordered their speech to the people according to his directions. Hereupon he took the advantage which their double dealing afforded, and openly inveighed against them as men of no sincerity, come for no other purpose than to draw the people from strengthening themselves with friends, intending to withdraw the Argives, and their adherents, to their own alliance, as already they had done the Boeotians, though contrary to their Oath. Then he commended the cause of the Argives, Eleans, and Mantineans, to the people, which was much moved, having had before no good opinion of the Lacedemonians; but an Earth-quake intervening before they came to the question, nothing was done that day. At the next meeting Nicias perswaded them to let him first go to Lacedemon to know their minds concerning the League with the Boeotians, whether or no they would renounce it, and their friendship with Amphipolis, and restore Panattus in such a condition as it ought. But Xenares the Ephorus, and his party, was so strong, that none of these things could be procured; onely the peace with Athens was again sworn to, to gratifie Nicias, who was sensible how he should be blamed at his return, being accounted also the cause of the League. After his return the Athenians made a League with the Argives, Eleans, and Mantineans for 100 years, at large described by Thucydides, but tending to the mutual assistance of each other. Hereby nothing in terms was done derogatory to the League with Sparta, and the Corinthians, though the Allies of Argos, yet refused to be comprised in it (as in the former betwixt the Argives, Eleans, and Mantineans) alleging that the former Convention was sufficient, which did not oblige them jointly to make War upon any one, though to defend one another. This they said, for that they seemed to find reason to forsake these Confederates, and to apply their minds afresh to the Lacedemonians.

SECT. 3.

The Lacedæmonians kept from the O-lympick exercises.

43. This Summer the 90th Olympiad was celebrated, from the solemnity of which the Lacedæmonians were kept by the Eleans, being forbidden the Temple, and offering sacrifice, for which a Guard was set, because they had not paid a Fine of 2000 Minæ imposed upon them by them, according to the Olympian Law, for putting some men into the Cattle Phorycus, and the Town of Leprea, during the Olympian Truce. They sent their Ambassadors to excuse the matter, but nothing was done, so that they sacrificed at home, which bred very ill blood betwixt them. After this solemnity the Argives and their Confederates sent to Corinth, to persuade them there to imbrace their party; but the Ambassadors of Sparta being there, and it being much debated, an Earth-quake hapned, and so they returned without any success. In Winter hapned a fight betwixt the Heracleots of Trachine (placed there by the Spartans to their loss) and part of the Thessalians with others, wherein they were worsted, and many of them slain: amongst whom Xenares, the Lacedæmonian General. With these things the 12th year of the War ended.

Alcibiades
Peloponnesus.

44. The next Summer Alcibiades with some forces out of Attica, and the assistance of Argos, marched into Peloponnesus, which passing over he came to Patra, where he dealt with the Inhabitants about building a Wall thence unto the Sea, intending also of himself to build another as far as Rhium in Achaia; but the matter was hindred by the Corinthians, Sicyonians, and others, who would have been endamaged thereby. The Argives made War upon Epidaurus upon light occasion, thinking, that if that Town was but subdued, they should be more safe from the Corinthians on that side, and the Athenians would have a readier way to send them aid from Ægina. Whilst they were busie about a peace, Ephamidas the Corinthian threw this in their dish, that what they made words of, that they contradicted by their deeds, and upon that account they drew back their Army. But no conclusion coming of the Treaty, they invaded the Territories of Epidaurus again, and wasted the third part thereof. The Lacedæmonians were twice abroad with their Armies this Summer, but were recalled by their superstitious Ceremonies. The Athenians also sent the Argives 1000 men under Conduct of Alcibiades; but they having drawn away their forces, and having no employment for them, they returned home. In Winter the Lacedæmonians conveyed 300 Garrison Soldiers into Epidaurus, which passing through the Borders of the Athenians, the Argives expostulated with them for suffering it, contrary to the League, and complained that they restored not the Helotes and Messenians unto Pylus, whence they had taken them upon the desire of the Spartans. This accordingly was done at the instance of Alcibiades. All others were quiet this Winter, except the Argives and Epidaurians, who skirmished sometimes, and towards Spring the former hearing Epidaurus to be naked, came suddenly with their scaling Ladders, and endeavoured the taking of it, but in vain. Together with this Winter the 13th year of the War ended.

Agis the Spartan King in-vadeth the Argives.

45. The Summer following, the Spartans seeing in how bad a case their friends the Epidaurians were, and that the rest of Peloponnesus had either already revolted, or was ill affected to them, fearing that if they delayed, all things would go worse, they armed themselves, and slaves, with their Confederates, under the conduct of Agis their King. It hapned that the Argives were compassed round about by their Enemies; but when they were about to fall on, two of their Captains stepped out, and persuaded Agis to abstain from fight, saying, that the Argives were willing to do all just things, and make peace with the Lacedæmonians. This they spake of their own heads, without the consent or knowledge of the multitude, and Agis, without acquainting any more of the Captains or Confederates, consented to a Truce for four moneths, and therewith drew off his Army. The Lacedæmonians and Confederates obeyed him for the rigour of the Law, but grievously blamed him for letting slip, or rather wilfully losing so great an opportunity, having the Enemy at such an advantage, and having such a numerous and well-furnished nished Army as had not been seen of the Gracians to that day; there being met together besides the Spartans, the Arcadians, Boeotians, Corinthians, Sicyonians, Pellenians, Phlians, and Megarians, and the choice of all these States, who seemed not onely able to fight with the Argives, and their associates, but with any other in combination with them. The Argives also not considering what danger they had escaped, were sore enraged against their Officers, who had as they thought let the other escape out of their hands, inasmuch that they had stoned one of them had he not taken Sanctuary, and they sold his goods. Not long after a Party of 1000 Foot, and 300 Horse coming from Athens to their aid, the People, by the perswasion of Alcibiades, renounced the Truce made with Agis, and the Confederates gathering together went and besieged Orchomenus, wherein the Spartans had put the Hostages received from the Arcadians, and which was without much to doe delivered up to them.

Severely sentenced.

46. The Lacedemonians being grievously enraged against Agis, especially after the news came about Orchomenus, beyond all precedent decreed his house should be demolished, and fined him 100000 Drachmes, which he deprecating, and promising to redeem his credit by some notable exploit, they yet made a new Law, that there should be ten men assisting to him, without whose consent he should not as much as lead the Army from the City. News presently was brought that Tegea was besieged, whereupon he took the field, and came to a set battel with the Argives and their confederates, wherein though his right wing was over-borne through the negligence of the Polemarchi (who did not soon enough communicate the orders received from him) yet he put to flight the Enemy in the other, and then coming to the help of it, obtained the Victory. This was that noble fight, as Thucydides extollereth it, betwixt the most eminent and powerful States of Greece, than which there was none more eminent that hapned amongst the Gracians themselves. Yet the number of the slain was not great. Of the Argives and their allies about 1100, of the Confederates of Sparta not many, and of the Lacedemonians themselves 300 were reported to have fallen. The day after, the Epidamnians, whilst Argos was naked, fell in upon their grounds, and killed many of those that came out of the City against them. Whilst the Lacedemonians were busie in their Carnean Solemnities, the Eleans and Athenians assisting the Mantineans, went and drew a line about Epidaurum, upon which they left a sufficient Guard, and departed.

Yet the Lacedemonians send to Argos about a peace.

Which is procured by those who affected an Oligarchy.

47. In the beginning of Winter the Lacedemonians after their solemnity was over, again took the field, but thinking now the Argives might be humbled, sent to feel their minds about a Peace. At this time such as desired a change of the Government at Argos became powerful, and hoped if they could conclude with the Spartans, to take it out of the hands of the multitude, and bring it to a temper agreeable to the constitutions of that State. By the artifices of those men, the Argives were brought to forsake the Mantineans, Eleans, and Athenians, and joyn themselves in a League with the Lacedemonians to continue for 50 years: It was agreed, that no intercourse should be held with the Athenians, except they would draw out all their Forces from Peloponnesus (The freedom of Epidaurum being especially looked at herein by the Spartans as much concerning them) and that no Treaty or War was to be entred upon without mutual consent. They then took care for several other things, and sent to Perdiccas King of Macedonia, to enter into a League with him, but he did not thoroughly assent to it, though he bore respect to Argos, whence he accounted himself descended: but they renewed the League with them of Chalcis, and obliged others unto them. The Argives sent also to the Athenians, to require them to draw off their Guards from Epidaurum: but they hereupon sent Demosthenes thither to get all the Fortification into their own hands, after which they surrendered it to the Towns-men, and renewed their ancient League with them. The Mantineans at first refused to joyn with the Argives in the League with Athens; but after considering that they could not subsist without them, subscribed, and gave up those places they had in their hands. After this, 1000 men from Lacedæmon, and as many from Argos, were sent to Sicyon, where by the endeavours of the Lacedæmonians, the Supreme Power was transferred out of the hands of the People to a few men, which was after effected at Argos also, an Oligarchy being introduced, agreeable to the Government of Sparta. With this Winter the fourteenth year of the War ended.

48. The Summer following, the People of Argos bearing heavily the change of the Government, took their opportunity when the Lacedæmonians were busy in the naked exercises of their youth, and killing some of their adversaries, and expelling others, restored the Popular Government, renounced the League with Sparta, and renewed that with Athens. Then they fell on building of their long walls from the City to the Sea, thinking, that if they should be blocked up by Land, to have intercourse with the Athenians by Sea. In Winter the Lacedæmonians knowing that they were busied (men, women, slaves and all) in this work, with their associates (all but the Corinthians, who stirred not) came against Argos, hoping to take the City by means of those within that were of their Party; but being frustrated of their expectations, they demolished the wall, and taking Hyphas a Castle of Argolis, put to the sword all the males of free condition, and so returned. After this, the Argives wasted the Territories of the Phliansians, for harbouring their exiles. This same Winter the Athenians renounced the League with Perdiccas, accusing him of conspiracy with the Argives and Laconians, of non-performance of the League betwixt them, and laying the blame upon him that the Expedition miscarried which they had made, under the conduct of Nicias against the Chalcidians and Amphipolis in Thrace. With these things the Winter ended, and together with it the fifteenth year of the War.

49. The year following, Alcibiades with twenty ships sailing to Argos, took thence 300 men suspected of Laconism, who were carried into the Islands subject to the Athenians, and there committed to custody. After this the Athenians with a strong force invaded the Island Melus, the Inhabitants of which being a Colony of the Lacedæmonians, denied them obedience. They first sent Commissioners to the Town to treat with the Melians, where there was much canvassing the case; but in conclusion they continuing in their resolution not to yield, Fortifications were made against the City, and strong guards left upon them. Almost at the same time, the Argives making excursions into the Phliasian Territories, by the lying in wait of the Phliansians, and their own exiles, lost 80 of their men. The Athenians that lay in Pylus now also wasted Laconia, notwithstanding which, the Lacedæmonians would not take so much notice as to account the League broken, and thereupon to take arms; but onely caused it to be proclaimed by a Cryer, that whosoever of their Subjects would, might prey upon the Athenians: the Corinthians onely about some controversie made War upon them, all Peloponnesus besides being quiet. The Melians made two sallies against the besiegers, with good success; but a fresh Army being sent from Athens set upon, and by the help of some treachery took it this Winter, upon terms of yielding to mercy. All the males of ripe age that could be taken were put to the sword, the women and children made slaves, and the Town was repeopled by a Colony of 500 Athenians.

50. This same Winter the Athenians, with greater preparations than ever, resolved seriously to look after Sicily. Their pretence was to give assistance to their friends and allies there, but the true and onely cause was the desire of propagating their Empire, by the bringing under of all that whole Island. A good occasion was now given them by the Egestians, who upon account of former alliance, came and sued to them for aid against the Selinuntians their Enemies, upheld by them of Syracuse, offering them money for carrying on the War; whereupon they thought fit first to send Ambassadors to be informed concerning the money boasted of, and the state of the War. The Lacedæmonians this Winter made excursions into Argolis, and carried away much booty. The Argives caused Ornea to be demolished, where their their exiles harboured, by the help of the Athenians, who sent some Forces to Methone a Town bordering upon Macedonia, thence to infest the Territories of Perdiccas. The Chalcidians hereupon solicited the Lacedaemonians to send aid to the King, but they thinking it not policy to break quite with Athens, refused. Thus the Winter with the sixteenth year of the Peloponnesian War ended.

Decree aid to be sent to the Egestans, under the command of Nicias, Alcibiades, and Lamachus.

51. In the beginning of Spring the Ambassadors sent from Athens returned out of Sicilie, bringing from the Egestans 60 talents of Bullion, with a months pay for 60 ships, as was required. They affirming (though falsely) as well as the Egestans, that they had much money in their Temples and publick Treasury; the People thereupon much elevated decreed aid to be sent to them, under the conduct of Nicias, Alcibiades, and Lamachus, to whom they gave in charge, that, if it might be, they should restore the Leontines, and do those things which they saw to be most advantagious to the Commonwealth, according to the comportment of affairs. Nicias laboured with all his might to divert the People from such a suddain resolution, proposing all the difficulties and dangers of the War, and thought to have excused himself by magnifying the power that was required to such an undertaking; but his mouth was stopped by a Decree, which gave him as much as he could exact. For 100 Gallies were ordered for the Expedition, besides others of their Confederates, which amounted to above 30, over and above Vessels of burthen, and others necessary for the transportation of 6100 men, whereof 5100 bore heavy Armour. All things were prepared, with the greatest care and industry imaginable; the Soldiers were compleatly furnished with Arms, clothes, and all things necessary; and a drachme a day assigned for their wages.

Alcibiades suspected, and desirous to be tried, is yet by his Enemies sent away.

Then again recalled.

The Syracusians stand on their Guard.

52. Before the departure of the Fleet, all the Herma throughout the City (these were the images of Mercury set up at every man's gate) in one night were mangled and abused, which was taken as an ill omen, and the People was jealous that it was done by some that were Enemies to the Popular Government. Great inquisition was made in vain to find out the Authors, but the suspicion light upon Alcibiades one of the Generals, through the practice of his emulators, who made use of his lofty deportment, which ill suited with their kind of policy. He offered himself to the tryal, being fearful to be condemned absent; but his Enemies put it off for the present, and got him to be sent away, intending to make use of that which he feared, that being condemned unheard, he might be the sooner oppressed, because now by his own authority and interest, he had drawn many to give their names to the Expedition, and therefore they could not easily carry any thing against him, because of his popularity. As the Fleet sailed toward Sicilie, the Generals sent some before to discover further in what condition the Egestans were, who bringing tidings clean contrary to what both they, the Egestans themselves, and the Ambassadors sent to them had asserted, the Generals were all divided in their opinions what to do, but Alcibiades hot and youthful, was for their proceeding, to which Lamachus at length assenting, his desire was obtained. They then landed and seized upon Catana, attempted Camarina in vain, when Alcibiades received orders to come and plead his cause at Athens about the Herma, his Enemies having obtained it should be so. In truth he was condemned beforehand, but to colour the matter, he was sent for to plead, and that must be with bonds laid upon him. He was aware of the danger, and departed straight to Lacedaemon, with intention to reach the Athenians what person they had compelled by unjust Judgment to forsake his Country, and betake himself to their Enemies. After this was known, sentence of death was published against him of his Partners, many (whether justly or no Thucydides much questions) being put to death without proof already in the City.

53. The Syracusians, though not fully perswaded of the design of the Athenians against them at first, (and thereupon not so well provided as they might have been) yet made all possible provision for resistance. The two Generals, after the departure of Alcibiades, by a stratagem drew them out of the the Citie, and in the mean time brought their Forces near unto it, and worsted them when they sallied out, but without any great losse sustained on either part, and then drew off to their Winter quarters at Catana and Naxos. The Syracusians encouraged by Hermocrates one of their new Generals (a wise man, who had forwarned them of the design of the Athenians) sent to Sparta and Corinth for aid; strengthened their Fortifications, made excursions to Catana, where they wasted the grounds, plundered, and burnt part of the Athenian Camp which was empty. Both sides laboured to draw the Camarineans to their side, but in vain; yet many Cities, especially in the in-land, imbraced the society of the Athenians, who sent also this Winter to the Carthaginians to procure their amity; the Cities upon the Tyrrhenian shore they also drew in, and all Sicily was now divided into these two factions. The Corinthians readily resolved to send aid to the Syracusians, and sent some of their own with their Ambassadors to Sparta to procure as much for them from that State. The Spartans made difficulty at first to do it, for fear of giving the Athenians offence; but hearing from Alcibiades what their designs were (who was come thither upon the publick faith) at his persuasions resolved also upon sending Forces under the Command of Gylippus: they also imbraced his Counsel concerning renewing the War, and fortifying Decelea a Castle in Attica. At the same time, the Athenian Generals sent to Athens for money and horse-men, which was readily decreed to be sent. Herewith the 17th year of the War was ended.

The Corinthians and Spartans send them aid.

54. The next year the Argives and Lacedæmonians preyed mutually upon one another in Peloponnesus. In Sicily the Athenians with their whole force, and new supply of horse, sayled to Syracuse, about which they seized upon many places, and several skirmishes ensued about the fortifications, wherein the Athenians had the better. Then was the Athenian Fleet conveyed into the Haven of Syracuse, whence great contention ensued, and Lamachus one of the Generals assisting his friends was slain. The Syracusians endeavouring the recovery of Epipola were repelled by Nicias, who thence drew a double work against the Town, and strengthened himself by the access of Confederates, and store of provision. The besieged receiving no assistance from Peloponnesus parlied with Nicias; but the matter succeeding nor, they made choice of new Captains, whilst Gylippus was not now far off, but despised by Nicias for the small number of his men. In Greece the Spartans distressed the Argives, who were assisted by the Athenians with thirty ships. These made excursions into the Territories of Epidaureus, so that the League which had so long continued betwixt them and Sparta, though in a doubtfull condition, was now openly broken, and the War resumed; and that more by their fault than any blame of the Lacedæmonians, if Thucydides be judge.

Demosthenes and Eurymedon joyned in Commission with Nicias.

55. Gylippus arriving at Syracuse disturbed the work of Nicias about the Wall, and changed the constancy of his good fortune, who yet was not discouraged thereby, but proceeded in his utmost endeavours for the service of those that sent him, making preparation for Sea-matters, wherein the Athenians seemed to excell all others: hereupon ensued several skirmishes with various fortune, and the remaining of Summer was spent on both sides, in increasing their forces and procuring aid. Nicias writing to Athens for supplies, new Levies were made, and Demosthenes, and Eurymedon joyned in Commission with him, whereof the later was sent in mid-winter with ten Gallies, and a great summe of money into Sicily, and the other staid till Spring to get ready what was remaining: twenty ships they also ordered to attend the motions of the Peloponnesians. These things being known, the Spartans and Corinthians calling upon their Confederates provided for the invasion of Attica, accordingly as Alcibiades had advised. With these things the 18th year of the War ended.

Thucyd. lib. 7.

56. In the beginning of the Spring the Peloponnesians under the Command of Agis the Spartan King, invaded Attica, where they fortified Oecalea, a place some twelve miles distant from Athens, and as much from the Borders

Borders of Bœotia. The Athenians sent thirty ships to waite Peloponnesus, and sixty (with five of Chius) into Sicily under Demosthenes his command. Out of Peloponnesus were sent to the aid of the Syracusians, from Sparta 600 men, from Corinth 500. Sycion 200. & out of Bœotia 300. to which the Corinthian Gallies lying at Naupactus were ordered to be a Convoy. At Syracuse the affairs of the Athenians, through the skill and valour of Gylippus and Hermocrates, went down the wind, who being also much distressed at home by the excursions out of Declea, yet kept up their spirits to the admiration of all men. After Demosthenes had arrived in Silicy, and heard of the miscarriages of their Fleet at Sea, he blamed Nicias, that he had not as soon as he came applied all his endeavour to Syracuse the head of the War, and caused him to agree to set upon Epipola, a difficult and craggy place, where falling on in the dark night, they could not discern betwixt friend and foe, all speaking in the same dialect, and thereby great slaughter being made of them, partly by themselves and the Enemy, the Athenians received a great defeat. The Generals hereupon consulting together, were not of the same opinion; Demosthenes now was for departing away speedily out of the Island, seeing all things hapned crosse therein, though he had been the cause of the fight: on the other side Nicias, who had laboured with all his might against the War, now pressed earnestly that it was for the honour and interest of their Countrey to stay and carry on the siege, and though Eurymedon was of the same opinion with Demosthenes, yet could not Nicias be removed from his, so that their departure was deferred till they understood that Gylippus was come with new supplies out of Peloponnesus and Silicy. This resolution he stuck to so much, for that he knew the multitude rather to look at successe than the reason of things, and was unwilling to hazard his life and reputation in the hands of those who would be ready to condemn before they heard him, as they had done Sophocles and Pthiodorus, the former Generals, pretending they had taken money for making peace, when indeed there was not any possibility of making War.

Again at Sea.

57. But upon the report of Gylippus his coming, Nicias was content, and order was given for the Army to dislodge with the greatest secrecie; when in the mean time fell out an Eclipse of the Moon. By this, which was accounted an ill Omen, was Nicias again so terrified, that out of a superstitious conceit he would not have the Camp break up till 27 dayes were past. The Syracusians much rejoyced hereat, and resolved to hinder their flight, or force them to transfer themselves to some other place. They first beat up their Camp, and the next day provoked them to fight, both at Land and Sea, and in the mouth of the Haven ingaged in a great and bloody battel, wherein Eurymedon one of the Athenian Generals was slain, and though the Squadron of Gylippus was worsted, which made the Athenians Erect a Trophy, yet had they the worst of it, all considered. They made them too late repent that they had so ambitiously and unjustly undertaken a War with a Citie as great as Athens it self, and one of the same kind of Government, Enemy to Oligarchy. But the Syracusians were more and more animated, conceiving now great hopes of obtaining much glory and favour amongst the Gracians, of whom some they might free from slavery, and others from the fear of it for the time to come, by chastising their Tyrants, as they were accounted. As a way hereto they resolved to block up the mouth of the Haven, that the Athenian Fleet, should not passe out thence by stealth.

Sorely
straightened.

57. The Athenians seeing themselves in this straight, concluded it the best for them to make a new, and a more narrow Camp near to their ships, and attempt another battel at Sea, in which, if they had the better, then to remove to Catana, but if not, to burn their Vessels and depart by Land to some convenient place. This was attempted with all care and expedition; but the Syracusians opposed them, and in the straight of the Haven was such a dispute, as scarce ever before had hapned, which was beheld by the land armies with passion suitable to the condition of their friends: Notwithstanding the Syracusians lost almost as many Vessels, yet the other were so weakned, and the

SECT. 3. the Sea-men so discouraged, that though the Generals would have attempted to break out another time, yet they refused any more to go aboard; so that they concluded of going away by Land the next night. If this had been done it might have fallen out well for the Army, but by the cunning device of Hermocrates they were circumvented, and persuaded to stay till the third day after.

They fly. 59. Their departure was most full of out-cries, sorrow, and misery, set out to the life by Thucydides, so that none can read it without compassion. Gylippus seized upon their 130 ships left in the Haven, then pursued them, and set upon them behind, before, and on all sides, so that distressed for all necessities, they took another way than that which lead to Carana, otherwise than they had intended, and they were divided into two bodies, whereof that with Demosthenes soon yielded upon promise of their lives. Nicias required better terms, and refused to submit; but at length was forced to it, craving favour for himself and men, at the hands of Gylippus and the Spartans; 18000 in one day were slain, 700 taken and condemned to Mines, were after sold.

The two Generals were (contrary to the utmost endeavour of Gylippus, who would fain have had the honour of carrying them to Sparta) put to death, or as Diodorus saith, killed themselves in prison. This was the end of the Sicilian War, so indiscreetly overtaken by the Athenians, who when they had those already that gave them enough to do, would needs make to themselves more Enemies, and so by labouring to grasp, lost, all. Meson (a) the Astronomer (mentioned before) was so certainly persuaded of the danger of this expedition, that when he was enrolled amongst those that were to undertake it, to prevent his going, he counterfeited himself mad, to confirm the belief of which he set fire on his own house. But (b) Hippocrates the Coan (Prince of Physicians) is said to have set out his own son at his own charge, as Physician to the Athenian Army.

60. The Athenians were loath to give credit to the first report of the loss of their Army and Fleet, because of the greatness of it, but then knowing it to be so indeed, were much incensed against those that persuaded them to undertake the War, and for that they feared the Sicilians would now come upon them whilst they were destitute of all things, the City was filled with great consternation. Yet within awhile, they took courage, and making all provision for defence, gave Commission to some few of the most ancient and experienced amongst them, to consult and provide fit matter for the multitude to decree. In Winter following all Greece was elevated upon this their bad success. They who were neutrals before, now offered themselves to joyn in suppressing those of whom formerly they stood in fear: the Confederates of Lacedemon more vigorously provided against them, and all those that had been subject to them were earnest to shake off the yoke. The Lacedemonians having such encouragement, set themselves very seriously to the War. Agis their King went into Thessaly to raise money, and a Fleet of 100 Gallies was prepared amongst the Confederates. Pharnabazus one of the Satrapæes of Persia, and Lieutenant of those parts of Asia about the Hellepont, and Tissaphernes another of the Satrapæes, sent to Sparta, and offered them assistance. These designs were carried as secretly as could be, that the Athenians might get no knowledge of them, who laboured also at the same time about the Rigging of a new Fleet. With these preparations the 19th year of the War ended.

Alcibiades his Affairs against his own Country.

61. The next year the Athenians were at the beginning somewhat encouraged by some success at Sea, and thereby the Lacedemonians so far discouraged again, that they thought seriously of concluding the War, till otherwise persuaded by Alcibiades, who undertook an expedition into Ionia to withdraw it from the obedience of Athens, and did very much effect it. The Athenians hereat abashed, and fearing all their Associates would revolt, took out 1000 Talents, which as yet had been untouched, as forbidden by the Law, and laid them out in this case of extremity in provisions, and especially in preparing a new Fleet. Then by Alcibiades his means was a League of of alliance made betwixt Darius Nothus King of Persia, and the State of Sparta, by virtue of which the King allowed money for payment of their Soldiers. The Athenians recovered Lesbus, and Clazomena, the Milesians and Chians (principal in the revolt) were destroyed by them, but again they had the worst of it in a Sea-fight near unto Rhodes, which the Peloponnesians then by fair means drew to their society, exacting of the Inhabitants 23 talents in the name of tribute, which succeſſe, becauſe of the ſtrength of this City, made them confidently deſpiſe the money, and alliance of Persia.

62. For, Tiſſaphernes and they were at ſome difference about the form of the League, which they complained was not rightly drawn, for therein they were tied to give up to the Persian the Iſlands, Theſſalie, Locri, and Boeotia, which heretofore had been under the power of that Empire: which ſeemed unworthy for the Lacedaemonians to do, who pretended themſelves the vindicators of the liberty of Greece, againſt the incroachments of the Athenians; Herewith Tiſſaphernes was grievouſly netled, and departed in diſcontent from Cnidus, where eleven Spartans had met him to require that the inſtruments ſhould be corrected. At this time alſo it hapned that Alcibiades was envied for his glory, and ſuſpected by the Peloponnesians, and hated by Agis the Spartan King, for that he had corrupted his wife, inſomuch that order was reported to have been ſent to Aſtyochus the General, to kill him, but he withdrew himſelf to Tiſſaphernes. He laid open to him the full State of the Peloponnesians, perſwaded him to diminiſh the pay that his Maſter allowed them, by changing a Drachme into three Oboli a day, part of which alſo he ſhould ever keep unpaid, to keep the Seamen at his devotion. He further ſuggeſted crafty counſel to him: eſpecially that they ſhould not ſuffer the Athenians to be ſuppreſſed by the Lacedaemonians, but to keep thoſe two States ever in an even ballance, and let them weaken one another by their mutual enmities; yet to favour a little more the Athenians, becauſe they would be content with part of the ſovereignty of the Seas, and would go no further, whereas the Spartans would not reſt here, but contend for the ſole Dominion, and to bring all the Gracians from under the Persian yolk. Theſe things he preſſed upon him as great myſteries of State for his Maſter's ſervice, and as ſuch he imbraced them; wherefore the promiſe he had made of joyning the Phenician Fleet with that gallant one of the Peloponnesians was not performed, and the power of this weakened by the with-holding of the Soldiers pay.

63. Alcibiades had a great deſire to return into his own Country, which would not be to any purpoſe except it were preſerved, and therefore he communicated theſe things to Tiſſaphernes. He wrote to ſome of the chief of the Athenians then lying at Samus concerning his deſire, and told them wherein he was dealing with him; and yet he ſignified that he had no mind to return, as long as the Popular Government (under which he was baniſhed) ſhould continue. The Athenians that lay at Samus liked the matter well, and generally inclined to change the Government, for that they were made to believe that Tiſſaphernes by the procurement of Alcibiades would be their friend, and they ſhould have money from him for the payment of their Army. But Phrynicius the General ſtanding in fear of Alcibiades, by reaſon he had ſpoken too freely againſt him, oppoſed it with all his might, and when he could do nothing by words, very boldly acquainted Aſtyochus the Lacedaemonian General with the matter. He who now had not Alcibiades in his power, was no whit eager for his deſtruction, and being withall corrupted by Tiſſaphernes to betray his truſt, went and acquainted him and Alcibiades with what he had received. Hereupon Alcibiades wrote to the Athenians in Samus, and acquainted them with the treachery of Phrynicius, required them to put him to death as a Traitor to his Country, who hereupon was exceedingly troubled, and boyled with anger againſt Aſtyochus; yet in ſo deſperate a caſe adding one raſh act unto another, he wrote again to him, upbraided him with unthankfulneſſe, and ſignified that he would betray Samus with all the Athe- nian Army there unto the Lacedæmonians, which he could do, because the Town was unwall'd, and would do, soasmuch as it was lawful in so eminent a danger, as he was in, to provide for his own security.

64. Aflyochus without taking this opportunity to serve his Country, made this known also to Alcibiades, which Phryniscus understanding, and knowing that Alcibiades would write hereof to the Army, that he might prevent him, he told the Soldiers that the Enemy intended to set upon Samus by Sea and Land, now that the City wanted walls, whereupon he commanded them, having absolute authority, to raise a work about it, and keep diligent watch. This was done accordingly, and then though Alcibiades his letters presently after arrived, yet no credit was given to the accusation, as proceeding from his bitter Enemy, but more confidence repos'd in him. Alcibiades then applied himself to Tissaphernes to reconcile him to the Athenians, but he being unwilling to lose all his credit, was cool in the business. But whilst he dealt with him, the Soldiers in Samus having sent to Athens to deal with the People about the change of Government, Pisander chief of the messengers labour'd to convince them of the absolute necessity thereof, for that otherwise they could not be freed from imminent destruction. The People being circumvented yielded to it, & gave him with ten other Commissioners power to treat, and conclude whatsoever they found necessary for the State, with Tissaphernes and Alcibiades: but the former of these standing in fear of utterly losing the Peloponnesians, and having this alwaies in his mind to keep the two States in an equal ballance, would not give any encouragement, or open his mind fully to Alcibiades, who fearing to lose his credit and power with him, which he had so boasted of to the Athenians; that he might put them by, demanded such hard Conditions as he knew they could not grant, and so the Commissioners returned with great stomach and disdain, to have been so ill used by him.

Commissioners sent to treat with Alcibiades, and Tissaphernes, but in vain.

Tissaphernes reneweth the War with the Peloponnesians.

65. And Tissaphernes to prosecute that design of setting the Græcians upon each other, and keeping them in equal power; fearing that if he detain'd any longer the pay from the Peloponnesians, that they would be too much weakened by the Athenians, who now of late had had the better of it in some engagements, and thereby the Kings Provinces should be expos'd to danger, he went this Winter into Caria, where he renewed the League on better terms for the Peloponnesians, paid the arrears due to the Army, and promised to dispatch away the Phœnician Fleet. This new alliance was made in the thirteenth year of Darius, (Alexipidas being Ephorus at Sparta) upon the River Maander, attested by the names of Tissaphernes, Hieramenes, and the Children of Pharnaces. Towards the end of Winter Oropus a Town situate upon the confines of Attica and Bœotia, revolted to the Bœotians, being formerly in the jurisdiction of Athens. Hereupon the Bœotians conceived hopes to alienate all Eubœa from the Athenians, especially for that the Erætrians who were principal in that Island, inclined to a revolt, and sent away to the Peloponnesians to desire they would come into Eubœa. But their care for Chios which was distressed by the Athenians suffered them not to comply with their desire; for they set out a Fleet to relieve that Island, but the Athenians being masters of the Sea, it durst not venture further than Miletus; and therefore the Athenian ships returned unto Samus. Thus ended the 20th year of the War.

66. In the beginning of Spring Dercylidas was sent from Sparta by Land to the Hellepont, with no great force, where with ease he brought off Abydus (a Colony of the Milesians) from their obedience to Athens, and after that Lampsacus, but attempted the same upon Sestos to no purpose. The Athenians and Chians had a batrel at Sea upon equal terms: but Strombichides the Athenian hearing what was done in the Hellepont hastid thither, recovered Lampsacus, was repelled by the Inhabitants of Abydus, and then went to Sestos in Europe, where he placed a strong Garrison for the security of those parts. In the mean time Pisander and his Colleagues being returned from Alcibiades to Samus, in conjunction with those therein, resolv'd without without him to change the Government. They first did it in most of the Cities which were subject to Athens, and found it almost effected there, after that Androcles, a man who was most earnest in the defence of Democracy, with some others, were secretly murdered by some Conspirators, who laboured thereby to gain the good will of Alcibiades and Tissaphernes. These designed to have the State governed by 5000 men of the most able with bodies and estates to serve it, and the People durst not contradict them, such factions and jealousies had risen, that no man was secure of his neighbour. But Pisander and his Colleagues arriving, obtained of the multitude, that ten men might be impowred, to conclude and set down in writing such things as seemed to them requisite for a settlement, which on a certain day were to be referred to the People.

67. When the day came, these ten men first required, that it might be lawful for any one to speak his opinion without danger of incurring any penalty by the Laws. Then they proposed, that no Magistracy should be undertaken and exercised after the usual manner, nor any receive salary for the exercising thereof: that five Presidents should be chosen, who should pick out 100 men, and each of these chuse three more, that all might make up the number of 400. That these 400 men should be invested with the Supreme power and authority; should decree and ordain what seemed good unto them; and might call together the five thousand when they thought it convenient. These propositions, though of so great consequence for the change they were likely to produce, were yet admitted of, not as much as one man gainsaying them, such a change there was made in the minds of the People, which now since the banishing of the Tyrants had onely been governed by it's Laws and constitutions, and not onely not subject to the authority of others, but reigning over many, devested it self of so great sovereignty and power. But these 400 men thus authorised, were conducted in a solemn manner to the Senate-house, with daggers under their coats, and compassed about with armed men, where the old Senate having their Salaries paid were dismissed. They chose the Prytanes or Presidents out of their own body, and then began to exercise their authority; but not without blood, bonds, and bannishment. They sent to Agis the Lacedaemonian King, then lying at Decelea, to treat of Peace, but he not having any opinion of their power as long to continue, but thinking the People would shortly resume it, rejected their Ambassie, and sending for more Forces out of Peloponnesus, came to Athens, hoping that in these commotions he might affright the City into a surrender. But he found the contrary; for all agreeing in this to resist him as the common Enemy, they stood notably in their defence, and sallied out upon him; so that having no hopes, he dismissed his new forces, and with the other returned to Decelea.

68. After his return, the 400 sent other Ambassadors to him about a peace, who referred them to Sparta, whither they went, but what successe they had, doth not appear from Thucydides. They knew the common Soldiers at Samus (though Pisander and his Companions had stickled so for it) to be Enemies to Oligarchy, and therefore to take them off, they sent to acquaint them that the power was not in them onely, but in the 5000 also, and laboured to satisfy them in this point, that this was equivalent to Democracie, seeing that during that Government, when all things were done by the body of the People, a greater number did not use to meet. But they at Samus being impatient of any but Popular Government, after the departure of Pisander and his Colleagues, had restored it there, and sent to Athens to signify so much, not knowing what had hapned there, which was very unwelcome news to the 400, who cast some of the messengers into prison. But Chareas, hiding himself for some time, escaped, and carried back a report how things stood, amplifying much the oppression and insolence of these Governours; whereat the Soldiers were grievously enraged, and threatened death, not onely to the authors of the Oligarchy, but to all that had been partakers of it; and at such a season when the Enemy expected such advantages, they had committed something, tending to the ruin of their Countrey, had they not been restrained by the interposition of more stayed and prudent men. Thraſybulus and Thraſyllus, who had been most earnest for restoring the popular Government, that they might do it in a safe and honorable way, caused all the Soldiers, especially such as they knew to favour Oligarchy, to take an Oath unanimously to act for the restitution of the power of the people; to fight resolutely against the Peloponnesians; to take for Enemies the 400 men at Athens, and to admit of no intercourse with them by any Officer at Arms; which Oath also they caused to be taken by all the Samians that were at age, whose conjunction they thought necessary for carrying on the design.

Alcibiades,

69. Then did the Soldiers chuse them new Officers, of whom were Thraſybulus and Thraſyllus, and encouraged one another to the Enterprize, both from the justnesse of their undertaking (for that the Army had not revolted from the Citie, but the Citie from it) as also from their strength, far superiour (especially in respect of the Fleet) to that of the 400. adding also, that Alcibiades upon promise of security, and restitution, would be assisting to them, and that they might hope well concerning Tissaphernes, and the King of Persia. In the mean while the Peloponnesians sore mutined against Tissaphernes and Astyochnus, that they had not their pay, and were not lead out to fight with the Athenians, whilest they were so at odds amongst themselves, which forced the later to draw both Sea and Land-forces to Mysale for an engagement, but the Athenians refusing to fight, for that they were inferiour to them in number of ships, when more came from the Helleſpont presented themselves; but then the Peloponnesians conceiving themselves too weak for the encounter, refused to ingage. Thraſybulus in the mean while perswaded the Army to recall Alcibiades. Audience being given him, after he had complained of the injustice of his Enemies, he discoursed much of the state of Affairs as they then stood; Magnified above measure his power with Tissaphernes (which he did, both to discourage them at Athens, and to render the Satrapa the more odious to the Peloponnesians) who he said would assist them to the selling of the bed he lay on. Hereupon the Soldiers mightily elevated with hopes, presently created him one of their Generals, with full power, thinking of nothing but the punishment of the 400. and resolving without any regard of the Enemy at hand to sayl directly for the Piræus.

The Ambassadors of the

70. Alcibiades withstood their resolution, saying, that nothing was rashly to be committed, and seeing that they had put the power into his hands, he must go to Tissaphernes. This he did, not onely to transact what he pretended, but also to boast of his new power, to let the Persian know he could either pleasure him, or incommode his affairs, and so this crafty man procured, that he both made him fear the Athenians, and the Athenians stand in awe of him, whilest hereby he made up his own interest. That also which he intended concerning Tissaphernes, and the Peloponnesians, came to passe; for distrusting him before, they were now very bitter against him, since he hindred the fight at Mileus, and defrauded them of their pay, and Astyochnus their own General they had killed in a mutiny, had he not taken sanctuary. Presently upon this came Mindarus, sent from Sparta to succeed him, who then departed home with an Agent from Tissaphernes, whom he sent to excuse himself to that State, and answer such objections as were made against him. Alcibiades returned from Tissaphernes to Samus, where met him the Ambassadors of the 400 men (who upon hearing how things went here, had all this while out of fear staid at Delus.) The Soldiers would not hear them, and voted they should be put to death; but he caused them to have leave to deliver their message, which they did with all the advantage they could, in excuse of those that sent them, accusing of falshood what had been reported by Chareas; but still the Army was dissatisfied, and cried out to sayl to the Piræus. Alcibiades now timely interposed himself; for, had the Army then departed for Athens, all Ionia, and the Helleſpont had been presently lost; but he put a stop to their heat, and checked those that were so fierce against the Ambassadors.

Alcibiades giveth them a crosse answer.

factors. He himself had them return this answer, that the 5000 might retain their power, but the 400 were commanded to desist, and restore the Senate of 500 whom they ousted; that they should do well at Athens to take care of the Commonwealth, and not to give place to the Enemy: for whilest the City was safe, he hoped to make up the breaches; but if either it should be lost, or the Army at Samus miscarry, there would want those who should be reconciled to each other.

71. With this answer he dismissed the Messengers in safety, as he did also with much kindnesse Ambassadors sent from Argos to offer assistance against the 400. Tissaphernes now upon what design is uncertain, went to Aspendus where the Phœnician Fleet lay, pretending he would purge himself to the Lacedæmonians, and give order to Tamus his Officer to pay the Arrears due to the Army. But neither did he remove the Fleet from Aspendus, according to agreement, pretending frivolous things, nor did Tamus accordingly pay the monies; which raised many conjectures and much discourse. Thucydides thinketh his design to have been to hold the Græcians in suspense, and suffer them to weaken one another, for that if he had joyned himself to either party, by the help of his Fleet he might in a short time, and without difficulty have finished the War, and given the victory to which side he pleased. Alcibiades went to him with 13 ships, promising either to induce him to joyn his Fleet with the Athenians, or to procure that he should not assist them of Peloponnesus; it being likely enough that he knew his intention of not moving to the one part or the other; but this he did, especially by his entercourse, and familiarity with him, to increase the indignation and choler of the Peloponnesians, and thereby to constrain him to joyn himself with the Athenians. But the return and report of the Ambassadors sent from the 400 men raised great perturbations in the minds of men at Athens, whilest those, who either out of some ambitious design (all men being greedy of power over others) or for the publick good, desired the Supreme Authority might be in the 5000. had the advantage of the other factions. The other were as busie as concerned, especially Phrynichus, because so obnoxious to Alcibiades, Pisanter, and others. They sent to Lacedæmon to make peace with that State upon any terms, and Fortified that part of the Piræus, which commandeth the mouth of the haven, which made the other party, which affected Democracie, very jealous; Theramenes crying out that they intended to betray the Citie to the Enemy, who now with 42 Gallies hovered about the Coasts.

72. Neither were these mere Calumnies; for these 400 men for the most part desired to retain the Dominion over both Citizens and Allies; but if not that, yet to continue Masters of the Fleet and Fortifications, and if this could not be obtained, then to call in the Enemy, to redeem their lives, and part of the Citie, with the ships and vvorks; being resolved never to give way to the popular Government, from which they could expect nothing but sudden destruction. To this purpose they made the Wall upon the Piræus with several Gares to let in the Enemy if need were. But Phrynichus returning from Sparta whither he was sent Ambassadour (though to no purpose) was stabbed in the Forum by a conspiracy, after which Theramenes and his party grew more bold, and by the help of the Soldiers seized upon some of the Chief of the 400. whence ensued a very great tumult, all being ready to fall one upon another, and certain mischief had followed, but that the ancient men somewhat repressed the younger, and Thucydides the Pharſalian; then sojourning in the Citie, laboured earnestly to perswade them, crying out, that they should not themselves destroy their Countrey, now that the Enemy was ready to assail it, and with much ado he kept them from offering violence to one another. Theramenes also checked the Soldiers in the Haven; but he giving way to it, the new Fortifications there were demolished. The next day the 400 met, though in great fear, and sent some of their number to appease the Soldiers, saying, that they would chuse 5000 men, who from amongst themselves should chuse the number of 400 by turns to rule the State, desiring they would not undo the Citie by compelling it to yield to the SECT. 3. the Enemy. Herewith the minds of the Soldiers were somewhat quieted, and with much ado they agreed that a general Assembly should be had at a certain day for an agreement: but when the day came, and the Assembly was scarce gathered together, news came that the 42 ships, under Command of Hegesandrides the Spartan, held their course directly from the Coast of Megara, to the Island Salamine.

73. The Soldiers now concluded of the certainty of what Theramenes had told them, and that these ships intending for the Piræus, it was good that the Fortifications were demolished; and likely enough it was that Hegesandrides hovering so long about Epidaurus, expected some good opportunity to fall on Athens. Hereupon all the Assembly hastened to the Piræus, but the Fleet making towards Eubœa at length came to Oropus, which making them very solicitous for Eubœa wherein their hope onely remained, they sent Thymochares with some ships to Eretria, which he joyning to those that were in the Island, made up 36 sayl. He was forced to fight sooner than he intended, by the fraud of the Eretrians, who delayed to bring victuals to sell as they were wont, and thereby drew the Soldiers further off from the Fleet, and made great disorder; so that the Peloponnesians setting upon them, whilst out of good order, quickly put them to flight. They took 22 ships, killing some, and taking the rest of the men: such as fled to Land, and betook themselves to Eretria as to friends, were killed by the Inhabitants; then presently all Eubœa, except Oreus, revolted to the Peloponnesians. When tidings hereof came to Athens, never did so great consternation seize upon them there, no not after the overthrow in Sicily. For the Army at Samus dissented from the Citie; they had neither ships left, nor men to serve in them, and were broken into factions, of which they could not foresee the event; and the losse of Eubœa was exceeding great, because that Island furnished the Citie with more Commodities than Africa it self. And their fear was increased by the nearness of it, from which the Enemy might presently come and seize upon the Piræus now destitute of ships, which they did not onely think would be, but imagined to be already done.

The Athenians defeated are seized with great consternation.

The contrary dispositions of the Athenians and Lacedæmonians.

The power of the 400 abrogated, and the Government most equally poised.

74. And had the Enemy been a little bolder, he might easily have done this, and more. Had he besieged the Citie, it would have been more grievously broken by seditions, and constrained to call home the Army at Samus, and thereby he might have reduced with ease Ionia, the Hellepont, all the Islands, and all as far as Eubœa; and so consequently all the Athenian Dominion into his power. But well was it for the Athenians that they had such an Enemy to deal with as the Spartans, who were of so contrary dispositions: they being speedy and bold in executing all their designs; but these slow, and something fearfull, especially in Sea matters, whereby they afforded many opportunities to the Athenians. These things are confirmed from instance in the Syracusians, who being of the same nature as the Athenians, were good enough for them at all assaies. The Athenians in the midst of all their fears took yet all care possible for their Affairs, furnishing out twenty ships, and meeting together in Pnice, the usual place for popular Assemblies, they abrogated the power of the 400. and gave it to 5000. amongst whom some were to furnish the Commonwealth with Arms, ordering that none should receive any wages for his employment. Many other meetings then succeeded, in which certain Law-makers were chosen, and other things decreed for the good of the State, at which time Thucydides thinketh the Athenian Commonwealth to have been better than ever tempered and qualified, a moderate, and equal way being brought in betwixt the power of a few, and that of the whole people. A decree also passed for the restitution of Alcibiades, and those with him. Upon this change Pisander and the rest that adhered to Oligarchy fled to the Enemy.

75. In the mean while the Peloponnesian Fleet lying at Miletus, in vain expected money from Tissaphernes, and the coming of the Phœnician Fleet: on the other side Pharnabazus, Lieutenant to the King upon the Hellepont, promised them all kindnesse, and in particular used his indeavour to draw all the the Greek Cities within his Government from the society of the Athenians, which Tissaphernes also had promised, but performed like other things. Mindarus the General of the Fleet moved herewith, went from Miletus towards the Hellepont, with a Fleet of 73 ships, which Thrasylus the Athenian understanding, made after him with 55 Sail, labouring to get before him. Some stop was made by the way, but nothing very considerable done till they came towards an engagement at Gnosema. Sixteen Gallies of Athens were first met with by the Peloponnesians, who took three of them, and burnt another; and at length both the Fleets joyned battel, being enlarged since they came into the Hellepont by the access of other ships. At first the Peloponnesians put to flight the middle battel of the Athenians, and driving the ships to Land had the better of it there; but being too eager in the pursuit, they brake their ranks, which Thrasylus and those with him observing in his wing, wound about and fell upon them with such violence, as forced them to flee. They took 21 ships, the rest by reason of the straightness of the Sea getting into some Harbour or other, and though they lost fifteen of their own, yet obtained they a seasonable Victory, which made them lift up their heads (having been dejected by so many disasters) and cease to complain of their Fortune.

76. The report of it at Athens, as of an unexpected thing, mightily encouraged the people also, so that notwithstanding the revolt of Eubœa, and intestine Seditions, they had hopes still, if they prosecuted the War with diligence, to have the better. Four daies after the fight the Fleet removed from Sestos towards Cyzicus, where in their way they took eight Gallies that came from Byzantium, and taking the Town, which then for want of walls could make no resistance, fined the Inhabitants; the Peloponnesians at the same time endeavouring to recruit their Navie. In the mean while Alcibiades having been with Tissaphernes returned to Samus with thirteen Gallies, bringing word, that he had stopped the Phœnician Fleet from joyning with the Peloponnesians, and had rendered the Satrapa more friendly towards the Athenians. Then presently adding nine ships to the former, he constrained the Halicarnassians to pay a great sum of money, and fortified Cos. Tissaphernes, when he heard that the Peloponnesian Fleet was gone towards the Hellepont, hasted from Aspendus into Ionia, where understanding that the Inhabitants of Antandrus had received a Garrison from the Peloponnesians of Abydus, because they had been ill dealt withall by Astacus, whom he had made his Lieutenant in those parts, as also that the Peloponnesians had cast his Garrison out of Mileus, and Cnidus (which they did to affront him, laying grievous matters to his charge) lest they should proceed any further, and grieving that Pharnabazus in a lesse time, and with lesse expence, should make more use of them against the Athenians, he determined to follow them into the Hellepont, to expostulate with them about Antandrus, and purge himself as well as he could of those things laid to his charge about the Phœnician Fleet, and other matters. And when he came to Ephesus he sacrificed to Diana. Here the history of Thucydides (a) endeth (with the Summer of the 21st year of the War) which afterwards was continued by Theopompus for seventeen years; but by Xenophon for 28. The work of the former is lost; and that of the latter extant, but without a beginning, in the judgement of a learned man, who, besides the proeme, will have the history of two years to be wanting; from the end of that Summer at which Thucydides left, to the conclusion of the Summer of the 23 year of the War. But Diodorus placing the last things of Thucydides in the second year of the 92 Olympiad, in the very next relateth those which are mentioned in the begining of the first Book of Xenophon, so that if the whole was extant in his time, he either missed these two years, and so inverted the Chronology of all his history succeeding; or else onely the proeme of the first Book of Xenophon is lost (if there was any) and the History entire.

having been fought to no great purpose on either side. Tissaphernes, after this coming to the Hellepont, Alcibiades went to visit him, whom he secured, and committed to close custody, pretending he had orders from his Master to make War against the Athenians; but rather for that he feared he should be accused by the Peloponnesians to the King, and therefore thought by this enterprise to redeem his credit. But after he had been secured thirty dayes, he made his escape to Clazomene, where pretending to have been sent by Tissaphernes, he sailed thence to the Athenian Army lying at Cardia. Sailing thence to the Hellepont or Cyzicus, he overthrew Mindarus both at Sea and Land, who died also in the fight, taking all the Peloponnesian ships, after which he forced from the Town a great sum of money, and prosecuted the Victory by fineing and securing other places. In the mean while letters were intercepted, and sent to Athens, which were to Sparta, written from Hippocrates Lieutenant to Mindarus, and found to contain the distresse of the Fleet in these few words, according to the Lacedæmonian custom: All is lost; Mindarus is slain, the Soldiers are famished: we know not what to do. But Pharnabazus laboured with all his might to encourage the Lacedæmonian Army, telling them they had lost nothing but wooden ships, their men being saved, and that new ones should be built at his Masters cost (who had wood enough on the Mount Ida) in which work he was very diligent, and relieved the Chalcedonians then distressed.

78. The news of the successe with the letter of Hippocrates coming to Athens, filled the People with excessive joy, who offered sacrifice to their gods, and kept holy day. They chose then 1000 of the most valiant Foot, and 100 Horse for prosecuting the War, and sent thirty Gallies more to Alcibiades, that he might with greater successe set upon the allies of Sparta now the Sea was in his power. The Lacedæmonians when they understood how things went, dispatched away Ambassadors (the chief of which was Endius, unto Athens) about a peace. They offered that both States might retain such places as they had already in their power, that the Garrisons might be dismissed on both sides, and the prisoners redeemed man for man; and much in a little was said by Endius, to shew that the Athenians were more concerned to be for peace, though he denied not but that the War was hurtful to Sparta. The most moderate men amongst the Athenians were willing to hear of an accommodation; but such as made their own markers out of the publick losse, and gained by the War, withstood the proposition. Amongst these as principal was Cleophon, the most eminent of the Damagogi (or leaders of the People) at this time, though formerly a maker of Harps, whom many remembered to have been bound with fetters, but he was surreptitiously registred amongst the Citizens. He speaking many things fit for his purpose, especially made use of the late successe; which he so improved, as if Fortune now had forgot to be inconstant. The People herewith puffed up, and conceiving great hopes that by the conduct of Alcibiades they should re-obtain their antient power, refused to entertain the proposals made by Endius; of which ill advice they were afterwards sensible, when it was too late, falling so low from this height of presumption, that they could never after recover themselves.

79. After this, Agis the Spartan King made excursions from Decælea, as far as the walls of Athens, at which time it hapned that Thrasylbulus was in the City about businesse, who leading out his Athenian Soldiers and others that were present, offered him battel; at which he was troubled, and hasted away, losing a few of his men in some light Skirmishes. This service got Thrasylbulus such credit, that he easily obtained what he came for; 1000 Foot of heavy Armour which he himself would pick out, 100 Horse, and 50 Gallies, being decreed to him; but Agis seeing that it was to no purpose to besiege Athens by Land, as long as they could bring in what provision they pleased at the Piræus, sent away Clearchus the Son of Ramphius to Byzantium and Chalcedon, to make provision for Sea matters, who got through the Hellepont with much adoe, and with the losse of three ships out of his fifteen he had with him, came to Byzantium.

80. The next year in which the 93 Olympiad was solemnized, wherein Eubolus the Cyrenean got the prize in the course, Euarchippus being Ephorus at Sparta, and Euclidean Archon at Athens, Thraſybulus having obtained the ships decreed to him, with 5000 Sea-men, sailed to Samus, whence after three daies he departed, and took Colophon, made excursions into Lydia, where obtaining much booty, he also went against Ephesus. Tissaphernes coming in in good time, he was beaten back from the City with double losse, whence he sailed to the Helleſpont, and in his way at Lesbos put to flight a Fleet of 25 Syracusan ships, four whereof he took with the men in them. Then departed he to Sesius to the other Athenian Forces, and thence removed to Lampsacus with the whole Army in the beginning of Winter, which Town they fortified, and besieging Abydos overthrew Pharnabazus, who came with a considerable body of Horse to relieve the Town; which Victory reconciled the Soldiers, who before this were at odds, because those under Alcibiades being hitherto victorious, would not be joyned with the followers of Thraſybulus who had been beaten. In the same Winter the Athenians made frequent depredations in the territories of the Persian King. Then also the Helots which had fled from Malea to Coriphantium, were upon agreement dismissed by the Lacedemonians; and the Plantation of Heraclea, and Trachinia, were by the Acheans the ancient Inhabitants, betrayed into the hands of the Oreans the common Enemy, and 700 of them slain, together with Labotas the Lacedemonian Governour. Thus the 24th year of the War ended, wherein the Medes having rebelled, were reduced to obedience by Darius Nothus, and the Temple of Pallas at Phocaea was burnt with Thunder and Lightning.

81. In the beginning of the next Spring Pantacles being Ephorus at Sparta, and Antigones Archon at Athens, the Athenians with their whole Army and Fleet went into Proconneſus; thence to Chalcedon and Byzantium, and laid down before Chalcedon. The Chalcedonians aware of their coming, sent all their booty to the Bythinians their neighbours, which being known to Alcibiades, he went with a sufficient force, and by threats got it delivered up to him, after which returning he compassed Chalcedon from Sea to Sea with a rampire, and to the River. Hippocrates the Lacedemonian, Governour of the Town, troubled hereat, sallied out, and fought with that Party that was under Thraſybulus, for a long time with ambiguous Fortune, till Alcibiades coming in, Hippocrates was slain, and his men repulſed into the Town. Pharnabazus during the fight came to relieve him, but could not get to them by reason of the Athenian fortifications. He, whilst Alcibiades was absent, gathering Money from the Cities, made an agreement with the other Athenian Captains, that he should pay them 20 talents, that the Chalcedonians should pay all their arrears, and afterwards as much as they were wont: in the mean time the Athenians should offer them no violence, till the Athenian Ambassadors, which he took upon him to convey, should return from the King. Alcibiades at this time was at Selymbria, which having taken, he returned to Byzantium with a body of Horse and Foot newly raised in Cheroneſus and Thrace, where Pharnabazus expected him to have his oath to the agreement. He refused to take his oath except Pharnabazus did the like, who condescended to him, and so they both swore not to hurt each other. Together with the Athenians, others went as Ambassadors to the King from the Lacedemonians; as also Hermocrates and his brother Proxenus now banished from Syracuse.

82. The Athenians then presently besieged Byzantium, which having no hopes to obtain by strong hand, they attempted by treachery, and had it delivered up to them, whilst Clearchus the Governour, a Lacedemonian, was gone to Pharnabazus to sollicite him about money to pay the Soldiers, and to gather a Fleet together wherewith if possible he might raise the siege. News hereof was carried to Pharnabazus then wintering at Gordium in Phrygia with the Ambassadors whom he was carrying to the King. In the beginning of Spring when they were on their journey, they met with some Spartans, tans, who already had been with him, and said they had obtained from him for the Lacedæmonians what they desired, and how he had appointed his younger son Cyrus his Lieutenant for the Sea-coasts, whom he had commanded also to assist the Spartans in the War, bringing a Commission with him whereby he was constituted Governour over all that used to meet upon the plains of Castolus. The Athenian Ambassadors hearing this, desired first to see Cyrus, and then to go to the King; but if not, to return home. But Cyrus required Pharnabazus, either to deliver them up into his hands, or to send them back, because he would not have the Athenians privy to what was done. But he neither sent them to the King, nor dismissed them, but kept them off and on for three years, after which he obtained leave of Cyrus to dismiss them, seeing he would not permit them to go to his father, and so procured them by Artabazanes to be conveyed through Mysia to sea: and so they sayled to the Athenian Army.

Alcibiades returneth to Athens.

83. Alcibiades having a great desire to return to Athens with the Army, first betook himself to Samus, whence he went and gathered up 100 Talents amongst the Carians, and returned thither. Thrasybulus with thirty ships going into Thrace, reduced several places into his power, and Thasus amongst the rest, sorely at this time distressed with Seditions, Famine, and Pestilence. Thrasybulus with the rest of the Army sayled to Athens, before whose coming the people had created anew three Generals, Alcibiades, and Thrasybulus, who were absent, and Conon present in the Citie. Alcibiades encouraged hereby sayled to the Citie, where at his landing multitudes of people came to meet him, admiring his person, and the present posture of affairs, which they ascribed to his good conduct, whom they now acquitted from what was laid formerly to his charge, and excused him for siding with the Enemy, seeing he was thereunto led by necessity. He spoke to the Senate and people in his own defence, and gave such satisfaction, no body opposing, that he was created General with full power, as able to restore the Commonwealth by his own industry to its antient power. He first on Land (which of late had not used to be done for fear of the Enemy) celebrated the Eleusinia, and then in the third moneth after his arrival, with a Fleet of 100 Gallies, aboard of which were 1100 foot of heavy Armour, and 150 Horse, he sayled to Andrus, the Inhabitants of which he worsted in fight, and thence departed to Samus, intending to make use of that Island as the Seat of War. At this time Lysander was sent from Sparta to succeed Cranisippidas in the Fleet, who went to Cyrus to desire him in earnest to undertake the War, blaming the backwardness of Tissaphernes. Cyrus promised him his utmost assistance; but he desired that the saylers might have a drachm a day assigned as their wages, thereby to entice the Athenian Mariners to forsake their Masters. He answered, he could do nothing against his fathers order, who had appointed for every ship 30 Mina a moneth, it being in the power of the Lacedæmonians to furnish out as few, or as many ships as they pleased; but afterwards he condescended to increase their pay to four Oboli a day: Moreover, he paid them all their Arrears, and gave them a moneths pay before-hand, which made them very chearfull, and ready for all duty.

Who refuseth to meddle with the Athenians.

Alcibiades going to speak with Thrasybulus, leaveth his Fleet with his Pilot, who fighting with Lysander, contrary to his expresse command, is defeated & slain.

84. The Athenians were much troubled hereat, and sent also to Cyrus to obtain his favour, but could not be admitted, though Tissaphernes used all his interest in their behalf, relating, that his design had been according to the wise Counsel of Alcibiades, not to promote the Affairs of either, but to suffer them to destroy one another. Alcibiades understanding that Thrasybulus being gone from the Hellepont fortified Phocæa, went thither to speak with him, leaving the Fleet with Antiochus his Pilot, whom he commanded expressly not to fight, no, not although he were provoked to it, untill his return. But he being not at all used to command any thing except the Helm of a ship, could not bear his new power without making tryal of it, and with two Gallies went, and provoked Lysander in the Haven of Ephesus (where he was intent upon mending his Fleet consisting of 90 sayl) who first sent out some parti-particular ships against him; but the whole Athenian Fleet coming in to his aid, he was also forced to carry out his, and so engaging with it, there ensued a sharp conflict upon uneven terms. For, the Athenians came on without order, and so within a short time were discomfited, Antiochus slain, and fifteen ships lost; the other returning back to Samus. Alcibiades returning within awhile, in great chafe for what had happened, went, and offered battle again to Lyfander, but he contenting himself with his former victory would not stir, & not long after the Lacedaemonians took Delphinium and Eion, two Towns in Thrace. This loss was at Athens by Thrasylbulus imputed to the neglect, and luxury of Alcibiades, who thereupon by the people was ousted of his Command, and ten other Captains chosen for the management of the War, amongst whom was Thrasylbulus himself, Conon, and Pericles the son of Pericles the Great. He then went and made War upon the Thracians that were not under the command of that King, and thereby enriched himself with great Treasure, having built a Castle for his security, called Bisanthe, in those parts. Conon, who at this time was Governour of Antandrus, Phanisthanes being assigned his Successor, according to the decree of the people, went to Samus, took Thuria, and made excursions into the Territories of the Enemy. So this year ended, in which the Carthaginians with a Fleet of 120 Gallies, and 120000 men invading Sicily, overthrew the Agrigemines, whom after a seven moneth's siege they also forced to a surrender.

An Eclipse of the Moon.

85. The year following wherein the Moon was Eclipsed in an evening (April the 25. some three hours after Sun-set, as the Astronomical Table demonstrates) and the old Temple of Pallas was burnt at Athens, Pitaeus being Ephorus at Sparta, and Callias Archon at Athens, the 26th year of the War commencing, Callicratidas was sent from Lacedaemon as Successor to Lyfander, whose time was now expired. He having furnished himself with money subdued Mechymna, and charged Conon the Athenian General to depart out of those Coasts, and when he perceived him putting out to Sea, made after him, intending to stop his passage to Samus. He pursued him to the Haven of Mitylene, where he worked him, took thirty of his ships, and then besieged him in the Town, from which he cut off all provisions. Conon sent out two Gallies to carry word hereof at Athens; one of which escaping clear from the Enemy, came thither with the news, whereupon relief was presently decreed to be sent. Callicratidas in the mean time overthrew Diomedon, who came to relieve Conon with twelve ships, ten whereof he took, but when he heard that the Athenian Fleet was now come to Samus, consisting in all of 150 sayl, he left Eteonicus with fifty ships to continue the siege, and with the other 120 betook himself to Malea, a Promontory of Lesbus over against Mitylene, where he supped, and it happened that the Athenian Fleet coming to Arginusa (a place also over against Lesbus) supped there the same night. Here they fought the next morning a long, and earnest battle, wherein at length Callicratidas his ship being sunk, and he in it, his men began to flee towards Chius and Phocaea. The Peloponnesians lost 79 ships, and the Athenians 19. with most of the men in them.

Callicratidas succeeding Lyfander defeated, and besieged Conon in Mitylene.

The Athenian Generals overthrew Callicratidas.

86. The Athenian Generals resolved that Theramenes, Thrasylbulus, and others, with 42 ships should hasten to such Vessels as were as good as lost, to preserve them and the men, and the rest should sayl to Mitylene against Eteonicus; but a vehement Tempest arising they were all hindered, and forced to continue in the same place, during which stay, Eteonicus having notice by a Pinnace how things went, told his men the clear contrary, with which artifice encouraging them to take the Sea, he escaped. It might have been expected that the ten Captains, who joyntly had the command in Chief over the Athenian Fleet, might have received great honour for such a victory: But they were instead hereof, by the especial endeavour of Theramenes, brought to judgement, for suffering many Citizens to perish in the broken, and sunken ships; whereas, as it was pretended, they might have saved them.

They alleged justly for their excuse the Tempest which followed the fight; but after much canyaling, both in the Senate and Assembly of the people, the malice of Theramenes (who set persons on to make great lamentations for those that were dead) so far prevailed, together with the forgery of a certain fellow (who saying that he himself escaping in a Meal-Tub, had been intreated by those that were in peril of drowning, to desire the people to revenge their death against the Captains) that against the form of Law (contrary to which Socrates the Philosopher onely resolutely refused to act as one of the Prytanes) eight of them were condemned, and six being present were put to death; amongst whom was Pericles the son of Pericles. Those that were absent escaped, the heady multitude quickly repenting of their rashness, and the accusers of them were bound over to answer what they had done. Afterwards a sedition being raised, wherein Cleophon was slain, they took the opportunity and fled; but Callixenus one of the most faulty returning to the Cirie, and hated of all men, was furnished to death.

87. The Soldiers of Ereconicus wintering in the Island Chius, where they wanted both victuals and clothes, most of them conspired together to seize upon the Cirie Chius, to which whosoever agreed was to wear a Reed as a distinction. He having notice of it, was sensible what ill will, disgrace, and damage it would bring upon him if it proceeded, and fearing his own life, he boldly killed one of the Soldiers, whom he met with the Reed upon him, and being asked the reason of it, said as boldly, it was for wearing that mark of Sedition, whereat the rest were so daunted that they for fear cast away their Reeds, and so the plot was broken in pieces. Then received he money of the Chians, and gave them a months pay, and taking no further notice of the plot, encouraged them with fair words, and promises, and so sayled away. After this the Allies met together at Ephesus to consult about their affairs, where it was agreed, that ten men should be sent to Lacedæmon to desire that Lysander might be sent back to the Fleet, of whose abilities they had already sufficient proof. By the Laws of Sparta he could not be twice General, and therefore they found out a middle way, to appoint Aracus to that place, and send him as his Lieutenant. Five and twenty ships were then delivered to Lysander, at the end of the 26th year of the War, wherein Cyrus killed his two Cousins Autobasces and Mitraus, because they had not given him the honour due to Kings of Persia, by holding their hands within their clothes when they came to him. For this he was accused to his father, who upon pretence of sicknesse sent for him to come to him.

88. The year following wherein Archytas was Ephorus at Sparta, and Alexias Archon at Athens, Lysander gathering his Navy together, went to Cyrus for money, which being obtained with some difficulty he paid his Soldiers and Sea-men their Arrears. At Samus also the Athenians provided for fighting; where in the mean time came a Message to Cyrus from his father, who now being sick desired to see him, although at this time the King lay incamped against the Thamneri of Media, Neighbours to the Cadusians, who had revolted. Cyrus hereupon sent for Lysander, and consulting with him about the War, desired him not to fight the Athenians, except he over-matched them in number of men, told him his father and he were able enough to encrease the Fleet upon occasion, and to bind him and the State of Sparta to him, he gave him all the Revenues he had in those parts, with all the ready money, and so took his journey. Lysander neither daring to fight the Enemy with so few ships, nor to be idle with so many, subdued some places, and having given Agis a visit in Attica, sayled unto the Hellepont, which finding clear, he besieged Lampsacus, and took it. The Athenian Fleet, which consisted of 180 Gallies, hearing of this, came from the Cherroniscus to Sessus, and thence sayled to Egosspotamos, a River over against Lampsacus, the Hellepont at this place being not two miles broad. Lysander contained his men in great order, and refused to fight without an advantage, which was at length given him by the Athenians, who braved him, but were in continual disorder, carelessly running up and down, insomuch that Alcibiades having notice of it, came and advised the Captains to look better to themselves, but returned vvith no other recompence than bad vvords. But Lyfander keeping diligent vvarch upon them, observed his time vvhen they vvore most of them landed, some eating and drinking, others looking for victuals, and others vvandring up and dovvn, and setting upon the Fleet easily became Master of it all vvithout any opposition, except eight, vvherevvith Conon fled into Cyprus unto Evagoras the King, knowing how bad entertainment he should have at home.

89. Such Athenians as had confusedly got into their ships vvore slain or taken, and those that vvore yet on Land by the Land Forces, vvwhich Lyfander had in a readinesse for that purpose. He took 3000 men, vvith the Captains and all the ships, except those eight of Conon, and a Packe-Boat, vvwhich tacking to his ovvn ships, vvith the sound of Pipes and the pean sung, he returned in triumph unto Lampsacus. Then called he the allies together to consider vvhat was to be done vvith the prisoners. Many crimes vvore objected against them, as that they had done many unjust things, and now had determined, if they had got the Victory, to cut off the right hands of the Peloponnesians (or the thumbs rather, as Plutarch hith it, of their right hands, that they might never be able more to handle spears, but row vvith oares) and having taken the two Gallies of Andrus and Corinth to cast headlong all the men into the Sea; the perswader to this being Philocles. Hereupon it vvvas resolved, that they should all be put to death, except Adimantus vvho had vvithstood the Decree of cutting off the hands, vvwhich sentence vvvas accordingly executed. Lyfander then sailing about to the Cities under the Athenian power, dismissed the Garrison Soldiers and all others he found, vvith charge to get them to Athens under pain of death, vvwhich crafty policy he used to fill the City vvith men, that it might not be able long to endure a Siege for want of Victuals. VVhen they of the City heard the news, they vvore affected accordingly, bewailing not onely the fortune of the slain, but their ovvn also, expecting now that should be done to themselves, vvwhich heretofore they had done to the Melians, a Colony of Sparta, and to the Histianns, Scioneans, Toroneans, Aeginetians, and many other Greek Cities, not in vvay of revenge for any injury, but out of indulgence to their ovvn lust; for that they rejoyced in other mens miseries. Yet as grief vvould give vvay to prudence, they took care for fortifying the City against a Siege, in vvwhich they could not look for any assistance from elsewhere; all their Confederates, except the Samians, having forsaken them, and such as they had banished from their dwellings being again restored to those places vvwhich they had filled vvith Colonies of their ovvn.

90. Lyfander having taken away Democracy, brought in the power of a few into all the Cities. Herein he dealt vvith much cruelty and ambition, (putting in such men onely as vvore his creatures, that he might obtain an unlimited power or Tyranny over all Greece) and sending for Land forces from Sparta, he besieged Athens both by Sea and Land. The Athenians continued so resolute for a long time, that till many vvore already dead of famine, not a vvord vvvas heard of asking Peace. Then Ambassadors vvore sent to Agis the Spartan King about it, vvho referred them to Sparta, having as he said no commission to entertain their overtures. Thither then they vvvent, offering, that they might gain the friendship of Lacedemon, to part vvith all places besides the City and Piræus, vvwhere they vvould retain the Fortifications; but they had for answer, that if they seriously desired peace, they must repair home, and not return till they had better advised of the matter. Hereat the Athenians vvore much abashed, thinking now of nothing but servitude; none daring to propose the demolishing of the vvalls; for the Lacedemonians having offered them Peace upon these terms, Archestratus for advising them to embrace it, vvvas imprisoned, and it vvvas decreed that it should be unlawful to mention it for the time to come. Theramenes then procured to be sent to Lyfander to get out vvwhat his intention vvvas, vvwhether to enslave them, or to have the vvalls demolished, and thence he returned not till the fourth moneth, that in this time they might be constrained to resolve of something. SECT. 4.  return, he said he could get no other answer, but that they must send again to Sparta, and thereby he procured himself and others to be sent with full authority for concluding a Peace.

91. The Ambassadors of the Confederates being assembled at Sparta, many of them, especially the Corinthians and Thebans, urged that no composition was to be made with them, but that Athens should be destroyed; but the Spartans would not give way to it, saying, it was not their intention to destroy a City, which in the greatest dangers of Greece had done the greatest things for it's deliverance. They then without much delay made peace with them upon these terms: That the long walls and the fortifications of the Piræus should be demolished; that they should deliver up all their ships except twelve, receive their exiles, follow the Lacedæmonians both by Sea and Land in the Wars, and have the same Friends and Enemies with them. Some at the return of the Ambassadors would have refused these terms; but the far major part siding with Theramenes accepted of them. Lysander then seized upon the ships, and the walls, upon the sixteenth day of the moneth Munichion (on which they had formerly overthrown the Persians at Salamine) and went about to alter the Government, which the People strongly resisted, inso-much that he sent back to Sparta to complain of them, saying, they had broken the League, in that their walls were not demolished: and though no worse thing was yet decreed against them though pressed by some, yet this made them willing to receive any thing. Then sent he for all the Pipers out of the City, to whom joyning those in his own Camp, at the noise of their instruments he caused the walls to be demolished, and the Gallies to be burnt, the Confederates making great solemnity, as if that day gave beginning to the liberty of Greece. Herewith, the 27th year, and the War it self ended, which being carried on for so long a time with most various fortune, dubious and inconstant events, with infinite charges, all sorts of contests, and the ruine of so many Captains, as had not perished in all the Wars of Greece besides, was finished by the politicke industry of one man, whom some thought thereupon they could not sufficiently admire, in the 28th year after the end of that of Troy, in the fourth of the 9th Olympiad, the nineteenth of Darius Nothus (who died presently after the conclusion of the Peace) A. SECT. IV.

From the end of the Peloponnesian War to the beginning of the reign of Philip King of Macedonia, containing the space of 44 years.

1. THe year following being that wherein the 94th Olympiad was celebrated, in the course of which Crocinas the Thessalian got the prize, Endicus was Ephorus at Sparta, and Pythadorns Archon at Athens, whom yet the Athenians did not so account, because that the Oligarchy being brought in this year, they esteemed it as anarchical. As soon as the long walls and the Piræus were demolished by the command of Lysander, thirty men were chosen to make Lavvs, by vvhich the Commonwealth might be governed. After their creation and investiture in the povver, they deferred both to publish or vvrite the Lavvs; but constituted the Senate and other Magistrates at their pleasure. Then, first, they laid hold of all such as had under the Democracy lived by informing, and false accusing of others, vvvhich vvvas not displeasing to honest men. So that those being condemned by the Senate, they vvvere put to death. But afterwards they began seriously to lay their heads together, howv they might make themselves Masters of all. They sent Æschines and Aristotle tvvo of their company to Sparta to desire a Garrison for the better government of the City, till they had taken out of the vvay all naughty persons, and had settled the Commonwealth, promising themselves to pay the Soldiers. Lyfander being made use of procured vvhhat they desired, and Callibius vvas sent as Harmoftes unto Athens, vvhom they so flattered, that they brought him to consent to vvhhatsoever they should act. Nowv then they fell upon, not onely naughty and dissolute persons, but on the best, vvhhatsoever they thought ill affected, and would endeavour to stop their proceedings. Theramenes one of them protested against this cruelty, and added, that it was impossible their power should continue in that State without a sufficient company to assist them. Hereupon they fearing him, lest he should make himself Captain of the discontented, which was almost the whole City, chose out of the Citizens 3000 which they thought meetest for their purpose, and gave them some part of the power, with this privilege, that none of them should be put to death without the consent of the Senate; all the rest of the People being left to the discretion of the thirty, whom they also disarmed at a general muster.

Fill all places and rapine.

2. Now thinking themselves secure enough, they filled all places with murders, not onely of their private Enemies, but such whose wealth might enrich them, of which they were excessive greedy; and to this purpose they agreed, that every one should name one man whom he would put to death for to seize upon his goods. Theramenes having disliked the election of the 3000, uttered now also his detestation of this wickednesse, refusing himself to commit it. For this they were more jealous of him, fearing he might crosse their abominable practices, and resolved upon his destruction; so that having provided a Company of young men with daggers to assist them, they called the Senate together, and therein Critias (his once familiar friend, but now his deadly Enemy, because the most cruel Tyrant of the thirty) bitterly accused him as a turbulent and unsetled man; being novv for the People, and another vvhile against them; he objected against him the death of the six Captains procured by him, and concluded he vvas not a fit man to live in a Common-wealth, especially so constituted. Theramenes replied vvhith undaunted courage, and gave satisfaction to the Senate, as Critias perceived by their muttering, vvhho thereupon concluding, that if he escaped it vvhould endanger his ovvn life, he consulted vvhith his Companions, and then returning to the Senate, told them, that having first expunged his name out of the Catalogue of the 3000, and hereby he being subjected to their censure, they condemned him to death. Theramenes replied again, that his name was no more easy to be blotted out than any other mans, in consideration vvhwhereof, he advised them all to make his case their ovvn: but none daring to oppose, for that they knewv the men that were present to be privily armed, he was led away, and compelled to drink poyson, which he did with a resolute and gallant Spirit. After this the Tyrants, as being at liberty to do what they pleased, forbad all that were not contained in the Catalogue, to come into the City, from which they expelled them and the borders, that they and their Associates might enjoy their Lands. The Citizens betook themselves to the Piræus, but being thence also expelled, they filled Megara and Thebes with their multitudes.

3. This banishment of the Athenians procured their liberty. For, now they entred into consultation, and resolved to hazard their lives for the freedom of their Country; seeing that now what would have been treason at home, would have no danger abroad, but such as might be found in the execution. First Thrasylbulus who was then at Thebes, with but * thirty in his company, seized upon Phyla, a Castle in the Territories of Athens; which the Tyrants understanding, endeavoured to recover, but to no purpose; for he having gotten to him within a while 700 men, put to flight the Garrison Soldiers of Sparta, whom they had set to watch two miles off from the Castle, killing of them about 120 men. Herewith the Tyrants were something discouraged, but thinking it best to get Eleusine into their power, they went thither, and perceiving the Inhabitants that were able to bear Arms to go out at the gates, that they might onely as they pretended take the number of their heads, most wickedly murdered them. After this Thrasylbulus with 1000 men men seized upon the Piræus, against whom, though the Tyrants came out with their whole power, yet he obtained the victory against them, killing 70, and what more, Critias the Arch Tyrant, with Hippomachus one of his Collegues, and Charmiaes one of the ten Captains which had been placed over the Piræus. When the slain were delivered up to be buried, and thereupon both parties met, Cleocritus a Cryer belonging to the Priests, and a man famous for his loud and audible voice, expostulated with those who sided with the Tyrants for expelling them their fellow Citizens, educated together, partakers heretofore of the same things, sacred and prophane, prosperous and adverse, and all for to satisfie the lust of those Monsters, who had kindled such a flame as had already consumed more than the Peloponnesian War did in ten years. His speech produced such effect, that the 3000 fell at difference amongst themselves; such as had been busied in the destruction of other men, together with the Tyrants, vehemently contended that nothing was to be granted to them in the Piræus; but those that were confident in their own innocence, crying out, there was no reason that they should obey the will and pleasure of the thirty, and suffer the Citie to perish, prevailed against them. Then was the power of the thirty abrogated, and ten chosen into their room, one out of very Tribe, after which they quitted the Citie, and retired to Eleusine.

Their power is abrogated.

They send for aid from Sparta.

Lyfander is sent and besiege Thrasylbulus, and his fellows in the Piræus.

4. Notwithstanding the change of the Government, yet there was no accord berwixt them in the Piræus and those in the Town, but several acts of Hostility they committed against one another. At length the 3000 in the Town, and the Tyrants of Eleusine, sent to Sparta to desire aid against the other, saying, that the people revolted from the Lacedemonians; and Lyfander procured them 100 Talents to be sent out of hand, himself ordered to go General to assist them, and his brother Libys General of the Fleet. Then besieged he the Piræus, both by Land and Sea, and sorely straightened them; but Pausanias the Spartan King thinking much that he should get the glory of Conquering Athens the second time, which he would make as his own, he perswaded the Ephori to give way, that he should follow him with another Army, under pretence of assisting him; upon which account the Corinthians and Boeotians amongst the Confederates refused to follow him, alleging they should break their Oaths by fighting against them, who had done nothing prejudicial to the peace. This they did, concluding that the Lacedemonians would lay the Territories of Athens to their own demains. Pausanias, after his arrival, sent to them in the Piræus to bid them depart, and they refusing it; for a colour to his designs, he lead his Forces against them. But returning without any thing performed, he went to view the Walls the next day, at which time they sallied out upon him, and still fresh supplies coming in on both sides, wrought, and received considerable damage.

But Pausanias the Spartan King emulating Lyfander raketh up the matter.

5. Yet for all this he underhand sent unto them about a composure, and instructed them what they should offer. They obeyed him, and he perswaded also those in the Citie to end the controversie, that both might become friends to the Lacedemonians. The two Ephori present with him (for two used alwayes to accompany the Spartan Kings in their expeditions) inclined to his opinion, rather than to the severity of Lyfander, and so accordingly they sent Ambassadors from both parties to Lacedamon about an agreement. The Lacedemonians after audience presently dispatched ten Commissioners with them back to Athens, who, together with Pausanias, might make an agreement. They presently composed all on these terms: That all should return home to their own habitations, except the 30. and the 10. and 11 men which had commanded in the Piræus: and if any feared the people they might remove to Eleusine. These things being done, Pausanias drew off the Spartan Army, and those that were in the Piræus went up with their Arms into the Citie, and there sacrificed to Minerva. Then by the perswasion of Thrasylbulus the popular Government was restored, and all things ordered as in former times. A little after it being heard that they in Eleusine hired Soldiers abroad, attempting new matters, the whole Citie rose against them, took their Captains as they came to parley, and slew them: the rest by their friends sent to them were perswaded to agree. Then passed a general Act of Oblivion for all that was past, confirmed by an Oath, to keep which they being very carefull, even yet saith Xenophon, joyntly mannage the affairs of the Commonwealth. By which wise order the Citie returned to its former quietnesse, upon this Sedition raised by the 30 Tyrants, who being created by a Decree of the Senate, as * another saith, put to death 1400 Citizens unheard, and forced more then 5000 to fly into the Piræus.

6. But this Tyranny of the 30. not onely produced the destruction of many in the Town, but of Alcibiades also then living in Apa with Phacnabazus, whom he intended to make use of to bring him to the King, hoping he might deserve no worse of that Prince than Themistocles had done of his Predecessor. When the Athenians were deprived of their liberty by the means of Lyfander, and the Tyranny of the 30. they then began again to repent of what they had done to him, judging that if he had been yet at the Helm, they should never have made shipwrack of their liberty, and till their confidence was in him, and thought their cause was not utterly desperate as long as he was safe. The Tyrants also were jealous of him, procuring all the intelligence they could concerning all his actions, and at length Critias remonstrated to Lyfander, that things could not stand as they did long, if he lived, who yet was nothing perswaded to procure his death, till he received a Scytala from the Magistrates at Sparta, who either feared his great abilities, or did it to gratifie Agis, to remove him by some means out of the way. He sent to Phacnabazus, requiring him to dispatch him, who enjoyned his brother Maçaus, and his Uncle Sufami bres to be his Executioners: They coming to the Village in Phrygia where he lived, durst not enter his house, but compassing it about set it on fire. He perceiving what was done, took some Clothes, and casting them into the fire, which keeping down the flame for some space, he brake out, whereupon the Barbarians fled, not daring to stand to him, but at a distance killed him with Darts, after which his body was burnt (with that matter that was prepared to consume him alive) by the care of his Paramour Timandra, the Mother of Lais the famous Corinthian Courtesan. Thus he died in the flour of his age, scarce exceeding forty years, a man very beautifull, of most excellent parts, fit for any employment, able to accommodate himself to all, both times and customs, though never so repugnant, and therein yet esteemed alio to excell. Socrates upon him exercised the true Platonick love, labouring to infuse such virtue into him as might make him truly lovely; but such were his temptations, and inclination, that counterpoising the instructions, nature in this man seemed to try what she could do; it being agreed by all, saith * one who wrote of him, that none was ever more eminent, both for vice and virtue.

7. After these things Cyrus made War upon his brother Artaxerxes, as hath been said elsewhere, at what time he sent to Lacedamon, demanding a return for his kindnesses shewed to them, who thinking it most just, sent their Admiral to keep in play Syennesis the Satrapa of Cilicia, till he passed that Countrey. After his overthrow, Tissaphernes his greatest Enemy, being a most insolent man before, now grew more haughty (after the King had laid the Province of Cyrus to his Satrapie) and began to be more troublesome to the Greek Cities in Asia. They sent to complain hereof at Sparta, which State sent to their relief Thimbron with an Army of 1000 new raised Soldiers out of Laconia, 4000 Foot of Peloponnesus, and 300 Horse from Athens, which the Citie willingly parted withall, with no good prosperity wished to their persons, for that they had been in the service of the thirty Tyrants. What he did in Asia, and how he returned home after Dercyllidas was sent to succeed him, and was banished upon complaint of the Confederates, is related in the Affairs of Asia. At the same time as Dercyllidas managed the War beyond the Seas, the Lacedamonians and Eleans reviving their old grudges and complaints, broke out into another War, which was begun by the Lacedæmonians at the instance of the Ephori. They sent out Agis their King, who led an Army into the Territories of the Eleans; but an Earth-quake hapning at his first entrance, which was counted ominous, he returned without any thing at all performed. The year after, he undertook another expedition, the Athenians, and all the other Confederates, except the Corinthians and Bœtians, following him, wherein he sorely afflicted all the Countrey, sparing the Citie Eis it self, and though he retreated, yet the Garrison he left behind him, continuing these depredations all the next Summer, and the Winter following, the next Summer the Eleans were constrained to receive such conditions as their Enemies would give them. The Wall about Patra was demolished, Cyllene relinquished, five Towns delivered into the hands of the Spartans, and three to the Arcadians; the management of the Affairs of the Temple belonging to Jupiter Olympius being onely left remaining to them.

8. Not long after these things Agis died, having fallen sick in his return from Delphos. He had born to him by his wife Timæa, a son called Leutychides, but conceived at that time when Alcibiades sojourned at Sparta, by whom there were great presumptions that he was begotten. He had not been with his wife of ten moneths before the Child was born; Timæa her self was wont when she would play with it to call it Alcibiades more commonly than Leutychides, as was acknowledged by her maids; and neither did Alcibiades himself forbear to acknowledge that he had to do with her, saying, it was not out of any carnal affection, but out of a desire that those who should proceed from him might reign at Lacedæmon; upon these grounds Agis owned not Leutychides for his son, but told the Ephori he was none of his, divorcing also his Mother; but when he lay sick, having no Children, and moved by his prayers and tears, he owned him for his son before many witnesses. After his death a great contention ensued about the succession betwixt Leutychides and Agésilas brother to Agis, a man lame of one foot, but of a most noble and valiant disposition. Agésilas was bred after the ordinary strict way, as not having expected the Kingdom being a younger brother, and yet was in great favour with the people, and pressing the illegitimation of his adversary had their ear; but one thing they much stuck at, which was an old Prophecie much urged by Diophites their Prophet, that it should go very hard with Sparta when it should have a lame King. Yet Lysander, who had taken a great affection to him, answered, that by a lame King was not meant lame of a foot, which could be no hinderance to virtue, but one of spurious extraction; and herewith, and by his private interest, procured the sentence to passe for Agsilaus.

9. Agésilas had not been a year in his Office, before that being to sacrifice for his Countrey according to the custom, the entrails of the beast three times did not permit it, which being viewed by the Prophet, he foretold that a grievous conspiracy was hatched against him, and all Magistrates, both in Town and Countrey. Five dayes after this a notable conspiracy indeed was disclosed to the Ephori by one of the Complices, the head of which was Cinadon. They presently referring it to the Senate, it was thought fit that he should be sent out of the Citie, under pretence of some employment, and that some should go after him to make him reveal his fellows, which accordingly was done, and an ignominious death was executed upon them. After the execution Herodus of Syracuse came with news out of Phœnicia, that a Fleet of 300 Gallies was prepared by Tissaphernes, and the King, but upon what design was not known. The Lacedæmonians moved at this, called the Deputies of their Confederates to Sparta to consult about it. Now Lysander had a great mind to return into Asia, desirous to relieve those his friends, who being by him placed in the Government of the Cities, ten in a place, were for their violence and great misdemeanours, either killed, or driven into banishment. He therefore perswaded Agésilas to undertake so noble and pious an expedition, and wrote to his friends in Asia, to desire of the State that he might be sent. Being perswaded, he offered his service on condition they they would grant him thirty Assistants, by whose directions and advice he might manage the War; with 2000 choice men newly to be raised, and 6000 of the Confederates: These were all decreed to him by the dealing of Lyfander, who procured himself to be sent as chief of the thirty, to which place he might well pretend for the great glory of his achievements, and his friendship to *Agefilau*s, whom as he judged he had more obliged by procuring this employment, than by the former courtesie of preferring him to the Kingdom.

10. Having his Army and Provisions in a readinesse, he marched to Aulis, that thence, after the example of Agamemnon, he might passe over into Asia; but going about to sacrifice a Doe to the Goddess, with which he thought she would be better pleased than she was with Agamemnon for his daughter, he was hindred by the Bæotians from doing that which was contrary to their custom, and was constrained in a great chafe to passe over without the Ceremony, the Omission of which he accounted as a bad presage. When he came to Ephesus, it appeared that he onely bore the name, and Lyfander had all the credit and authority, all men making application to him, and observing him as a man of whom they had had former experience to exceed all men in earnestnesse to gratifie his friends, and destroy his Enemies. This much moved *Agefilau*s, though a man of a most mild spirit (who was famous for bearing with any thing) and troubled also his own Collegues, so that the King resolving to cut off his authority, rejected all the suites he made for any, and plainly shewed that his design was to crosse him in all he attempted. Lyfander hereupon told his friends how the case stood, that they must make no more addressees to himself, and being sensible of the disgrace expostulated with him about it, who let him understand that he could not endure to be overtopped by him; He then desired some employment of him, wherein he might both save his own credit, and do him service, wherein he promised to be faithfull. He then sent him to the Hellepont, where finding Spithridates the Persian to be offended by Pharnabazus, he brought him over to him with a great Treasure, and 200 Horse, although hereafter it was found that he took very hainously the diminishing of his reputation.

11. *Agefilau*s in Asia prospered in the War to admiration, gaining great glory for his wisdom, valour, and courtesie, both at home and abroad; inso-much that the Spartans, in confidence of his abilities, and integrity, committed the Fleet also to his command, judging it most convenient for expedition, and that both the Armies might joyn the readilier upon occasion, that they should be in the hands of one man whom they could trust. But in this one thing he is accounted to have erred, in that not having respect to the publick good, he passed by many far more Eminent for prudence and gravity, and pitched upon Pisander, his wives brother (a man very bold, but meanly practised in businesse) for his Admiral. As he was going towards the Fleet, and *Agefilau*s marching for Phrygia, Tithraustes (who having cut off the head of Tissaphernes had succeeded in his place) considering in how great danger his masters affairs stood, sent Timocrates a Rhodian with much Persian Gold into Greece, wherewith to corrupt the principal men in the Cities, and procure them to make War against the Lacedæmonians. This was effected at Thebes and Argos; and the Athenians, though they had no Gold, yet were very ready to imbrace the War, believing that therein they should have the Chief command. Those that were corrupted then grievously inveighing against the Lacedæmonians, procured that the chief Cities entered into a Combination against them. The Thebans knowing that they would not begin the War except first provoked, took occasion to do it by the Locrian Opuntians, whom they procured to quarrel with the Phocians, and their other Neighbours, about some grounds in question amongst them, concluding, that thereupon the Phocians would break into Locris. They did so, and did more hurt than they had received; whereupon Andocides, who had received much Gold, procured the Thebans to assist the Locrians. The Thebans then invaded Phocis, which they wasted, and presently did the Phocians send to Lacedæmon to desire aid, shewing that they had not been the beginners of the War.

12. The Lacedæmonians not unwillingly imbraced this occasion of falling out with the Thebans, to whom they bore many grudges. They exacted the tenth part assigned to Apollo at Deceleæ, refused to make War against the Piræus, perswading also the Corinthians, as they judged, to do the same; they remembred also how they had forbidden Agésilæus to sacrifice, casting the sacrifice from off the Altar, and would not follow him into Asia. They resolved now that they had no War in Greece, and that their affairs were in so good a condition in Asia, to curb their insolence. Lysander was then dispatched to Phocis, where he should gather the Forces of the Confederates together, and stay for Pausanias the King, who was to bring the Forces of Sparta and the rest of the associates to Haliartus. He marching into Bœotia drew Orchomennus from the league of Thebes, and impatient of delay tarried not for Pausanias, who hovered about Tegæa, but went with such Forces as he had already to Haliartus, which he summoned, but in vain, the Thebans which already were in the City hindring the surrender. Upon refusal he led his men to the walls, and they of Thebes upon notice hereof halted out of their City to help their friends, and falling upon Lysander (whether aware of their coming or not is uncertain) slew him in the place, and routed his Forces, of which were slain 1000 men, and of the Thebans 300. This was the end of Lysander, which he partly brought upon himself by his eagerness to make this Expedition, being in his old age fallen into melancholy, which rendred him more peevish than usual. He left a great name behind him, but purchased rather by his good success than Virtue. He would neither spare for cruelty nor falsehood to compass his designs, taking no estimate of any thing by any balance but that of profit. He scoffed at such as said, that those who were descended of Hercules (amongst which he was reckoned, though not of the royal families) ought to manage Wars without deceit, saying, that where the Lion's skin would not serve, the Foxes was to be sowed to it. A design of his was discovered after his death, whereby he intended to have taken the Regal power out of the two families, and have made them common to all in general. To this purpose a writing was found containing a speech he intended to offer to the People; which Agésilæus would have published, that it might have been seen what kind of Commonwealths-man he was; but was dissuaded by Lacratidas chief of the Ephori, who said, that Lysander was not to be digged up again, but rather that speech to be buried with him. Notwithstanding his ambition, yet he died poor, which rendred him the more famous, so that to do honour to his memory the Spartans imposed a mulct upon certain Citizens, who being contracted with his Daughters before his death, afterwards when his poverty appeared, refused to marry them.

13. The Thebans having lost so many men in the late fight, thought they had but small cause to triumph, counting their losse equal with that of the Enemy. The day after, when they understood that the Phocians and others had retreated, they took more courage; but again, when they perceived Pausanias to draw near, they esteemed themselves in no small danger. Yet the day following the Archenians joining themselves to them, and Pausanias not moving forwards, they then had no small confidence in the goodness of their Fortune. Pausanias being doubtful what to do, called a council of the Confederates to consult, whether he had best by main force or by truce recover the body of Lysander, who for that it lay near the Town walls, and it was very dangerous to fetch it off by strong hand, concluded a truce was to be desired; and the rather, for that the Corinthians refused to join with them, and the Enemy had good store of Horse which they wanted. The Thebans refused to give up the dead bodies, except the Lacedæmonians would ingage to depart out of Bœotia, and therefore to their great grief they were constrained to do it, and in their retreat the Thebans grown very insolent, killed such as staid behind never so little in the Villages. The Expedition was unfortunate to the

Being condemned he fled to Tegea, where afterwards he fell sick and died.

14. The Lacedæmonians awakened by their losse, and now knowing for certain that money had been sent out of Asia to the several Cities, which had moved them to take arms, they thought themselves in some danger, and recalled Agésilas to defend his Country. He having had successe in the War suitable to his Military skill and valour, was now gathering of greater Forces, wherewith he intended to march into the higher Countries against the King himself; but notwithstanding this, and that it troubled him to leave Asia, yet he resolved to obey, acknowledging in his letter to the Ephori, that then a General truly and justly commands, when he is governed by the Lavvs and Magistrates, upon vvhich account he said, he vvould followv the letter, if not prevent it (seeing they had set him a day, and that he commanded not for himself but the City and Confederates) although he had subdued a great part of Asia, overthrowv the Barbarians, and had made great preparations for the War in Ionias. He left Euxenus the Harmostes of Asia vvith a guard of 4000 Soldiers, but making all provision for his Country, drevv over many out of the Cities to the Service. Having passed the Hellepont into the Cherronesus, he held the same vvay that Xerxes formerly had done, vvhen in the mean time the Ephori and Aristodemus guardian to Agésipolis the young King, vvith an Army of 15000 overthrowv that of the Leaguers, consisting of 20000 (vvhereof 13000 bore heavy Armour) making great slaughter, though they lost no more than eight of their number. Care was taken that Agésilas should have notice of this successe (with the Confederates in Asia) who grieved onely that Greece should destroy so many of it's own Worthies. As he passed through Thrace, he would not ask any of the Barbarians leave to go through their Countries; but onely sent to know whether he should passe as a Friend or an Enemy. All friendly received and conducted him, except the Tralles, who having formerly sold the passage to Xerxes, now also demanded of him 100 Talents, and as many women. He jeered at them, asking why they came not to receive what was demanded? and going forwards made great slaughter of them. The King of Macedonia, when he asked the question of him, said he would consider of it; so let him, said he; but in the mean time we will proceed in our journey, which boldnesse so awed the King, that he suffered him to passe quietly.

15. Having passed through Thessalie notwithstanding all opposition, by order of the Ephori he invaded Bæotia, judging alwaies obedience best, though he could have wished, and had intended first to have been better provided. As he invaded Bæotia the Sun was eclypsed (August 24 according to the Astronomical Table) and he received the news of the overthrow of Pisander upon the Coasts of Asia by Pharnabazus, and Conon the Athenian, who being for his skil in Sea-matters in great request with the Persian, improved his interest for the restitution of the Fortune of his Country. Upon this report he put on a good countenance, lest he should discourage his men, telling them Pisander the Admiral was slain, but that his Fleet had obtained the Victory. But now in Bæotia, when he was come near to Coronea, the Leaguers opposed themselves against him, being the Bæotians, Athenians, Argives, Corinthians, Eubæans, Ænians, and both the Locrians, with whom was fought such a battel as had not hapned in that Age. At the first onset Agésilas had the better in one wing, but the Thebans in the other, and being in the pursute were forced to retire to help their friends, where he charging upon the Front of the Thebans, and not on the Rear, as he might have done, did great execution, and was wounded himself, notwithstanding the valour of his Guard, consisting of Fifty stout young-men, lately sent him from Sparta to do him honour. At length he had the better of it, and dismissed un-hurt 80 of the Enemies, who had taken Sanctuary near hand, after which he went to Delphos, and consecrated the tenth of his spoils, which amounted to no lesse than 100 Talents. In the mean time Gylus the Polemarchus brake out into Locris, where the Soldiers beeing greedy of plunder, were fallen upon by the Inhabitants, whom though they repelled at first, yet night coming on they were so intangled, that Gylus himself and very many others were slain, and all of them had been lost, but that the Alarm being taken by the Camp, relief was thence sent to them. After this, the Soldiers were dismissed to their several homes, and Agesslaus went by ship to Sparta. Yet notwithstanding the War continued, the Athenians, Bæotians, Argives, and their Confederates, making excursions from Corinth, which they had made the seat of Warre; and the Lacedæmonians with their allies from Sicyon.

16. The Corinthians considering that their grounds were wasted, and many of them slain, because of their being so near to the Enemy, but their Confederates free from these mischiefs, the most and best of them desired Peace, and began to consider of it amongst themselves. This being understood by the Argives, Bæotians, Athenians, and especially by such amongst themselves as had received the Persian Gold, and caused the War, they fearing Corinth would return again to the Lacedæmonians, to prevent this, they resolved to massacre all such as were for the Peace. This they performed on a Festival, when most were got together, sparing none that took Sanctuary in religious places, so that most of the elder sort were killed, and the younger fled out of the City. Many of them, by the intreaty of their friends, and upon the Oath of the Magistrates, that they should be safe, returned home within a short time; but seeing plainly the City was in the way to ruine by the tyranny of those that governed, as that for Corinth it was to be called Argos, the Laws of which City they must be forced to receive; moreover being sensible that they had no more power at home than meer strangers, some of them resolved it was better, by attempting the freedom of their Countrey, to die in the quarrel, if it should fall out, than to live in that slavish condition. In prosecution hereof they let in Praxias Governour of Sicyon for the Lacedæmonians within the long walls, who having no great force with him, fortified himself as well as he might, which being understood at Argos, they flocked out thence to assist their friends, and the Lacedæmonians opposing themselves they came to a fight, wherein after much difficultie and various Fortune, the Lacedæmonians were conquerours, making great slaughter of their Enemies. This Victory was the more eminent, for that so small a number had vanquished such multitudes, after which, they put to the sword a Garrison of Bæotians, which held the Haven called Locheus.

17. Praxias pursuing his Victory, brake down part of the walls to make a passage for his men, and then going on in the way towards Megara, took two Towns, wherein he left a Garrison and departed, after which followed onely some light bickerings, till at length the Lacedæmonians issuing out of Locheus, with their friends besieged Corinth, at which time the Athenians fearing they might passe the long walls and invade their territories, came out of the City with Masons and Workmen, and repaired that part which was towards them. The Lacedæmonians grudging that the Argives should flourish at home, and prosper abroad, sent Agesslaus with an Army against them, who laying waste all their Territories, brake through to Corinth, and took the walls which the Athenians had repaired, his Brother Teleutias Admiral, taking the ships and Arcenals upon the Gulf. Returning home, he was not long after sent out again, who when he came to Corinth, thought to have surprised it, but the Citizens aware of it, called in a Garrison of the Athenians, under the command of Iphicrates, and thereby prevented him. At this time Ambassadors came to him from several parts, and amongst the rest from Bæotia, to know what terms of Peace he would propound; but he carried himself so high, that he would take no notice of them; though Pharax interceded out of an inveterate grudge he bare towards the Thebans. But before before their departure there came news that the party he had left in Lechæum was defeated by Iphicrates; at which unusual message being much affected he leaped out from his Throne, and in all haste went to relieve them, but in his way met with three Horse-men, who acquainted him how late his assistance would be. Hereupon he returned, and the next day sent for the Ambassadors to hear what they had to say; but they something encouraged at what had hapned, and minding to requite him for his disrespect, made then no mention of peace, but desired leave to go to Corinth.

Stirs at Corinth.

18. He easily apprehending them, told them they should the next day see their friends in the Town rejoicing, and the defeat of his men, which was the true cause of their desire to go to Corinth, and accordingly wasting all about the Citie, went to the Walls, and having in vain provoked the Inhabitants to fight, marched to the Lechæum the place of the defeat, after which he dismissed the Ambassadors, not suffering them to go to Corinth. His Army now beholding with their eyes the monument of the late mischance, were sorely afflicted, having not at all been accustom'd to such a sight, onely the Parents, Kindred, and relations of the slain, according to the Laconian custom seemed to rejoyce in the Calamity of their Countrey. Having re-inforced the Garrison of Lechæum, he returned home his men, shunning the light and sight of all men, out of shame for what had hapned in this expedition contrary to their former fortune. But Iphicrates after his departure, in confidence of his good success proceeded, and reduced such places as had been taken by Praxitas & Agésilas. After these things the Acheans being put to it by the Acarnanians, who endeavoured to wrest from them Calydon, a Town formerly belonging to the Ætolians, sent to Lacedæmon, and expostulated with them for not assisting them, who alwayes were ready to follow them into all places. The State upon this complaint sent Agésilas to aid them, who invading Acarnania, wasted the Countrey, made prey of most of their Cattel, and being opposed by them, was much put to it on the mountainous and precipitous places, by Darts and Arrows; but coming to hand-strokes, they were presently put to flight, and 300 of them slain. Then consumed he all things with fire and sword, and attempted some Towns by the perswasion of the Acheans; but in vain. Now Autumn growing on, he could not be staid by their intreaties to prevent the Acarnanians from sowing their Corn, telling them they were not well advised in their request; for his intention being to return the next year, how much more Corn they should have upon the ground, by so much would they be the more desirous of peace.

19. And according to his promise, the Winter being over, he returned, at the report whereof the Athenians seated in a mid-land Countrey, and thereupon more obnoxious to damage in their Corn, and in great danger of losing their Towns, made an agreement with the Acheans, and entred into a society of War with the Spartans. This War being over, the Lacedæmonians not thinking it safe to contend with the Athenians and Boeotians, whilst the Argives were at their back, they resolved to send their Forces against them. The conduct of them falling to Agésilas, the other King, he would not undertake it, till he had consulted both the Oracle of Jupiter Olympius, and that of Apollo at Delphos, concerning the lawfulness of the War, because the Argives desired a Truce, but being satisfied therein, he invaded, and wasted their Territories; yet ere long terrified with divers prodigies, he retreated without any considerable thing done. In the mean time Pharnabazus and Conon, having overthrowen the Lacedæmonians in a Sea-fight at Cnidus, freed the Greek Cities from the Lacedæmonian Governours, which Conon suggested to the other as the onely way to make them his own, and not to attempt to deprive them of liberty, which would force them to combine against him, and thereby give him work enough. He attempted Sestos and Abydos; but Dercyllidas having secured them, he lost his labour, and gave order to Conon to procure a Navy from the Cities upon the Hælespont against the Spring, being SECT. 4. much incensed against the Lacedæmonians, and resolving to invade their Dominions. At Spring he did so, and having strengthened the Enemies of Sparta, as much as possible, he furnished Conon with a Fleet, and money to rebuild the long Walls of the Piræus, than which Conon perswaded him he could not do any thing more suitable to his own interest involved in the damage of the Lacedæmonians, and gaining the good will of the Athenians. The Spartans understanding that their own affairs must necessarily decline as much as those of Athens were advanced, (notwithstanding Teleutias brother to Agésilas had recovered the Sovereignty of the Gulf of Corinth) yet thought it necessary as much as in them lay to prevent it.

Antalcidas sent into Asia by the proposals of a peace to counter-work them.

20. Lest Conon should again recover the Islands to the Athenian state, they thought good to advertise Teribazus, another of the Persian Sarrapæes, hereof, hoping either to draw him to their party, or at least to procure that no more furtherance should be afforded to the design of Conon. To this purpose they sent Antalcidas to him, to lay open these things, and to try what could be done with him about a peace, who according to his instructions, to gain it the more easily, fully left to his disposal the Greek Cities in Asia, provided those without were but left to their own freedom. Teribazus liked well of this, but the Athenians, Bœotians, Corinthians, and Argives, having also dispatched away their Ambassadors upon report of his employment, refused to assent upon their own private interests. The Athenians feared, if the Islands should be left to their own liberty, lest they should lose Lemnus, Imbrius, and Sciras. The Thebans, lest they should be compelled to set at liberty the Cities of Bœotia, and the Argives concluded, that then they must lay aside all thoughts of Corinth, which they had conceived great hopes to make their own. Their dissention hindred Teribazus from concluding a peace with the Lacedæmonians without the Kings special Warrant, but underhand he supplied them with money to maintain their power at Sea, and committing Conon to custody, went to the King to know his pleasure.

Thrasybulus sent against the Lacedæmonians.

21. The King upon his giving account how affairs stood, sent Scruthas to take care of the maritime affairs, who being sensible what damage Agésilas had done his matter, was inclinable towards the Athenians, which being understood at Lacedæmon, they sent Thymbro into Asia to keep him in action, who at first sorely afflicted the places subject to his command, but at length was slain, and his Forces defeated. At this time certain Rhodians being banished by the people who had the power in their own hands, came to Sparta, and complained that the Athenians had brought the Island under their power by that kind of Government. The Spartans understood their interest in so powerfull an Island, and sent Ecdicus with eight Gallies to revive, if possible, the Oligarchy which was agreeable to their own model; and in this Fleet they ordered him to convey Diphridas into Asia, who was to gather up the Reliques of Thymbro's Army, and renew the War against Scruthas. He ordered his affairs very well, being a man fitter for the purpose than Thymbro was. But Ecdicus fearfull of the power of the people did nothing at Rhodes, into his room Teleutias was dispatched, and with a Fleet of 27 Gallies did that for which he was sent. The Athenians hearing of these motions sent out Thrasybulus against the Spartans, who despairing of Rhodes went into the Hell-spont, where in Thrace he reconciled two Princes, Odryses and Scutthes, and made them friends of the Athenian State. Departing thence, he recovered several Cities, and amongst the rest Byzantium and Chalcis, whence going to the Island Lesbus (all the Towns whereof except Mitylene were joyned to the Lacedæmonians) he had good successe, taking several places, and waisting the Territories of the other.

Is slain.

22. From Lesbus he sayled victoriously unto Rhodes, where he obtained money from the Inhabitants of Aspendus; but his men after the receipt thereof dealing injuriously with them, they issued out in great anger, and killed him in his Tent. This is he, who if virtue he to be valued without fortune, one doubts whether he be not to be preferred before all others, seeing that for faithful esse, constancy, greatness of mind, and love towards his Countrey, no man is to be preferred before him ; and whereas it hapned rarely to any to free his Countrey from the slavery of one man, he did it from the Tyranny of thirty. But whereas no man excelled him in worth, many overtopped him in nobility, and hereupon it fell out, that though in the Peloponnesian War he doing many things of himself, Alcibiades did nothing without him, yet the eminency of that man easily swallowed the glory and profit of all achievements. The Lacedamonians having notice of what he had done, and fearfull of what the friendship of Pharnabazus to the Athenians might produce, though they had nothing to say against Dercyllidas, yet sent Anaxibius out to restore their fortune, who had prevailed with the Ephori for this employment, and promised great matters if he were but assisted with money and shipping. They gave him three Gallies, and pay for 1000 men. He coming to Abydus skirmished with Pharnabazus, and then getting three ships more, infested the Athenians. But the Athenians being solicitous for keeping what Thrasybulus had recovered, though they had nominated Argyrius to his place, yet now sent Iphicrates with eight Gallies and 1200 men, who was lately returned from the Corinthian War. He setting upon Anaxibius whilst he carelessly went abroad, slew him as he was going to Abydus, and with him twelve more Governours of Towns, and thence betook himself into the Cherronesus.

23. At this time Agina was withdrawn by Esconicus from the Asbe- nians, who thereupon besieged it, but to no effect. At Sea both sides as it were played the Pyrats with each other for some time : But Telentius being made General of the Lacedamonian Fleet, fell in upon the Haven at Athens, where he took some Vessels laden, with the men, and putting the Citizens into a great fright, in his return preyed upon the Coasts, whence he took many Fisher-boats with other booty, the places being not aware of any such things. In the mean while Antalcidas the Spartan returned with Teribazus from the Persian King, having concluded a League offensive and defensive with him, in case the Athenians and others would not consent to their proposals for a general peace. He coming to Sea took eight Athenian Gallies which came from Thrace, under the Command of one Thrasybulus, and making up the Fleet to the number of 80 sayl, with 20 Syracusan Gallies, and others which he procured of Teribazus, obtained the Sovereignty of the Seas.
The Athenians were startled hereat, fearing the issue of this War might be the same with that of the Peloponnesian, especially the Persian being now Confederate with the Lacedamonians, and the Inhabitants of Agina infesting their Borders; upon all which accounts they were very desirous of peace.
The Lacedamonians also being much straightened in maintaining Garrisons in so many places, both affected to them, & weary of them, began to have enough of War, having moreover much trouble about Corinth. The Argives not ignorant that War was decreed against them, and that their old shifts and pretences would stand them in no stead, were also ready to imbrace peace.
They all then sent their Agents to Teribazus to know what was proposed by Ariaxerxes Mnemon.

24. Teribazus shewing them the Kings Seals, read the Contents of the writing, which imported, that he thought it just that the Cities in Asia, the Islands Clazomenæ and Cyprus, should be under his Jurisdiction: and all the rest, little and great, should be left to their own freedom, except Lemnus, Im- brus, and Scirus, which having been time out of mind subject to the Athe- nians, he thought it fitting they should so continue. And such as would not admit of these conditions, he with the rest of the Confederates would prosecute with War, both at Sea and Land, to the utmost ability. The Agents returning home, all the States imbraced the conditions, except the Thebans, who were unwilling to set at liberty the Cities of Boeotia; but Agessilaus making preparations to invade them, they were so far awed thereby as to receive them. He constrained also the Argives to leave Corinth, from which the Authors of the late massacre then flying, the Exiles returned home. These things being done, and the League sworn to by all parties, this first peace was grew high.

25. The Lacedæmonians were they who had the benefit thereof, being the Protectors and Patrons of it, and grew so high upon the successe, that now they resolved to chastize such of the Associates as had in the late War born greater affection to their adversaries than themselves. First they fell upon the Mantineans as guilty of this Crime, whom by their King Agessipolis (for Agessilaus, because of the friendship that passed betwixt his father and them, desired to be excused) they forced first to break down their Walls by turning the River upon them, which ran through the Citie, and then to divide themselves into Villages. After this they forced the Phliasians to receive their Exiles, and made War upon the Olynthians in Thrace, at the request of the Acanthians and Apollonians, who accused them of clandestine practices with the Athenians and Thebans. By these courses they hoped that all the small Towns in Greece, upon occasion, would willingly follow them in their Wars as Authors of their liberty; and the great Cities, having lost their Dependents, would be unable to make opposition. And in particular they had conceived an emulation against Olynthus, now grown so mighty, that not onely she commanded her neighbour Towns, but was become terrible to places far remote, and to Sparta her self. The Olynthians had taken a great part of Macedonia, together with Pella the Metropolis of that Kingdom, and now imitating the old prerence of the Lacedæmonians to set at liberty the places over which Amynas did Tyrannise, had almost driven him out of his Dominions, and taken all to themselves. They of Acanthus and Apollonia further adding, that either they must War upon Olynthus, or become subject to it, and fight shortly in its defence, Eudamidas was sent before with 2000 men. He arriving in Thrace, fortified the Cities, and recovered Potidea, which had associated it self to the Olynthians, and managed his affairs with successe answerable to such force. In the mean time his brother Phæbidas, according as he had requested of the Ephori, was employed in raising the main body of the Army, and having compleated the leavy marched away for Thrace to joyn with him.

of the Olynthians.

26. At this time the Thebans were much divided amongst themselves, being headed by two Polemarchi, Ismenias, and Leontidas. When Phæbidas was come on his journey as far as Thebes, Ismenias out of his hatred to the Lacedæmonians would not see him, but his Collegue betrayed Cadmea the Citadel of Thebes into his hands, seized on Ismenias, and got the command of the whole Citie, whereat those of the contrary faction to the number of 400 fled to Athens. Then another being chosen into the place of Ismenias, Leontidas went to Sparta, where he found the Ephori and people much displeased with what Phæbidas had done, being both against the League, and without any Commission from them; and such as were Enemies to Agessilaus, especially aggravated the matter, labouring to draw him into suspition about it. He otherwise as great both a commender and practiser of Justice as any, yet took upon him to defend the fact, saying, that Phæbidas was worthy to be punished if he had done any thing that was hurtfull to the Commonwealth; but if it was profitable, then according to the ancient custom he was not bound, in such cases where haste is required, to stay for a Warrant. Following herein his ambition, or giving way to his passion (which most shewed it self against the Thebans) he not onely indemnified Phæbidas, but perswaded the Citie to own what he had done, to keep the Castle, and prefer Archias and Leontidas, who had betrayed it, to the chief command of Thebes. The rest of the Græcians were sore aggrieved at what was done; but the Confederates durst not contradict it, and each Citie joyned one Commissioner to three sent from Sparta, who all together should take Cognisance of, and judge the cause of Ismenias. He was accused before them of having favoured the the Barbarians, and held intelligence with the Persian; that he had received part of the money sent from him to corrupt the Gracians, and together with Andocides, had been the great incendiary who kindled and fomented their intestine broils. He answered severally and apart to all; but being believed to have attempted great and pernicious things, was condemned and put to death. Then was the power established in Leontides and his Complices, who did more in favour of the Lacedamonians than was desired of them.

Telentias sent by the Spartans against the Olynthians.

27. Things thus prospering, the Lacedamonians more cheerfully pursued the War against Olynthus. They sent General thither Telentias, who with the help of Amyntas the Macedonian, and Derdas Prince of Elimea, overthrew the Olynthians under their walls, and wasting their grounds, for that Summer was ended, withdrew to their Winter quarters. But the next year when he returned, the Olynthians sallied out against him, whom to repel, he sending a party which drove them back beyond a River which ran by the Town, and followed them over, they then thinking they had his men at an advantage, turned back upon them, and slew to the number of 100. He being in a great chase hereat, went in to the rescue with all his Forces, and following them within bow-shot from the walls, his men were sore galled by those that stood on the Turrets, and forced to give back, and then being hotly charged he lost his life, with many others, so that the rest clearly put to the rout, and shifting for themselves to several places, the strength of this Army was broken, which defeat Xenophon chargeth upon the passion of Telentias, shewing how dangerous it is in the Leader of an Army. The Lacedamonians having notice of what had hapned, dispatched away Agessipolis their King with all convenient speed into Thrace, who upon better advantages invading the Olynthians, took Torone one of their confederate Towns, and harazed the Country, but at Midsummer by extremity of heat got a Fever, of which he died the seventh day, being much lamented by Agessilaus his Colleague, for their long familiarity, though emulated by him. Being put into Honey and brought home, there he was interred with Royal rites, and Polybiades was sent to command the Army, who besieging the Olynthians, at length forced them by famine to yield on these terms: To have the same Friends and Enemies with the Lacedamonians, and to follow them as associates whither soever they should lead them in their Wars.

28. In the mean time the Phlians grown confident upon the absence of Agessipolis, began to act very insolently and unjustly against the Exiles which of late they were made to re-admit. The Exiles complained of them at Lacedamon, and they thereupon in their absence put a mulct upon them, which understanding, they still continued and praised justice from that State. At length the Ephori resolved upon War, and Agessilaus was sent against the Phlians, who thereupon offering largely to do all things fitting, he refused them, saying, he must have deeds and not words, to which now without further confirmation he could give no credit. They asking what he would demand, he required their Castle to be delivered up to him, which being utterly refused, he besieged the City. They held out longer than he expected, because the Magistrate suffered them not to eat above half of the ordinary proportion, and by means of one Delphion, who with 300 assistants imprisoned such as spake of a surrender. But at length consumed with famine, they desired a Truce, to send Commissioners to Sparta to treat of Peace. Agessilaus stomached that they should passe him by, and therefore sending his friends to the City, he obtained that the matter should be referred back to him. He ordered that 50 should be chosen of the Exiles, and as many others, who should determine which Citizens should be suffered to live, and which put to death, and that then power should be given them to make Laws for the Government of the City. Whilst these things should be done he left a Garrison in the Town, and so departed, having spent Twenty moneths in this business.

judged their Empire sufficiently established; but another event (as Xenophon gravely discourseth of divine vengeance) taught the contrary, it being clear, both from the Histories of Greeks and Barbarians, that God suffereth not to escape unpunished wicked and ungodly actions. They had sworn not long before to leave the Cities to their own liberty, and yet they kept in their hands the Citadel at Thebes, and therefore being formerly invincible, were now sufficiently plagued by those alone whom they had injured. There was one Phyllidas Secretary to the present Polemarchi of Thebes, who being not at all suspected by his Masters, went to Athens where the Exiles lay, and there entered into a conspiracy with Mello one of them, for the killing of the Polemarchi, and recovery of their Countries liberty. Mello and six others being let in by Phyllidas, were in womens apparel brought in to the Polemarchi as Courtezans, whilst they were drinking and celebrating the Feast of Venus at the end of their Office, whom they stabbed with daggers hid under their clothes; after which they did as much to Leontides the chief revólter, as he lay in his bed, Mello being easily admitted to him without suspicion. Then went they to the common prison, and killing the Keeper set at liberty their friends, when now they called the people together, and exhorted them to stand in defence of their native liberty. They presently besieged the Castle, wherein the Lacedæmonian Governour seeing the alacrity of the assailants, was forced to yield upon this condition, to go out with his Army, and for that was put to death at his return to Sparta. The Thebans then slew such as they could come by, who sided with Leontides, and, too rigorously, extended the same punishment to their children.

30. The Ephori solicited by the Exiles that fled to Sparta, and moved by the authority of Agésilæus (who pretended a sufficient quarrel, for that Archias and Leontides were slain) sent Cleombrotus their King against the Thebans now in the depth of Winter. He in his passage slew those whom Phyllidas had let out of prison, to the number of 150, who kept watch upon the mountains, but did nothing farther considerable, onely he left Sphodrias Governour of Thespe to raise new Forces, and be a refuge to the discontented party amongst the Thebans, and so returned. Yet herewith were the Athenians exceedingly affrighted, insomuch that one they put to death, who had conspired with the Theban Exiles, and condemned another who fled upon it. The Thebans also despaired of being able to grapple with the Lacedæmonians, and therefore berook themselves to a politick device, which was invented by Pelopidas and Gorsidas principal of the late Conspirators. A Merchant was sent to Sphodrias, then lying at Thespi, a rash and ambitious man, to perswade him to fall upon the Piræus or Haven of Athens, as a work very grateful to his superiours, for thereby he should cut off the Athenian power at Sea, and he might be sure the Thebans would not assist them being already too much incensed. He pricked forwards by these conceits, invaded Attica as far as Eleusine; but there his design being known, and his Soldiers unwilling to proceed any further, as not sufficiently prepared for such an enterprize, he was forced to return.

Xenoph. &

31. The Athenians cast into prison the Spartan Ambassadors as conscious of such an unlawful act; but they utterly renounced the least knowledge of it, and promising Sphodrias should answer it with his life, they were content to expect the justice of the State upon him. The Ephori called him to account indeed, and yet though he appeared not, was he acquitted, to the great admiration of all men, especially because of the author of his acquitment, which was Agésilæus. For the King, though at first he refused several times to hear any thing in his behalf; yet Cleonymus the son of Sphodrias beloved by Archidamus, made such means to him, that at length being very indulgent to his children, he excused the matter, and saying, he held Sphodrias to be an honest man, and that the Commonwealth stood in need of such Soldiers, he got him acquitted, to his great dishonour. The Athenians hereupon out of indignation joyned themselves to the Thebans, and the Boeotians and they sent to the Cities under the command of Sparta, to draw them to their party, which they effected with molt, they groining under the yolk of Lacedæmon. They appointed a Common-council to be held at Athens, for carrying on the War, made up of one out of every confederate City, by which course and other wayes of self-denial, the Athenians recovered much authority, having constituted their Captains, Timotheus the Son of Conon, Chabrias, and Calistratus.

32. The Lacedæmonians to counterwork them, took off their severity from their Subjects which had not yet revolted, whereby they kept them fast to them, and renewing Military discipline, sent Agésilæus into Bœotia with a great Army; for Cleombrotus liked not the cause so well as to ingage in it; and thereupon he was forced to lay aside his excuse of superannuation (being above 40 years older than one of ripe age) and submitted to the employment. The Thebans opposing themselves against him with the Athenians and others, took an hill, where by direction of Chabrias, they received him carelessly, with their shields let down to their knees, and their lances advanced, which courage of theirs as it seemed made him to retreat, and so having done great damage to their Country, and lost many of his men, he returned, leaving the Horse still to make excursions, under the command of Phæbias. Several skirmishes then hapned after his departure, in one of which Phæbias himself was slain, with 300 of his followers. This made the Thebans take more courage, and many then revolted to them. The Spartans sent a party to reinforce the Garrison of Thespiæ, and in the beginning of Spring prevailed with Agésilæus to undertake another Expedition, which was performed to little purpose. He broke a vein in his sound thigh, and the blood caused such an inflammation, that though opening a vein at his ankle gave him some ease, yet at his return he was forced to keep his bed for a long time, the blood at the orifice having ran night and day, till at length he swooned, which stopped the flux of it. The year after Cleombrotus was again sent out; but the Thebans and Athenians disputing the passage with him in his way, after he had lost 40 men he returned. By these conflicts the Thebans were so exercised, that they became excellent Soldiers, as Antalcidas said jeeringly to Agésilæus at his return, that he was very well rewarded by them, whom without either will or knowledge he had taught to fight.

33. The Confederates being met at Lacedæmon, accused themselves of idleness, for that they had not stroven with the Athenians at Sea, and being now confident they could starve them in the City, they rigged a Fleet of 70 ships for that purpose. And hereby they for some time as it were besieged Athens, so that the Corn-ships durst not approach, till Chabrias overthrew them in fight, and brought in plenty of provisions. The Lacedæmonians preparing to send new Forces into Bœotia, the Thebans desired of their friends at Athens to invade Peloponnesus by Sea, to divert them; which they readily did, under conduct of Timotheus, the Thebans at the same time taking several Towns upon their borders. The Spartans sent out one Nicolochus to Sea against Timotheus, who not staying for six Gallies of Ambracia, which he expected, with 55 sail set upon the Athenian Fleet consisting of 60, and was worsted. Hereupon Timotheus erected a Trophy, but Nicolochus getting the six ships of Ambracia, went and offered battle again, and Timotheus not stirring erected another Trophy as a Conquerour. But Timotheus mending his ships, made up his Fleet above 70 Vessels, and prevailed at Sea. The Thebans having got all the Bœotian Cities into their power invaded Phocis, to the succour of which Cleombrotus was sent from Sparta, and there the associates both of the one side and the other met; but the Athenians thinking now that the Thebans became too potent by their assistance, were desirous of a Peace. The Thebans with 500 men went against Orchomenus, held by a Garrison of the Lacedæmonians, which sallying out against them, a hot dispute ensued, wherein, although the Spartans were double the number, yet they were beaten, which thing had not happened in former Ages. This added courage to the Thebans, and their military glory daily increasing, it now became evident that they strove for the Sovereignty of Greece. With this

SECT. 4. this year Hermæas of Methymna concluded his History of Sicily, which consisted of 10. or, according to some, of 12 books.

34. The next being the second of the 101 Olympiad, the 30th of the reign of Artaxerxes Mnemon, Hippodamus being Archon; Artaxerxes having a design to make War upon Egypt, and to use the Græcians therein, sent to periwade them to agreement. They being weary of War consented to it, all the Cities being to be set at liberty, and the Garrisons drawn out; onely the Thebans refusing to quit the Cities of Bœotia were not comprised in the League, being very confident in their good fortune, and much incouraged by several excellent good Soldiers amongst them, the principal of which were Pelopidas, and Epaminondas, who from a poor Philosopher became the most renowned for martial affairs of all Greece. This change produced great Commotions in the several Cities, but especially in those of Peloponnesus, which by the Lacedæmonians had been subjected to Oligarchy, and now having the popular Government restored, knew not how to use it moderately, but by unjust decrees opposed many worthy men, driving some into Exile, and selling their goods. Great stirrs especially hapned amongst the Corinthians, Megarians, and Phliasians, whilst those that were unjustly banished endeavoured by force or policy to restore themselves. Those that were for Democracy were maintained by the Athenians, and the Spartans assisting the Oligarchical faction, the peace was but for a small time observed by these two States, whilst both favoured such as bare most affection to their form of Government, and so they renewed the War: such is the fruit of Antimonarchical Government, viz. nothing but sedition, confusion, and disorder.

The peace continueth but a short time.

Platæa and Thespis demolished.

35. They (a) contested first about the Zacynthians, and afterwards in Corcyra, where the Spartans besieging the City, the Inhabitants almost all famished, yet sallied out, and killing Mnesippus their General, with many others, the rest hearing of the coming of Iphicrates the Athenian with a great Fleet, with such plunder as they had got, disgracefully raised their siege and departed. At this time the Platæans having a design to commit themselves to the Protection and Alliance of Athens, the Thebans thereupon demolished the Town, and not long after did the same by Thespis. The ruin of Platæa is by (b) Pausanias referred to the next year when Astæus was Archon, in which also (being the fourth of the 101 Olympiad) hapned (c) such Earth-quakes, and Inundations of the Sea in Peloponnesus, that Helice and Buræ, two Towns of the Achaens, were together with the Inhabitants swallowed up. Hereof Diodorus assigneth several causes, laying the stresse upon an injury formerly offered by them to Neptune, in refusing to lend the Ionians their Statues, to which they should have sacrificed. Five dayes before the ruin of these Cities, all the Mice, Weasils, Serpents, and such like Creatures came out of Helice in great numbers, and took the way which leads to Coria. The Inhabitants admiring so strange a sight, had the next night their thoughts diverted by the Earth-quake, which made way for that Inundation wherein they perished, and with them ten ships of the Lacedæmonians then lying in the Haven.

36. The next year being the first of the 102 Olympiad, wherein Damon the Thurian got the prize, Alcisthenes being Archon, Artaxerxes sent his Ambassadors into Greece again to periwade the States to an agreement. The Athenians were now grievously displeased with the Thebans for destroying Platæa and Thespis, two Cities which had so well deserved of Greece in the Median War, and thereupon would no more joyn with them. They sent Ambassadors to Lacedæmon about a peace, who used such Rhetorick to that State, specially Callistratus, that they brought the Spartans to assent upon these Terms: that the Cities should be set at liberty, the Armies disbanded, and whosoever would not acquiesce in these conditions, it should be lawfull for any of the Confederates, if they pleased (not being constrained to it) to help the distressed. All others except the Thebans subscribed the League, for they were unwilling as before to quit the Cities of Bœotia. Hereupon the Spartans Cleombrotus the Spartan King invaded Bæotia, tans jealous of them, resolved to make War in the behalf of all Greece, and gave order to Cleombrotus their King (who now lay in Phocis, expecting what they would command him) to invade Bæotia. The Lacedæmonians having great Forces of their own, besides their Allies, and none willing to assist the Thebans, every one gave them for lost, who yet upon Cleombrotus his Summons refused to set free the Cities of Bæotia, except the Spartans would restore Messene, and permit the Laconians to enjoy their liberty. In summe, they desired they would no more meddle with what they did in Bæotia, than they were concerned in any thing done in Laconia.

37. They created Epaminondas General, of whose rare skill and valour they had had abundant proof, joyning with him the Bæotarcha. He levying 12000 men marched away, and possessed himself of the Straights of Coronea, which Cleombrotus hearing, marched through Phocis another way, and came into Bæotia by the Sea's-side; coming to Leuctra, he there rested himself, which the Bæotians understanding, passed over the Mountains, and came near to him, but seeing such multitudes to overspread the plain, were not a little discouraged. The Bæotarcha then deliberating what to do, were divided in their opinions, three being for fighting, amongst whom was Epaminondas, and as many for departing; but whilst they were still in doubt came in the seventh, and through the perswasion of Epaminondas cast the ballance on his side. Plutarch saith, that Pelopidas first approved of his advice, being Captain of the Sacred Company, which was made up (as is most probable amongst many opinions) of intimate friends and lovers, who fighting earnestly for one another, when in danger, did great harm thereby to the Enemy. Whilst Epaminondas was several wayes encouraging his men to the fight, came in Jason the Pherean, the most Eminent leading man of Thessaly, with 1000 horse and 1500 foot, in shew to help the Thebans, but with intention to take up the quarrel; and he perswaded both parties to accept of a Truce.

38. Cleombrotus was then departing out of Bæotia, when a new Army met him from Sparta, under the Command of Archidamus; for the Lacedæmonians seeing the courage and resolution of the Thebans, whereas otherwise they could not do it, resolved to oppresse them by their numbers. The General then thinking it to be disgracefull at all to fear the Thebans valour, marched back to Leuctra without any regard of the Truce, where they found the Bæotians ready to receive them. Cleombrotus and Archidamus (both descended from Hercules) lead the Wings of their battel. Epaminondas gave leave to all that would to depart, which was done by the Thespians and others, who bore no good will to the Thebans. His prime men he placed in one Wing, and the other by themselves, whom he ordered to give back, as though they fled. Making then an oblique battalion, he with the stoutest men began the fight, and whilst the other retired from the Enemy he followed him close, who now brake his order to get into it. The successe remained doubtfull as long as Cleombrotus lived; but he being slain whilst he most valiantly demeaned himself, first a great and bloody contest hapned about his body, which at length his men recovered, and gave back in order, and by degrees. But Epaminondas still pressing upon them, and doing great execution, at length they fled, having nobody to govern them. About 4000 of them were slain, and 300 of the other party. This battel hapned in the 34th year after the end of the Peloponnesian War, the second of the 102^d Olympiad, the 34th of Artaxerxes Mnemon, Phrasielides being Archon. A. M. 3634.

39. The message of this overthrow came to Sparta the last day of their gymnick solemnities, wherewith, though the Ephori were so affected, as those that saw now a conclusion of that Principality they had almost enjoyed 500 years, yet suffered not the exercises to be broken off; but sending the names of the slain to their relations, finished the Festival. The day after, when it was known who were slain, and who escaped, one might see the Parents and Kindred of the dead to meet together in the Forum with cheerfull looks and minds, shaking one another by the hands; but on the other side the friends of such as were living, as in some solemn time of mourning to keep themselves at home, or if they came abroad, to signify their sadness in their habit, speech and countenance: and this was especially remarkable amongst the women. But when their associates had revolted, and Epaminondas was thought to be about to invade Peloponnesus, they then called to mind the Oracles, concerning what should happen to them under a Lame King; yet reverencing the valour, power, and glory of Agessilaus, they not onely retained him in his several places of King and General, but made use of him as a Physician in this sad distemper. Now whereas by the Laws of Sparta, such as had fled from a battel were not onely made incapable of Magistracy, and of marriage with others, who thereupon were noted with ignominy; but were to be stricken by every one that met them, walking in a dejected posture, in Fools Coats, with their beards half shaved; there being many and powerfull who fled from Leuctra; lest any inconvenience might follow upon their discontent, Agessilaus procured that the Law for his time should be silent, and (without repealing) obtain its antient vigour for the time to come. Then to recreate the minds of the Soldiers he led them out into Arcadia, where industriously abstaining from fight, he took a little Town of the Mantineans, and made excursions into their Territories, to give his Citizens a little hope, and shew them that the fortune of Sparta was not altogether desperate.

Archidamus invader of Bœotia.

40. The Ephori made new Levies, listing those now that were above 60. the Tegeatans, Mantineans, Corinbians, Phliasians, Acheans, and other Cities sent their numbers, the Conduct of all which was committed to Archidamus, because his father was not yet recovered. The Thebans presently after the victory sent a Messenger Crowned to Athens, to let them know their success, and demanded aid; but the Athenians being not a little troubled at what had hapned gave him no audience. Then sent they to Jason the Pherean Prince of Thessaly, who though he was otherwise employed with the Phocians, yet came, and when Archidamus had now invaded Bœotia, procured a Truce betwixt them, and thereupon the Spartan Army returned home. This by Xenophon is related as done after the battel at Leuctra, and because he maketh no mention of any Truce made by Jason betwixt them, before the fight, we may suspect a mistake in the time, either of him, or Diodorus, who relateth the story as before. Jason returning home was murdred by seven young men, having great designs in his head, after he had, partly by perswasion, and partly by awe, caused all Thessaly to receive him as General, the Lacedæmonians having refused to send them aid to defend themselves from his power. After his death his two brothers Polydorus and Polyphron, Authors of his death, were made Generals, of whom the former was slain within a while by the later, who turning his Principality into Tyranny, held it but one year, being then slain by his brother Alexander, under pretence of revenging the death of Polydorus, and overthrowing the Tyranny. But he proved ten times more Tyrannical, * burying men alive, convering them in beasts skins, and so setting them before the Dogs to be devoured, and killing others with Darts, to make himself sport. At length having a plot against his Wives brothers, he was slain by them by her means, and Tisiphonius the eldest of all the brothers succeeded, who continued in the Government when Xenophon wrote his History.

A Truce is procured by Jason Prince of Thessaly, who is presently after murdred by his brothers.

41. The Athenians considering that the Lacedæmonians still expected they should follow them in the Wars as formerly, and would compell them thereto if they could, thought it best for saving their credit to revive the peace formerly made with Artaxerxes. They sent therefore fifty men about it, to the Cities, to take an Oath of them to this purpose: That they would observe the Truce established by the King, and confirmed by the Athenians and their Associates; and if any injury should be offered to any that took the Oath, to assist them with their full power. All the States willingly admitted of it, and received the Oath, except the Eleans, who after the example of the Thebans, pretended that the Margarians, Scilluntians, and Triphyllians ought ought not to be set at liberty, because they belonged unto them. All Cities both little and great being by virtue of this peace to be set at liberty, the Mantineans taking occasion thereat, made a Decree to build their City again, and to fence it with walls, which formerly had been demolished by the Lacedaemonians. They were agrieved that this should be done without their consent, and sent Agefilans to them to stop their proceedings; but the Magistrates refused to call the People together to give him audience, though a friend upon his fathers account, telling him what was once deceed by the people could not be altered. Some of the Arcadians sent and promised them assistance, and the Eleans helped them with thirty talents of Silver. At this time the inhabitants of Tegea fell out amongst themselves, whilst some would have all the Arcadians meet together and choose some one man to be their Prince, but others were for living under their own Laws onely, and the maintenance of their liberty. These at the first had the better of it; but by the help of the Mantineans, at length the other prevailed, and killing some, drove the rest of their Enemies to Lacedaemon, to the number of 80.

42. The Lacedaemonians thought they were bound by Oath to revenge the cause of the Exiles upon the Mantineans, who by falling on them had broken theirs, and gave order to Agefilans to invade them. They by the advice of their friends the Arcadians contained themselves within their walls newly built, and suffered him to spoil their Country, which doing with great caution and warinesse, yet without any losse of honour, he returned home. At this time it must be, according to * Pausanias (who placeth it in the same year with the battel at Leuttra) that by the perswasion of Epaminondas the Arcadians built them one City to inhabit (destroying there many small Towns) which thence had the name of Megalopolis. The same of Plato being now spread abroad, the Thebans and Arcadians sent to him to desire his help, not onely for the instruction of their youth, and to teach Philosophy, but also to prescribe them Laws for their Commonwealth. At first he intended to go, but asking the Ambassadors how their Superiours stood affected to an equal distribution of goods and honours, and hearing they were utterly averse to such a constitution, he thereupon refused to go to them. At this same time also Epaminondas sent into Sicilie, Italy, as far as the Islands Euesperides, and all over where the old Messenians dwelt, to invite them home into their ancient Country, which was restored to them, and called after the old name Messene. Which restauration hapned 298 years (reckoned from the first of the 28th Olympiad) after the taking of Ira, and their banishment; in the third year of the 102 Olympiad, Dyscinetas being Archon. During all this time of their Exile they preserved intirely their ancient Rites, and the Dorick dialect unchanged, which in our Age (saith Pausanias) by them, and onely by them, is also preserved uncorrupt and natural.

43. The same year hapned such a Sedition and Massacre at Argos, as could never be paralleled in Greece. That City was then governed in a Democratical way; but the Orators so stirred up the People against the Nobility, that some being accused, for fear conspired against the Popular Government, to prevent their own ruine. Being hereupon suspected and examined, some fearing to be tortured made away themselves, and one in the midst of his pains accused thirty of the most eminent in the City. The common sort giving credit to this accusation, put all those to death unheard, and confiscated their goods, and then many others being accused who were wealthy, they put them all to death, and in this manner made an end of 1600. The Orators themselves now were afraid, lest in this so general a Massacre they themselves also might unexpectedly miscarry, and therefore ceased from their calumniation; which being understood by the multitude, as though they now forsook them, they put as many of them to death as they could find in the City, the vengeance of God thus repaying them.

Mantinean, General of the Arcadians, he was slain in battel with 200 men. The Arcadians after this desiring help of the Athenians in vain, procured it of the Bœotians, who dispatched into Peloponnesus Epaminondas and Pelopidas, to whom the other Bœotarcha of their own accord left the command of the Army. When they were come into Arcadia, all the Confederates made up the number of 50000 men; but yet the Thebans were very unwilling to invade Laconia. They considered that the Country was well fortified, and that the Lacedæmonians terrible every where would fight more desperately at their own dores. But the other pressing them much to it, and some bringing word how the borders were desolate of defence, and offering to conduct them into it, at length they invaded it in four several bodies, and bearing down all opposition, met together at Sallasia, whence they marched for Sparta it self, burning and consuming all things in their passage. Six hundred years had the Dores now inhabited Laconia, and for all this time not an Enemy had dared to appear in it, so that this unusual fight caused great tumults in the City, the women having never before seen as much as the smoak of War, nor the men able to endure a Siege. Agésilau contained them within, bestowing them as he found convenient in several places, for the defence of the City, which had no other walls than the bodies of it's Inhabitants. He was much moved at the arrogance of the Enemy, who challended him by name, as the cause of these dissentions, to come out and fight; yet so contained himself, as taking great pains for the preservation of his Country, he shewed clearly, that if he had not been, the City could not have continued.

Iphicrates sent Spartans.

His conduct is censured by Xenophon.

45. The Bœotians laboured to provoke the Spartans to fight, bidding them either do it, or confesse themselves to be inferior to their Enemies; to which they answered, that when they saw occasion, they would not fear to try a battel with them for all. They left then the City, and making great waste of all Laconia, returned into Arcadia. The Spartans in the time of this their extremity, had promised liberty to such of their Slaves as would fight for them, and sent to Athens to procure assistance from that State; which the Ambassadors procured to be decreed, especially by this motive, that the Lacedæmonians had saved that City, at the end of the Peloponnesian War, when the Thebans were earnest for it's utter destruction. They made choice of Iphicrates for the General in this Expedition, who otherwise a man of excellent conduct, yet is judged by Xenophon to have been far overseen in the management of this employment. For having loitered at Corinth, and the Thebans being about to return home, he ought to have fortified Cenchrea, where they had the most convenient passage, and when he sent to spie whether they had passed Onceus, he sent both all his own and the Corinthian Horse, whereas few had been sufficient to spie, and better for a speedy retreat, and hereby he lost no fewer than twenty men, and the Thebans returned without any great molestation. The Lacedæmonians having got 4000 Auxiliaries, besides 1000 Slaves newly manumitted, and many men out of the neighbouring Towns, thought themselves then fit to try a battel; yet convenient for them first to send to the Thebans about a peace. They offered it to them on these terms; that Messene should be restored by them, and the Laconians left to their liberty. Most enclined to receive these terms, till Archidamus rising up, said, that peace was not to be received upon such unequal conditions by them, who were wont to give and not to receive it; that Messene was justly destroyed 300 years before, and could not be restored, but to the great distresse and dammage of the Lacedæmonians.

46. But Epaminondas having to his great honour restored Messene fully (the grounds being divided, and all things done) after 85 dayes spent in this Expedition, returned home, and being in his way molested by Iphicrates, pursued him home to the walls of Athens. But there was a Law at Thebes, which made it capital for any one to retain the chief command longer than was in that case provided by the constitutions of the City, new Magistrates being to be chosen the beginning of the new moneth Bacarius. This Epaminondas knowing to have been made for the good of the City, would not keep keep it to the dummige thereof, and continued his command four moneths longer than his Commission warranted. After his return, he and his Colleagues were accused, and he permitted them to lay all the blame upon himself. They being hereby freed, no man expected any defence from him, as having nothing to say for himself. He appearing, denied nothing that his adversaries objected, confessed what his Colleagues said to be true, and refused not to undergo what the Law inflicted, onely he made one request to them: that this might be written upon his Tomb: Epaminondas was punished with death by the Thebans, because he constrained them at Leuctra to vanquish the Lacedamonians, whom, before he was General, none of the Boeotians durst once look on; and for that in one battel he not only saved the Thebans from ruine, but also restored liberty to all Greece; and brought masters to that passe, that the Thebans fell upon Sparta, and the Lacedamonians had enough to do to preserve themselves; and left not off till Messene being restored, he besieged their City. Having said this, the People affected with joy set up a laughter, and none of the Judges dared to passe sentence.

47. In the same year, according to Diodorus, but the next, according to Xenophon, Epaminondas was sent again into Peloponnesus to the assistance of Arcadians, Argives, and Eleans, who afresh had made War upon the Lacedamonians. The Lacedamonians and Athenians had lately established a League betwixt themselves on these terms: That each should command the Army five dayes in their course, which before was solely left to the Spartans. The Athenians hearing of the coming of Epaminondas, sent Chabrias with an Army to stop his passage. He coming to Corinth, with the Lacedamonians and other allies, made up an Army of 20000, and then all joyning together fortified the passage into Peloponnesus, making a ditch and a wall crosse the Isthmus from Cenchrea to Lachaeus. But Epaminondas observing at what place the guards were weakest, there with some difficulty brake thorough, harazed the Country, had Sicyon and other places delivered up to him, but coming to Corinth was gallantly repulsed by Chabrias, who sallying out of the City, and getting advantageous ground, not onely sustained his charge, but did good execution upon the assailants. At this time 2000 Gauls and Spaniards were sent by Dionysius Tyrant of Sicilie to the aid of the Lacedamonians, who arriving at Corinth, the Gracians to try their valour led them out against the Enemy. They behaved themselves very well, did good service against the Boeotians, many of whom and their allies they slew, for which receiving great commendations and rewards besides, they returned in the later end of Summer into Sicilie.

48. The Thebans being returned home, the Athenians conceived indignation against them, through the complaints of Lycomedes the Mantinean, who urged it was an unworthy thing for the Arcadians, being more noble (as the onely antient Inhabitants of their Country) and more deserving, to be commanded by the other, and follow them in the War. Being much puffed up with such conceits, the Thebans began to be alienated from them, and the Eleans bore them malice, because they could not obtain of them the Towns which the Lacedamonians had taken from them. Things being at this passe, came Phyliscus of Abydus, sent from Ariobarzanes the Persian Satrapa, with much money, to perswade the States to Peace. The Thebans yet would not come to any conclusion, alleging that Messene ought to be exempted from the jurisdiction of the Spartans, with which he being offended, not enduring that old pretences should be again revived, he left 2000 men already paid to the aid of the Lacedamonians, and returned into Asia. The Arcadians having chosen Lycomedes their General, sent him into Laconia with an Army, where he took by storm Pallene, and therein put to the sword 300 of the Lacedamonian Garrison Soldiers. To return the like unto them the year following (the first of the 103 Olympiad, wherein Pythostratus the Athenian was Victor) Archidamus was sent into Arcadia with the Confederates, and a new supply of men sent from Dionysius. He took Carya, and put all therein to the Sword, and going on in his attempts, Cissidas the General of

49. He hastned to relieve him, and in his march the Arcadians and Argives opposed themselves, whom charging with great resolution, he got a most famous victory, killing 10000 of his Enemies without the losse of one man; so that as the Priests of Dodona had sung (that it should be a fight without tears to the Lacedæmonians) yet the mēllage being come to Sparta, Agēsilans, the Senators, and the Ephors, are all said to have wept for joy. As this successe revived the spirits of the Spartans, which had been almost extinct by the battel at Leuctra, so, as Diodorus telleth us, the Arcadians now fearing their in-roads, for their better security built them one great Citie, twenty of the Menalian and Parrhasian Villages being taken in for the site thereof, though Pausanias will have Megalopolis built two years before. The Thebans and Eleans onely rejoiced in the misfortune of their friends the Arcadians, as tending to the humbling of them. The Thebans casting much in their heads how to obtain the principality of all Greece, resolved upon sending an Ambassage to the Persian King to contract a straight League and Alliance with him, and assembling the Confederates they pretended a necessity thereof, because Euthycles the Lacedæmonian was now with the King in behalf of that state. They sent Pelopidas, with others for the Arcadians, Eleans, & Argives: the Athenians also understanding hereof sent Timagoras and Le. n. Pelopidas being very famous even in Asia for his valour, by his demeanour got all the favour from the rest. He urged the King with the merits of the Thebans, who had never of all Greece born Arms against him, or his Ancestors, either of old in the Median War, or of late in assistance to Agēsilans, and he extolled their valour, shewing that the reason why the Arcadians were of late overthrown by the Lacedæmonians, was because of their absence. For the truth hereof he appealed to Timagoras the Athenian, whom being at odds with his Colleague, he drew off to his party. He obtained of Artaxerxes what he demanded, viz. that Messene should be held exempted from the Jurisdiction of the Lacedæmonians, the Athenians should abstain from the Sea, and all the other Cities left to their own Laws: Lastly, that the Thebans should be esteemed the near Friends and Allies of the Empire.

Getteth much credit by his Ambassie.

50. This employment got Pelopidas abundance of credit (who not long after was slain in a victorious battel, fought in the behalf of the Thessalians against Alexander the Tyrant) but Timagoras returning home received a great Present from the Persian, and being accused by his Colleague of siding with Pelopidas was put to death. The Thebans, though they had got what they desired of the King, yet their design came to nothing, for the Commissioners of the Cities first refused to take the Oath of this new League, and then most of the Cities themselves after the example of Corinth, the answer of which was, that there was no need of this new Engagement. This plot then of Pelopidas having not taken good effect, Epaminondas thought of another to reduce the Arcadians and Allies to obedience; and that was, first by subducing the Achaans, to which purpose he went again into Peloponnesus. He easily effected this, and receiving an ingagement from them to continue faithfull to the Thebans, returned, for which being much blamed by the Arcadians, and the rest of that faction, Governours were sent from Thebes into the several Cities, who bringing in the popular Government, thereupon drove away many of the principal men, who uniting themselves, seized again upon their several Cities, and then stood no more Neuters, but openly declared for the Lacedæmonians. So this second device of the Thebans came to nothing, and the Arcadians were pressed both by the Lacedæmonians and Achaans. At this time Enphron the Sicyonian, a man of great power in his Countrey, perswaded the people to bring in the popular Government, which done, and he with others being chosen Prators, he murdered some of his Collegues, expelled the rest, and openly established a Tyranny. The associates he put off by doing them pleasures, through which the Argives being incouraged, together with him fell upon the Phlians, & brought them to great straights, because of their faithfulness to the Lacedemonians, wherein they excelled beyond President, no adversity nor any advantage being able to affright, or allure them from it, as is largely discoursed by Xenophon. The Athenians sent Chares with relief to them, who overcame the Argives in two fights, and restrained their violent attempts against them.

Stirs about Sicyon.

51. But Aeneas the Symphalian, General of the Arcadians, judging things not to be at Sicyon as they should, seized upon the Castle there, and forced Euphron to leave the Town, and give up the Haven to the Lacedemonians. Yet a Sedition following in the Town he took occasion thereat, and repossessed himself, joyning with the people against the Nobility, but the Castle being held by a Garrison of Thebans, he thought there was no long continuing without their leave, and so taking money with him, went to Thebes, to procure the good will of the people there. Thither several of his adversaries followed him, to withstand his design, and finding that he wan upon the Magistrates and Senate, to hinder the progresse of the business, killed him in the Castle, at such time as the Senate was sitting there. One of them taking all the fault upon himself, made such a discourse in his own defence, by telling what the Thebans themselves had lately done in the like case, and by other arguments, that Euphron was pronounced justly slain, and he was absolved. Yet being carried to Sicyon he was honorably buried in the Forum, and worshipped by the people as one of their greatest benefactors. The Phlians now had by the assistance of Chares taken Thymia, which was fortified against them by the Sicyonians, but their Exiles had seized upon Oropus; the Sicyonians and Arcadians recovered the Haven at Sicyon, and no body assisted the Athenians at Oropus, but all forsook them, so that it was committed to the trust of the Thebans, till the controversie about it should be decided. Lycomedes seeing them dissatisfied with their Allies, drew the Athenians to enter into society with the Arcadians. The conditions were, that the Athenians, in case Arcadia was invaded, should send succours of horse, without being constrained to invade Laconia.

The Athenians enter into society with the Arcadians,

And consult how to become masters of Corinth.

52. The Athenians, as soon as this was done, cast in their heads how they might make Corinth their own, through the perswasion of Demetion; which being known there, their Soldiers were dismissed, and the society broken betwixt them. This made the Corinthians, who now had gotten so new and potent Enemies, look about them for their own security; and to this end levying all the force they could, they made also their peace with Thebes, in which they would have the Lacedemonians concluded, saying, they were constrained to this accommodation; but the Lacedemonians giving them, and all other their Confederates leave to provide for themselves (which was accepted by the Phlians and others) said they would persist in the War, and commit the issue to God, being resolved never to consent that Messene, which they had received from their Ancestors, should be taken from them. The condition of this peace was onely that each Citie should enjoy its own; for the Corinthians flatly refused to enter into a society of Arms, because they would not offend those that had well deserved of them, but presently a contention was revived betwixt the Phlians and Argives about Thymia, which was seized on, and held by the later, notwithstanding all that could be objected. At the same time were twelve ships, under the Command of Timocrates, sent to the aid of the Lacedemonians by Dionysius the younger (who now had succeeded his dead father) which they used in the storming of Sellasia, and then the Fleet returned back into Sicily. At this time Artaxerxes sent once more to mediate about a peace, which was submitted to by the Citie, and so the Laconian, or (as it is also called) the Bæotian War ended, after it had continued above five years.

Artaxerxes procureth another peace.

possession now of them, and another while of the Arcadians, continual controversies were moved about it. The later now having it in their hands, the Eleans, by means of the Arcadian Exiles with them, seized upon it. This being taken in great disdain by the Arcadians, they procured help from Athens, and recovered it by force; after which they overthrew the Eleans, and wasted their Territories to the Citie Gates. This put them upon craving aid of the Lacedæmonians, and desiring them to invade Arcadia, who accordingly sent Archidamus the year after the first action at Lasion. He took Cromnus, and therein leaving a Garrison returned; but after his departure the Arcadians recovered the place, and going into Elis, gave the management of the solemnities of the 104th Olympiad now drawing on, to the Pisaans, who by old and fabulous arguments pretended it once to have belonged unto them. For this purpose they seized on Olympia before-hand, and going on when the time was come in the management of the exercises, the Eleans with all their strength fell in upon them, and with incredible boldness so laid about them, that they put the Arcadians to flight, and though they could not keep the place, yet with great honour retreated to their Citie, having never before been at all accounted of for valour. This Olympiad, because the Pisaans managed it by force, was not registred in the Annals of the Eleans, neither is it certain who overcame in the course, Phocides the Athenian being named by Diodorus, but Euborus the Cyrenean by Pausanias, in the second of his Eliacks.

54. At this time Epaminondas labouring all manner of wayes to get the Sovereignty of Greece for his Countrey-men, perswadeth them as a means here-to first to obtain the Dominion of the Seas. He shewed it was an easie thing for those who were strongest at land, to obtain, by instancing in the Lacedæmonians, who though in the War with Xerxes they furnished out but ten ships for 200 of the Athenians, yet for their power on land were obeyed by them. By this, and other arguments, he got them to ordain that 100 Gallies should be provided, and that the Rhodians, Chians, and Byzantians should be invited to joyn with them in these preparations. He himself going with a little Force to these Cities, induced them to side with the Thebans, and so terrified Laches the Athenian, who indeavoured to crosse his design, that though he commanded a strong Fleet, yet did he quit these parts. During his absence, some of the Theban Exiles having a great desire to change the Government into an Aristocracy, drew into their plot 300 horse-men of the Orchomenians, who when they were about to execute their design, it was revealed by some principal contrivers to the Boeotarche. The Thebans had conceived a grudge against the Orchomenians of a very long date, ever since that Citie having paid Tribute to them formerly, was exempted from it by Hercules. Having now then an opportunity to vent their malice, they first put to death the 300 horse-men, then taking the Town, they put to the sword all the men, sold the Women and Children, and so utterly destroyed Orchomenos. This cruelty was utterly detested by Epaminondas, who said, if he had been present, he would have in no case suffered such wickedness to be committed by the Thebans.

55. The Arcadians having the Olympian Temple in their power, the Magistrates converted the money thereof to the paying of their Epariti, being the strength of their Army. This the Mantineans first protested against as Sacrilege, and sent the money which was due from them for the payment of the Soldiers, which being taken as an affront from the other, they called the Mantinean Magistrates before the Council of the 10000. who refusing to appear, they sent to fetch them by force, but being repulsed, at length others in the Council appeared for them, being of their opinion, that the money was not to be touched, which would brand them for ever with a note of infamy. This was decreed by the Council, which the great ones seeing, and apprehending in what danger they were, sent to the Thebans to tell them, that except they would come in time Arcadia would wholly revolt to the Lacedæmonians.

The

The most sober men amongst the Arcadians hereupon perswaded the Council to send to the Thebans, to protest against the coming down of their Army unsent for; and by restoring to the Eleans the Temple, to make peace with them. All took the oath of the League, and amongst the rest the Governour of Tegea, who lay in Garrison with 300 Thebans; but the great ones who feared to be called to account for the money, prevailed with him to lay hold upon the Mantineans and other Arcadians, who at Tegea were making merry for the peace. But the Mantineans making demand of their Citizens, promising if they had done amiss they should appear before the Council, the Theban General was at a stand, knowing not what to do, and at length dismissed the prisoners, purging himself by saying, he heard the Lacedamonians were about to invade Arcadia, and that some of the Arcadians had designed to betray Tegea into their hands.

56. Though they believed him not, as knowing the contrary, yet they dismissed him, but sent to Thebes to accuse him as worthy of death, for attempting a matter so contrary to the good understanding betwixt the States. But Epaminondas excused him, laying the blame upon the Arcadians, who having drawn the Thebans into the War, would offer to make peace without their consent, and thereby were guilty of treachery: and he plainly declared, that the Thebans would march into Arcadia, and there assist their friends. The Mantineans and others understanding this, sent to Athens and Sparta to desire aid, laying open the design of the Thebans plainly to be this: To weaken Peloponnesus, and bring it all into subjection to themselves. They jealous of this, entered into League with them, wherein it was provided, that each State should have the command over the Army in their own dominions. Whilst this was a doing, Epaminondas marched from Thebes, leading with him, besides the Boeotians, some Thessalian Horse, and Soldiers out of Eubœa. When he came to Nemea there he staid a little, having a great desire to meet with the Athenians; but understanding that they passed by Sea into Peloponnesus, he arose and moved towards Tegea. Having notice in his way that Agésilæus with the whole power of Lacedæmon were come into Arcadia, and that the City must needs thereupon be desolate, he marched in all haste thither, and had become absolute Master of it, but that by meer divine Providence (as Xenophon himself acknowledgeth) a certain Grecian gave notice of his intention to Agésilæus, who sent word in all haste to Sparta, willing them to stand upon their guard, with promise to be with them as speedily as possible.

57. Archidamus his son being there left, set the old men and boys upon the Houses to annoy the Thebans with stones, and disposed so of those that were fit to fight, in the several places of the City, that though Epaminondas had continued his march all night, yet found he that his design was betrayed, and such was the opposition he found, that although he chose the steepest descent into the Town, to have the upper ground, yet was he repelled, the Lacedæmonians losing the most in their too long pursues. Then understanding the Lacedæmonian and Arcadian Forces to be all coming to relieve Sparta, he thought it not wisdom to hazard a battel with them all; but judging that Mantineia would be left naked, and at this time of the year the Inhabitants would be much abroad in the fields about their Corn and their Cattel at pasture, he thought it fit to try if he could surprise them all, and sent before the Horse for that purpose. At this time it hapned well for the Mantineans, that 6000 Athenians under the command of Hagelochus were come through the Isthmus into the City, who upon their desire, notwithstanding they should have to do with such Horse as exceeded theirs in the number, and the best esteemed of in all Greece, resolved to do their utmost in their behalf. In the engagement they had the better of it, and thereby preserved all that the Mantineans had without their walls. Epaminondas after this thinking with himself that he must be gone within a few dayes, the term of his commission being almost expired, was full of various thoughts. If he should leave those, for the aid of whom he was sent, to be besieged by the Enemy, he saw he should should lose the honour he formerly had obtained, especially seeing he had been repulsed at Sparta by so few a number, and now also had miscarried at Mantineæ: and he considered that by this Expedition of which himself was author, he had given occasion to the Lacedæmonians, Arcadians, Achaans, Eleans, and Athenians, to enter into a straight League of offence and defence. From these reasons he concluded he could not in honour depart without a battel, in which if he overcame, he should make amends for all, and if hee should die, such a death could not but bee glorious, which should bee undergone in an endeavour to make his Country Mistressse of all Peloponnesus.

58. Ere long the Armies of the Lacedæmonians and Mantineans appeared, consisting, with their allies, of 20000 Foot, and about 2000 Horse. To the Boeotians were assistants the Tegeatans, and such other Arcadians as were most powerful and wealthy, the Argives, Eubæans, the Thessalian Horse which the Thebans brought, the Messeniens, Sicyonians, and other Peloponnesians; the number of all which amounted to 30000 Foot, and little fewer than 3000 Horse. This is much admired by Xenophon, that Epaminondas should so discipline his Soldiers, that neither night nor day they should shun any labour, refuse to undergo any danger, to be contented with any kind of provision, and very ready to obey all orders. When he had ranged his men in order of battel, he led them not straight on against the Enemy, but fetched a compasse towards the Mountains of Tegea, and made as though he would there pitch his Tents. This made the Enemy secure, which he well understanding, formed his battalia like a wedge, thereby to break them sooner, and led with speed against them, who now were all to seek, and in a confusion, some halting to bridle their Horses, others to buckle on their harnesse, and all in a condition rather to suffer than act any thing. And lest the Athenians should relieve their Companions from the left wing, he placed a Party of Horse and Foot in the hills to keep them in awe, by being continually ready to fall upon their reer.

59. His expectation was not crossed, for on what part he fell he carried all before him, the Enemy not daring to stand; but rushing more violently amongst them, the Lacedæmonians taking notice of him, flocked to him, and laid at him amain with darts, some of which declining, and fencing himself from others, those that stuck in his body he took thence and rerorted. Whilst he heroically thus contended for the Victory, he received a mortal wound from one Anticlistes a Spartan, who gave him so mortal a stroke with a dart, that the wood of it brake, leaving the iron and a piece of the tronchion in his breast. By the vehemency of the wound he sank down, and then ensued a most bitter contest about him: but the Thebans inflamed with wrathful indignation at this sad mischance, with great slaughter compelled their Enemies to give back, but knew not how to improve the Victory. For neither Foot nor Horse pursued them flying, but continued still in the same place, and at length went off carelessly, insomuch that many of the Foot fell into the hands of the Athenians. Which so falling out, another thing hapned than men generally had expected. For almost all Greece being here gathered together, one Store against another, in two factions, every one supposed, that when they should once come to fight, they that overcame would obtain the Dominion over the rest, who should be forced to submit to their yoke: But God so payssed affaires, saith Xenophon, that both sides, as if they had overcome, erected a Trophy, not being hindred by each other. Both sides also as Conquerours gave up the slain, and as Conquered received their dead by composition. And whereas both sides said they had the better of it, neither obtained thereby either Countrey, City, or Dominion, other than they before enjoyed; but a greater disturbance thereupon followed in Greece. So much for these matters saith our Author; as for what is behind, perhaps some other will take care to commit them to writing, and so he endeth his History with this battel, though he lived almost three years after it, as we have from Laertius. Anaximenes also of Lampsacus, who began his History with the beginning of the gods and mankind (and therein in twelve Books almost

SECT. 4.

60. Epaminondas being carried alive into his Tent, the Physicians affirmed that as soon as the dart should be drawn out of his body he would die. He then called for Diaphantus to declare him General of the Army; but it being answered he was slain, he bade them send for Iolaidas, but it being answered that he was dead also, he advised the Thebans to make peace, whilst with advantage they might, for that they had none left that was able to discharge the Office of a General. Understanding of his approaching end, he inquired of his Armour-bearer if his Shield was safe; (which to have lost was a great dishonour) It being answered it was, he asked which fetched the Victory; answer being made the Boeotians, then said he, It's time for me to die, and comforting his friends who mourned he should die childless with this answer, that he left behind him two daughters, the battel of Leuttra and Mantinea, which should propagate his fame to all posterity) he thereupon caused the dart to be drawn out, and so expired. This was the end of the worthiest Soldier that ever Greece brought forth, and hardly to be parallel'd in any other Country, all the Virtues which in others were but singular having concentred and united themselves in him. In strength both of body and mind; in Eloquence, Justice, Temperance, Wisdom, Magnanimity, and Sincerity, he excelled all men; and so far in Military skill, the art of a General, and in valour, that he could not adequately be called a Valiant, Politick, Wary, Bountiful, Industrious, or Prudent Captain; all these Titles and many others being due unto him. His modesty was incredible, shewing it self especially in this, that after the Victory of Leuttra, and many other rare achievements, he refused not to go in the Expedition into Thessalie, in quality of a private Soldier. He was grave, yet affable and courteous, as a means to all those virtues, having great insight into all parts of Philosophy and Learning, being therein instructed by Lycis the Tarentine, a Pythagorean. But * enough will be said in his commendation, if this be added, that the City Thebes before the birth and after the death of Epaminondas was ever subject to the command of others; but as long as he had to do in the management of the affairs thereof, was the head of all Greece; from which may be gathered, that this man was of more consequence than the whole City.

61. For with Epaminondas all the strength of the Theban Commonwealth was extinct, as if he had not onely died, but all the rest of the Citizens with him, who as before him they did nothing memorable, so now after were famous for nothing but their overthrows and disasters. After this battel of Mantineæ, all the Gracians being tired out with War, entred into a League offensive and defensive together, out of which Agefilans would have excluded the Messenians. But Artaxerxes stood for them, as having Territories as large and fruitful as the Laconians, whereupon the Lacedaemonians burning with an implacable grudge against them, refused to subscribe, and alone by themselves refused to be comprehended in the League, hoping still to recover Messenia. This reflected something upon Agefilans, who out of an insatiable thirst after War, had by his utmost endeavour hindred the union of Greece, and the burying of publick quarrels. And he seemed to increase the infamy, by undertaking an Expedition shortly after into Agypt, though it was by his service in his decrepit old age, to get some money for the supply of the now very poor and exhausted State. For it appeared a thing unseemly, for the best man in Greece, and one who had filled the world with his fame, to go serve a mean man, and a Traytor, and venture his life, credit and all, for a little gain, when as because of his old age, he had refused the Office of General at home, and in his own Country, though for the liberty of Greece. But he thought nothing too much wherein he might serve the Commonwealth, and in this respect undervalued his own honour, and having served in Agypt in a condition far unworthy of him, after he had received 230 talents of silver as a reward from Nectanebus, died in his return, when he had lived 84 and reigned 41 years. A most excellent Captain, in whom Nature inwardly made amends for that wherein outwardly she had been deficient, most ambitious of glory, and yet of exceeding great humility, which he shewed in his house, and in his constant conversation. Though his justice was overruled by his passion in the business of the Theban War, yet generally he held it most sacred, and as a punishment for his default therein, that great glory whereby he even reigned over Greece till then, was afterwards (together with the splendor of the Lacedæmonian greatness) much eclipsed by the rising Fortune of Epaminondas.

Stirs amongst the Megalopolitans.

62. Artaxerxes King of Persia, and Agefilas of Sparta, died both in the same year, and the next after the death of Epaminondas. And the same year the peace of Greece was again broken by some Arcadians, who having been transfused out of the neighbouring places into Megalopolis, took occasion at some words of the League (which gave leave to all to return home) to quit the City and return to their old habitations. The other Megalopolitans endeavoured to reduce them by force, and thence ensued a great controversy, they calling in to their help the Manineans and the rest of the Arcadians and Eleans. The Megalopolitans sent to the Athenians for aid, who sent them 2000 Foot, and 300 horse, under the command of Pammenes. He with this Force took some of the Towns, and terrified others into composition, and so reduced them all to Megalopolis. The year following Alexander the Phæacian Tyrant subdued several of the Cyclades and took thence abundance of Captives. The Athenian Garrison commanded by Leosthenes opposed him in Peparethus, whereupon he set upon the Athenian Gallies, and took them, together with one belonging to Peparethus, and 600 prisoners. The Athenians enraged hereat, condemned Leosthenes, and sent Chares with a Fleet into those parts, who spending his time in scaring the Enemies, but oppressing the Confederates, thereby contracted an ill name. For going to Corcyra he there caused such a Sedition, as could not be ended but in the ruine of many, and committed other things which much tended to the disgrace of those that sent him. With this year Diodorus concludeth his fifteenth Book, having, according to his promise, related such things as hapned before the reign of Philip King of Macedonia, and such, as together with other affairs of the Greeks related by others, shew that peace, security, and order, are things little akin to Antimonarchical Government.

Learned Men during this period.

Hippocrates.

63. Of Learned Men Contemporary with this period, in the first place is to be remembred Hippocrates native of the Island Cos, Prince of all Physicians. He was the son of Heraclidas and Phanarete, the twentieth in descent from Hercules, and the nineteenth from Æsculapius. Some have written that he was born in the first year of the 80th Olympiad. But a certain passage mentioned in his life of his curing Perdiccas of an Ereotick Fever, argueth him at this time to have been famous. This Perdiccas King of Macedonia (who having reigned 28 years according to Eusebius, or according to others 53, died about the third of the 93 Olympiad) fell in love with Phila his Father Alexander's Concubine, but modesty forced him to conceal his grief, till he fell into a Consumption and languished. Hippocrates by the motion of his eyes found out the cause of the distemper, and told Phila it was in her power to save the King's life, whereupon she was willing though with the impairment of her own credit to redeem it. The like story is told of Erasistratus the Physician, who discovered that Antiochus the son of Seleucus was in love with his Fathers Concubine, which Galen * mentioneth, adding, that he had made the same discovery in a certain woman.

64. Hippocrates grew so famous in his Art, that Artaxerxes Longimanus hearing of him, sent for him, with large offers to come and cure his Army, then seized on by the plague. But he said it was not fit for him to touch any Persian Gold, or cure the Barbarians who were Enemies to the Greeks. The letters of intercourse betwixt the Persians and him, are amongst others yet extant. Having lived as some said 85 years, but as others 90, or 104, or or 109, he died amongst the Larissæans, in the first of the 94 Olympiad. He left two sons, Thessalus and Draco; but the fruit of his brain hath been far more effectual for the propagating of his name to all posterity, wherein he hath not onely been a benefactor to the mystery of Medicine by his writings, but also by his religious care of the integrity of those who should profess it. For he framed an Oath to be taken by all that entred into his School, which for his honour, and the shame of those who have more reason to be convinced of their duty, together with the information of the ignorant, it is convenient to exemplifie.

His oath.

65. I swear by Apollo the Physician, and Æsculapius, and Hygia; and call all the gods and goddesses to witnesse, that to the utmost of my strength and judgement I shall observe what now I swear and covenant by writing. Namely, that I will esteem as my Parents my Master who taught me this Art, and thank fully communicate to, and supply him with all things necessary both for sustenance and convenience, as also account of his issue as mine own brethren, and if they desire to learn the Art, teach them without any wages or contract. That I will communicate the precepts, and what I have heard, and the whole discipline to mine own children, to his who taught me, and my Scholars who have given their names and faith in this Oath, and none else whatsoever. That I shall also to my utmost power and judgement prescribe an wholesom course to the sick, and defend them from all harm and injury. Neither through the procurement of any will I give, or cause to be given, any deadly medicament. Neither in like manner will I procure any Woman to miscarry of her burthen; but preserve my life and age alwaies chaste and pure from all wickednesse. Neither will I cut any of the Stone, but leave this work to be done by those Chirurgeons who are skilful in it. If I come into any house I will do it for the health of the sick, shunning all suspicion of injurie, or corruption, especially as to the filthinesse of Venery both towards women and men, free persons and slaves. Whatsoever things I shall see or hear, either in administering Physick or otherwise in common intercourse, which I think ought not to be told abroad, I will conceal them. Now if I shall religiously observe this Oath, and in no case break it, let me live in great esteem alwaies an happy life amongst all men, and reap ample fruit from mine Art. But if I break it and forswear my self, may the contrary happen to me. Much skill in Physick therefore corrupteth not the conversation; for though a little Philosophy may occasion Atheism, yet a great deal is an antidote against it, not suffering a man to rest in second causes; but discovering a necessity of looking higher. But more concerning this, as also to the praise of this excellent person, may be said in a particular account of the original, cause, professors, succession, progresse and matter of the Art of Medicine.

66. Besides Hippocrates, there lived at this time (a) Democritus of Abdera the Philosopher, who died in the same year, and was well known to him, having alwaies laughed at the folly of men. Four years after, (b) Socrates the Athenian, the Father of Eschicks, was made drink poyson for speaking against plurality of Gods and the superstition of his Country-men; Anytus having first procured Aristophanes the Poet, and then Melitus to accuse him. But afterwards the Athenians repenting of what they had done, in a way of mourning forbade all publick Exercises, and then animadverting upon his accusers, condemned Melitus to death, and the rest to exile. (c) Plato at this time being 28 years old, and having heard Socrates 8 years, went to Megara to learn the Mathematicks of Euclide, who now also flourished. The year after, (d) Sophocles died, six years after, Euripides the Prince of Tragick Poets. At this time also flourished (e) Ctesias the Physician often mentioned before, who concluded his history in the third year of the 96 Olympiad. (f) Aristotle Father of Peripatetick Philosophy was born at Stagira a City of Macedonia, in the first year of the 99 Olympiad. In the third year after, (g) Demosthenes the famous Orator. (h) Eudoxus of Cnidus, a famous Astrologer and Geometrician, flourished about the 103 Olympiad, who (i) found out the supposed

And we must not forget Thucydides, nor Xenophon the Scholar of Socrates, and equal to Plato, with whom he exercised some emulation. He was a great Philosopher; the greatest master of eloquence in his time, insomuch that for the sweetnesse of his stile he got the name of Attick Muse; and so great a Soldier, that his retreat with the Greeks out of Persia after the death of Cyrus, to one who duely weigheth all circumstances, will appear to have surpassed the exploits of Alexander the Great.

SECT. V.

From the beginning of the reign of Philip King of Macedonia, to the Monarchy of Alexander his Son, containing the space of 31 years.

1. Macedonia having been formerly called Emathonia from Emathon a certain King, and afterwards Macedonia from Macedon the Son of Orrus, or as others say of Jupiter and Æthra was bounded on the North and Northwest by the Thracians and Illyrians, on the South and Southwest by Thessaly and Epirus, and on the East with the Ægean Sea.

2. The people were first called Pelasgi, saith Justin, and the Countrey Bœotia. In Paonia, which afterward became part of Macedonia, Telegonus reigned, the father of Astriopæus an eminent Warriour and friend to Præmus in the siege of Troy. On another side Europus reigned. But Caranus an Argive, the sixteenth in descent from Hercules, some five years after the fall of Sardanapalus, by the command of an Oracle led a Colony into these parts, and having settled himself by force reigned 28 years. Cenus succeeded him and reigned 12. then Tyrinus 28. Perdiccas a Prince much renowned 51. after him Argæus 28. Philip the first as many, Euripus 26. in whose infancy the Illyrians invading his Kingdom, his subjects carried him in his Cradle into the field, thinking he being present could not but be victorious, or that his people durst not forsake him, who was unable to defend himself. Alcetas after him reigned 29 years, Amyntas the first 50 years, to whom Darius Hystaspis sent for earth and water as tokens of subjection. Alexander his son who slew the Ambassadors sent to his father; reigned 43 years, and by marrying his sister Gygæa to Dubares the Persian, grew into such grace with Xerxes, that he obtained all the Region between Olympus and Hermus to be united to his Kingdom, and yet during the War held secret intelligence with the Græcians, discovering to them all his intents and purposes. He left three sons, Perdiccas, Alcetas, and Philip, the eldest of which succeeded him, whose story is sometimes by pieces related by Thucydides. Perdiccas left behind him Perdiccas and Archelaus his base son. Perdiccas was drowned in a Well by Archelaus his Guardian at seven years of age, the murderer to excuse himself alleging to his mother that he fell in by chance as he hastily followed a Goose that way.

3. Archelaus having dispatched his brother out of the way, did the same by Alcetas his Uncle, and Alexander his Cousin, son to Alcetas; and yet though he came in this way, is said to have done many things to the advantage of the Nation, which is usual with Usurpers. He sought by all means to draw Socrates to him, and greatly loved and honoured Euripides the Tragedian. He had two sons, Archelaus & Orestes. Archelaus succeeded him, and reigned seven years, some confounding father and son together, and making this, who reigned but seven years, to have succeeded Perdiccas. Archelaus at the end of seven years was slain in hunting, either by chance or on purpose by Crate-

rus, called by Asian Cratenas, who relateth the cause to have been for that having married his daughter to him, he took her away and gave her to another. Cratenas had enjoyed the Kingdom scarce two or three dayes when he was also slain by others. Orestes then a Child succeeded, who was served by his Guardian as his father had served his Pupill, being killed by Æropus one of the bloud Royal, who held the Kingdom six years: the same who at first denied passage to Agessilaus when he returned out of Asia. He left three sons, Pausanias, Argæus, and Alexander. Pausanias when he had reigned one year was slain by Perdiccas the son of Tharacleus or of Philip, who being son of Perdiccas, and Grand-son to Alexander the Rich, was preserved when Archelaus the Bastard slew his brother Perdiccas, his Uncle Acesas, and Alexander his Cousin German.

4. (a) Amyntas was by the Illyrians driven out of his Kingdom, but restored by the Thessalians, held it (though very unquietly) 24 years. Some wrote how after his expulsion Argæus obtained the Kingdom for two years, till again he recovered it. (b) When he was overcome by the Illyrians, having little hope to recover his Kingdom, he gave the Olynthians a great part of the grounds adjacent; but after his restitution required it again. They refused to restore what was freely given them. He hereupon gathered an Army, and sent to the Lacedæmonians for aid, who sent Phabidas to him with 10000 men at such time as he surpris'd Cadmea, the Citadel of Thebes, having sent before his brother; but the Olynthians had taken much of his Kingdom, and made themselves Masters of Pella the Metropolis of Macedon. He had issue by his wife Eurydice, three sons; Alexander, Perdiccas, and Philip; besides one daughter called Euryone or Exione. He had also by his second wife Gygæa three sons; Archelaus, Argæus, and Menelaus, afterwards slain by their brother Philip. Alexander reigned not much above one year, in which time he was invaded by Pausanias the son of Æropus, but defended by Iphicrates the Arbenian, who declared his fidelity in this as well as other things, towards the Children of Amyntas, that Eurydice flying to him with her two Children, Perdiccas and Philip, he defended, and sustained her. Against him Ptolomy Alorites made War, and both called Pelopidas the Theban to judge betwixt them, who having decided the controversie (as Plutarch saith) took Philip the Kings brother, and 30 other of the sons of the chief Nobility, as Hostages to Thebes. But within a year after Ptolomy murdered him, not being his base brother as some suppose, saith Scaliger. Justin telleth us he was slain at the procurement of his mother Eurydice, which having agreed to marry her son-in-law (which must be this Ptolomy Alorites, and thence cometh he to be called the brother of Alexander) Consulted in her husbands life time how she might kill him, and transfer the Kingdom to the Adulterer, which being betrayed by their daughter, Amyntas for his Childrens sake would not use any severity towards her, little thinking she would really accomplish her wicked design upon any of them at length.

5. Ptolomy Alorites held the Kingdom of Macedonia for three years, and then was slain by Perdiccas the brother of Alexander, who succeeded him and reigned five. He was then slain in battel against the Illyrians according to Diodorus; but Justin saith he perished by the wicked practices of his mother, as Alexander did. Perdiccas left behind him a young son, of whom Philip his brother was constituted Guardian in the second year of Ochus King of Persia, in the first year of the 105th Olympiad, Callimedes being Archon. Plutarch maketh him to have been carried as an Hostage to Thebes by Pelopidas. Diodorus writeth that his father gave him as an Hostage to the Illyrians, and that they committed him to the Thebans to be kept, who delivered him to the custody of Polymnis the father of Epaminondas, with whom he was brought up, though Plutarch saith he lived with Pammenes, and thence became an emulator of Epaminondas. Justin saith he was twice given as an Hostage by his brother; once to the Illyrians, and another time to the Thebans, which mightily conduced to his education; for being three years at Thebes, he laid the found-

If he there continued but three years, he seemeth to have returned home at the beginning of the reign of his brother Perdiccas, but Diodorus saith, it was after his death that he made an escape from Thebes. At first, as it seemeth from Justin, he bore but the Office of Tutor, or Guardian to his Nephew; but afterwards great Wars happening, in which the expectation of the Child could nothing avail, he was constrained to take upon him the Dignity of King by the people.

Then King.

6. For, the Macedonians having lately received an overthrow from the Illyrians, were much dejected thereat. The Paones their neighbours made excursions, and the Illyrians prepared for another terrible invasion. The King of Thrace was minded to set up Pausanias, and the Athenians Argæus (both sons of the late Usurper Æropus) having sent Mantias with 3000 men, and a Fleet readily furnished for that purpose. But Philip seeming nothing to be discouraged at these things, by his good language (wherein he was very able) and his courteous deportment, bare up the spirits of his people. He amended military Discipline, and instiuted the Macedonian Phalange. Understanding the Athenians to have a great desire to recover Amphipolis, and to have Argæus established King, he left that Citie to its own liberty. The Paonians and the King of Thrace he bought off with money, and overthrew Argæus at Metbone assisted by Mantias the Athenian, by which victory he mightily incouraged his men.

He Conquereth all difficulties.

7. The year after he made peace with the Athenians, who readily accepted of it, because he was content to quit Amphipolis, giving him great commendations also for his clemency, in that he had suffered the Reliques of their Army at Metbone to depart with their lives and liberty into Attica when he had them at his mercy. Being thus freed from the Athenian War, hearing that Agis King of the Paonians was dead, he invaded, and brought them into subjection to himself. Then entred he the Countrey of the Illyrians with about 10000 foot, and 600 horse, whose King Bardylis sent to treat with him, offering that each should retain such places as they already held; but he returned answer, that though he was also desirous of peace, yet would he admit of no terms, except the Illyrians would quit all the Cities which belonged to his Kingdom. Bardylis then met with him with a strong Army, and a great and bloody battel was with great animosity on both sides fought, wherein at length Philip had the victory, and the Illyrians having lost above 7000 men, were forced to relinquish all places belonging to Macedonia.

8. After he had brought under all the Illyrians as far as the Lake Lychnitis, and made an honourable peace with them, he returned into Macedonia with great fame. The year after, for that the Inhabitants of Amphipolis had several wayes provoked him, and ministred occasion of quarrels, he went against them with a great force, and having cast down the Wall with his battering Rams, entred the Citie, whence banishing all his Enemies he granted indemnity to the rest. This place being very conveniently sited for his occasions in Thrace, much conduced to the progresse of his affairs. For hereupon he presently took Pydna, and to ingratiate himself with the Olynthians (the friendship of whom was very necessary for such as would grow great) having taken Potidea, he gave up Pydna with the grounds belonging to it into their hands. Then going to Crenide, he enlarged this Town with an accession of new Inhabitants, and called it after himself Philippi. Here were rich Mines of Gold, which having been formerly neglected he now so far advanced as to bring him in yearly a Revenue of 1000 Talents, which mightily tended to the advancement of his affairs, and the Majesty of his Kingdom, for now stamped he that piece of Golden Coyn, called the Philippick, raised great forces, and afterwards with bribes drew many Græcians to betray their Countrey. But he proceeded in his affairs with more confidence and freedom, for that now the Athenians were busied in the the Social War began this year, and thereupon could not take such care as was necessary, about the preservation of Amphipolis. SECT. 5.

The Social War.

9. The Social War, which continued three years, had its original from the revolt of the Chians, Rhodians, Coans, and Byzantians, from the State of Athens. The Athenians sent against them two Generals, Chares and Chabrias, who when they came to Chius, found their succours sent from other Cities, and from Mausolus the Prince of Caria. They fell upon the City; Chares on the Land, and Chabrias by Sea, but the latter whilst too boldly he ventured by himself into the Haven, was slain, and then the rest retreated without any thing done. One * in his life telleth us, that in this Expedition he was a private man, but excelling the Commanders in Military skill and fame, was more regarded by the Soldiers; which thing proved his destruction. For endeavouring first of all to enter the Haven, when he had broken in none followed him, so that being compassed with Enemies his Gallies was sunk, out of which casting himself, he might easily, as the rest did, have swum to his friends and escaped; but preferring an honourable death before an ignominious life, fighting alone was slain, in all fights having been daring, though otherwise he was accounted slow and heavy. * Corn. Nepos.

10. The year following, for any thing we understand, was spent altogether, or for the most part, in preparations on both sides to decide the controversy in a Sea fight. The Athenians having sent before under the command of Chares a Fleet of 60 ships, sent other 60 after, which they committed to the trust of Iphicrates and Timotheus, two of the most noble in the City, who were to joyn with Chares, and in equal authority to manage the War. On the other part the Confederates with 100 Gallies wasted the Islands Imbrus and Lembus, and coming into Samus, after they had harassed the Country, besieged the City both by Sea and Land, and making depredations upon many other Islands under the jurisdiction of Athens, got much money thereby. But the Athenian Generals uniting their Forces resolved to besiege Byzantium, which the Confederates understanding, raised the siege at Samus to come and relieve it. They were about to joyn in battle, when suddenly arose a mighty Tempest, which made Iphicrates and Timotheus decline the fight, but Chares would not acquiesce in their opinion, but sent to Athens and accused them to the People, as wilfully having neglected a good opportunity of doing their Country Service, which so incensed the heady multitude, that they condemned them in many Talents. Corn. Nepos relateth, that Menesthenes the son of Iphicrates, and son Law to Timotheus, was sent as General, and they two as his Advisers. That the action was about Samus wherein Chares miscarried, and whereupon he accused them to the People. That Iphicrates being quitted, Timotheus was fined ten Talents, which he being unable to pay departed to Chelus, where dying, the multitude repented of their rash judgment, and remitting nine parts of the fine, caused his son Conon to pay the other, towards repairing of the Wall. So that the Walls which Conon the Grandfather built with spoils, Conon the Grand-son was forced to repair at his own cost and disgrace of his Family. This was the last Age of the famous Athenian Captains, which concluded with the lives of Iphicrates, Chabrias and Timotheus, those that followed being not at all worthy the reckoning. Diodorus ad Olymp. 106. at. 1.

11. Chares having got all the power into his own hands, assisted Pharnabazus the Persian Satrap, who had revolted from his Prince, and was so rewarded for his service after the Victory, that he was enabled to pay his Army. This was very acceptable to the Athenians at first; but when the King had once sent to expostulate the matter with them, and a rumour was abroad that he intended with 200 ships to assist the Enemies in the Social War, they were far otherwise affected, inasmuch as they resolved to make peace with the revolted, which was easily done, they being no less desirous of it. Philip having the year before married Olympias the daughter of Neoptolemus late King of the Molossians, and Niece (not Sister as Plutarch hath it) to Arymbas or Aribbas the present, was much envied for his good success by the three Kings of the Thracians, Illyrians, and Peonians. Since they had been overthrown and In vita Timothei & Iphicratis.

SECT. 5. and subdued by him, they had no strength severally to encourage them to a revolt; Yet joining their Forces together they were confident of good success. But before they had compleated their Army, and whilst they were as yet incompofed, he set upon them suddenly, and easily reduced them to obedience.

Alexander the Great is born. 12. The same year being the first of the 106 Olympias, the sixth of Antaxerxes Ochus, Elpinices being Archon, Alexander the Son of Philip and Olympias was born at Pella in Macedonia, in the Attick moneth Boedromion, if that be true which Aristobulus relateth in Arrianus, that being 32 years and eight moneths old at his death, he died on the last day, but one, of the moneth Thargelion. If this be true, (and Aristobulus, if any, might have occasion to know it) then could it not be on the sixth day of the moneth Hecatombeon, as Plutarch relateth, whose error (into which others also fell) arose from thence, because anciently the Macedonian moneth Lous fell in with the Attick Hecatombeon. The same Author telleth us in the life of Alexander, that Philip received at the same time three several messages: One, that the Illyrians had received a great overthrow from Parmenio his General. Another, that he had got the prize at Olympia with his swift-footed Horse. And the third concerning the birth of Alexander: and this was a little after he had taken Potidaea. But Potidaea was taken two years before, as appeareth not onely from Diodorus, but also from Demosthenes; and strange it is, that Philip should not know of his Sons birth a good while before he could have intelligence of the Olympian Solemnities, concerning which judgement was given on the sixteenth day of the moneth: So that the relation of Troguus is more true, that he received two messages at the same time: viz. one of his Victory over the Illyrians, and another of his prize at Olympia. The same day that Alexander was born, was the (a) Temple of Diana at Ephesus set on fire by (b) one who desired by such an act to be rendred famous to all posterity, as he confessed upon the Rack. But the Council of Asia decreed that none should dare to name him; and for any thing we certainly know, his name is buried in oblivion, or at least, there is incertainty in it; for though Theopompus in his History recorded it, and some (c) tell us it was Herostratus, yet by another he is called Lygdamis. (d) This being destroyed by this means a more excellent Structure was raised, the women contributing their ornaments, and the men their goods; to this purpose money being also made of the old pillars. Timæus as (e) one, or Hegeſias the Magnesian as (f) another, said the reason of the burning to have been, because Diana that night being buſied in Midwives work at the travel of Olympias, had no leisure to look to her Temple, which Jeſt Plutarch counteth so frigid, as to have been able to have quenched the flame. Perhaps both conceits put together might have done it.

The Phocians or Sacred war.

13. The year after wherein Callistratus was Archon, began the Phocian or Sacred War (as it was called) in Greece, which arose upon this occasion. The Lacedæmonians after their overthrow in the battel of Leuctra, had been fined much money by the Council of the Amphyſtiones, to the use of the Thebans, for seizing upon Cadmea their Citadel, which was exacted of them. The Phocians also having plowed up a great piece of the ground belonging to the Temple at Delphos and called Cyrrhea, were also fined by the same Common-council of Greece, many Talents. This Decree being confirmed by all the Græcians, and about to be executed by seizing on their grounds, Philomelus a man of principal note amongst them told them the Decree was unjust, and perswaded them by force to rescind it, for that they had advantage enough so to do, because the Oracle it self was once in their possession, and citation, citing to that purpose two Verses out of the second Book of the Iliads of Homer. He perswaded them therefore to get it again into their hands, promising, if they would give him power, to do it, and all other things for their profit and honour. They made him General, with full power according to his desire, who straight went to Sparta, where he pressed also the injustice of the Amphyſtiones towards that State about their fine, and shewing how it also concernd them to have the sentence of the Council nulled, he perswaded Archidamus the King, to joyn with him. He supplied him with money, wherewith raising Soldiers he invaded the Temple, and bearing back the Locrians that came to oppose him, with great slaughter, pulled the Decrees of the Council from the pillars, and brake in pieces the tables wherein were registred the names of the condemned. He caused it to be told abroad, that he neither intended to rob the Temple, nor to have any other dishonest intention; but the Bœotians not believing him, in their General Council decreed, that the Temple was to be recovered, and gave order for levies for the same purpose. Philomelus in the mean time fortified the place, and made all possible provision for defence. He invaded the Locrians, who killing some of his men, refused to restore the bodies, alleging the Law, that all sacrilegious persons ought to be cast out unburied: but he on purpose ingiged with them in another Skirmish, and with some of theirs redeemed them formerly denied. Then forced he the Prophetesse to ascend the Tripas to give him advice concerning the Warre. She out of fear, told him he might do whatsoever he pleased.

14. The Temple of Apollo Pythius, and the Oracle at Delphos, one of the two chief Cities of Phocis (Elatea being reckoned with it) till made a Commonwealth of it self by the Lacedemonians, was of anient Original, as appeareth by the (a) Poets making Agamemnon before his Expedition to Troy, to have received answer from it. The place thereof was accounted the middle of all Greece, and also the navil of the whole World, a Fable being inventred (related by Pindar) that two Eagles (some say Crows) being sent out, the one from the East, and the other from the West by Jupiter, met here. The (b) Original of the Oracle is to be fetched from Goats, which feeding about that cave or hole (where afterwards the Temple was built) were seen to skip and utter voices unusual to others and themselves at other times, which the Herdsman perceiving, went thither himself, and was affected in like manner, withall foretelling things to come. This being blazed abroad, and many who flocked thither experiencing the same thing themselves, it came to be judged an Oracle. For a time one gave answer to another indifferently; but many were transported with the fury, and leaping down into the hole were utterly lost, so that it was judged best, to set apart one woman, who should attend constantly, and a certain Engine to be made, wherein standing safely over the place, she might give out the Oracle. This Engine having three feet, came thence to be called Tripas; the woman was named Pythia, from asking, saith Strabo, and the first of all others was called Pheemonoe. Virgins at first were onely destinated to this work, till one of them being ravished by Echecrates the Thessalian, women of about 50 years, but in the habit of Virgins were onely allowed of. The Temple in more anient times was very famous for the Oracle; for the sitting of the Amphyctiones, the Pythian Games, and the riches thereof; but in the time of Strabo it was decayed in reputation, being nothing so much accounted of, which we may gather from it's poverty, seeing by gifts it was not able to recover the wealth taken out of it in after times, as it did that which it enjoyed in the time of Homer, having been rifled before it was recruited again by the present of Cræsus, his Father Alyattes, the Italians, Sicilians, and others.

15. Philomelus sent to Athens, Lacedemon, and the other eminent Cities of Greece, to excuse himself, professing he onely intended the recovery of the Temple into the possession of his Country-men, and not with any desire or design to pillage the treasures, adding, that he should be alwayes ready to account for the money or gifts belonging thereto. He desired that if any out of ill will to the Phocians bare Arms against them, that they would enter into League with them, or at least to forbear all Hostility. The messengers effectually solliciting according to their instructions, brought the Athenians and Lacedemonians to enter into society, and to promise aid; but the Bœotians, with the Locrians and some others, thought the contrary, and resolved that the Temple was to be rescued. Philomelus seeing what kind of a brunt he must undergo, laboured all wayes to strengthen himself, for which purpose obtaining yet from the Treasures of the Temple, he took a great summe of money from the Citizens of Delpi, wherewith he hired Soldiers. Having got together a considerable force, he took the field, and overthrew the Locrians who made head against him. They then sent to Thebes requiring aid for Apolla and themselves, and the Bæotians thinking their demand to be just, desirous to shew their Devotion, and conceiving it to concern them that the Decrees of the Amphyctiones should not be nulled, sent to the Thessalians, and the rest of the Amphyctiones to joyn with them in this War against the Phocians. The Council meeting together, then Decreed, that War was to be made upon them, which caused great motions and factions throughout all Greece.

16. Some thought Religion bound them to relieve the God, and punish the Phocians as sacrilegious persons; but others inclined to defend them, according to their particular interests. The Bæotians, Locrians, Perrhæbæans, Dorians, Dolopians, Athamanians, Acæans, they of Periboris, the Magnetes, Ænians, and some others were for rescuing the Temple. With the Phocians stood the Athenians, Lacedæmonians, and some others of Peloponnesus, whereof the Lacedæmonians were now more than before concerned, for not having paid their Fine imposed on them by the Amphyctiones within the time limited, at the last sitting they were Fined 1000 Talents more. This made them desire that the Decrees of the Council should be invalid, as well as the Phocians, and being unwilling to contract the Odium of making War in their own name upon that account, they were glad to do it as it were in the name of the other, endeavouring withall to get the Temple into their own hands. Philomelus, when there came certain intelligence that the Thebans would invade them with a strong Army, to furnish himself with mercenaries, seized upon the Treasury of the Temple: then offering half as much more wages as formerly, he had multitudes offered themselves to the service. With 10000 he invaded the Locrians, who being assisted with the Bæotians opposed him, and having the worst of it, afterwards taking some of his men as they were gathering forage, put them to death as sacrilegious persons condemned by the Amphyctiones. This the Phocians complaining of, procured of their General, that to stop such proceedings for the time to come, he should punish such prisoners as he took in the same kind. After this the Armies removed into other parts of the Countrey, where ingaging in Woody and difficult places of passage, the Phocians were overmatched with the number of their Enemies, and being put to flight, Philomelus, after he had omitted nothing worthy of a Captain, for fear he should come into the power of his Enemies, leaped down a Rock, and perished with the fall. With Diodorus consenteth (a) Pausanias as to the kind of his death, though (b) Justin writeth him to have been slain in the beginning of the fight.

17. Onomarchus his Colleague taking upon him the Office of General after his death, gathering up the reliques of the Army, therewith retreated home, and the Bæotians rejoycing they had wrought the destruction of so infamous a man, returned into their own Countrey, hoping his hap would deter others from the like Enterprize. But the Phocians (being perswaded by Onomarchus, who himself had also been Fined by the Amphyctiones, and therefore for his own ends stirred them up to continue the War) resolved to perfect if possible what was begun, and to that purpose created him General. He as his Predecessor had done, with large pay allured many unto him, corrupted the Thessalians to quit the society of the Bæotians, and invading the Territories of the Enemy took Thronium, forced the Amphissians to submit, and wasted the grounds of the Dorians; he took Orchomenus in Bæotia; but besieging Cheronea was worsted by the Thebans, and forced to retreat. At this time the Thebans, though deserted by the Thessalians, sent over forces into Asia to Artabazus, who had revolted from the King, and now began to decline after Chares the Athenian had left him. The War was renewed betwixt the Argives and the Lacedæmonians who had the better in a battel fought having restored the Thebans to liberty by taking away the yoke of the Phœrean Tyrants (which bound them ever after very fast to him and his son) went towards the Pyle, or Streights, to make War upon the Phocians; but the Athenians hindring his passage, thence he returned with great honour into his own Kingdom.

Strife betwixt the Lacedæmonians and Me-galopolitans.

20. Whilest these things were adoin, the Lacedæmonians being at Enmity with the Inhabitants of Megalopolis, sent Archidamus their King to invade them, who being too weak for them of themselves, desired aid of their friends. The Argives, Sicyonians, and Messenians helped them with their whole strength, and the Thebans sent them 4000 foot and 500 horse. The Lacedæmonians had 3000 foot from the Phocians, and 150 horse from Lycophron and Pisicholus, by the assistance of which forces they took Ornea, a Citie of Argolis, before their Enemies could come to relieve it. The Thebans afterwards coming down, a battel was fought with equal successe, after which the Argives departed to their severall homes, and the Lacedæmonians invading Arcadia, took, and plundred Elissus, and returned unto Sparta. After some time the Thebans had the better of it at Telphussa, and after that in two battels more, wherein they killed many of their Enemies; but then again the Lacedæmonians by a notable victory recovered their credit, and the Armies returning home, a Truce was made betwixt them and the Megalopolitans. This was done whilest Phalacrus in Bœotia took Cheroieda, and presently lost it again to the Thebans, who then with a numerous Army entred, and wasted Phocis, and then having taken some inconsiderable places with much booty they returned into Bœotia.

21. The next year the Thebans being spent with the Phocian War, sent to Oebus the Persian King to desire a supply of money from him; who without any difficulty, or delay, bestowed on them 300 Talents. No memorable thing passed betwixt the Phocians and them this year, which was spent in skirmishes and mutual depredations. Two years after (a) Philip cast out again Pisicholus the Tyrant, who had seized upon Phœra, and setting upon the Citie of Thrace which belonged to Chalcis, took by storm the Castle Zeira, which he demolished, & forced other Towns to submit to his yoke, (b) though, upon desire of the Chalcidians, Charidemus had been sent from the Athenians to help them, then lying in the Hellepont. The (c) year following wherein was solemnized the 108th Olympiad, whereof Polycles the Cyrenæan was Victor, having great designs in his mind, he hastened to get into his hands the Citie of the Hellepont, and without any strokes got Micylone and Terrone by treachery to be delivered up to him. Now he quarrelled with the Olynthians (because his affairs were improved by successe) whom before he courted as fearing their power, which had been ever too much for his predecessors. 'Tis said he pretended a quarrel because they received his two half brothers, whom after he had taken in the Town he murdered; all things being lawfull to him now that might any way serve his turn, all his affections and passions being swallowed up in his ambition, which made him not stick to break faith himself, and by his Gold to tempt others to do it. He thought it to no purpose to practise the winning of Olynthus, till he had first inclosed all their power within the Walls, and therefore he first overthrew them in two battels, and then besieged the Citie, which attempting with many assaults and great losse of men, at length it was betrayed into his hands by Eubycrates and Lasthenes the chief Magistrates, whom he had corrupted with money. He sackt it, and sold the Inhabitants with the rest of the plunder, whereby he much enriched himself, and was enabled to buy in Citie which he dayly did, having been advised by the Oracle at the beginning of his undertaking, to make his assaults with silver spears; insomuch that he boasted that his Kingdom was more increased by Gold than Arms.

Philip getteth
Olynthus.

22. The Athenians being sensible of his inroachments, jealous of his growing power, and warily providing for the liberty of Greece, supplied, as they might, such as he fell upon with war, and now sent up & down to the Citie to desire them to value their liberty, & punish capitally such as were treacherous amongst amongst them, promising them their alliance and utmost assistance, in this work. And now at length by the special advice of Demosthenes (the greatest Wit and Orator of Greece) they openly declared themselves his Enemies, and undertook the quarrel. But so far were the spirits of the Greeks degenerated, that this endeavour of theirs could not counterwork the efficacy of his Gold, so that having a mind to take a Town that was strongly fortified, and one of the place telling him it could not be done, he asked him if he thought it not possible for his Gold to get over the walls. He had in all the Cities up and down his instruments and secret workers, who sought for a little gain to undermine the fortune of their own Country. After the taking of Olynthus, he celebrated the Olympick Games, and feasted all Comers; and entertaining them with great magnificence, by this cunning ingaged many to betray their Faith.

23. The following year the Bæotians and Phocians mutually preyed upon each other, and several Skirmishes hapned betwixt them, which produced no great losse on either side. But Phalacrus the Phocian General, being accused to have stolen the sacred money, was put out of his place, and three Generals substituted in his room, Democrates, Callias, and Sophanes, who were to make inquisition about the money which was stolen, and call the Trustees who had the management thereof to account. The chief of the Trustees was Philo, who being not able to give an account, was racked, and confessed many of his fellow thieves. They had taken out of the Temple 4000 talents of gold after the rate of silver, and above 6000 talents of Silver of such presents as Cæsus and others had sent: and there wanted not some who affirmed as much to have been rifled out of this Temple, as Alexander afterwards found in the treasures of the Persians. Phalacrus was about to search in the pavement for treasure, hinted at by Homer; but when the Soldiers came to dig near to the Tripod, such Earthquakes hapned, as deterred them from proceeding any further. The Phocians assisted with these riches carried on the War, and by this time had got into their hand three strong places in Bæotia; Orchomennus, Cheronea, and Gorsias. The Bæotians being much pressed herewith, having lost very many men, and wanting money, sent Ambassadors to the King of Macedonia for aid. Philip was very glad to find them in so weak a condition, desiring to abate that Spirit which they had got at the battel at Leutra, yet he sent them a considerable number of men, because he would not seem to be wanting to so religious a cause, as vindicating the right of the Oracle. At this time the Phocians building a Castle near Aba, were fallen upon by the Bæotians, and shifting for themselves into the neighbouring Towns, 500 of them stepped by into a Chapel of Apollo near Aba. Fire being left in their tents, seized upon some straw there, whence a great flame arising, caught hold at length of the Chapel, and therein burnt alive those that had fled thither, for an example (as Diodorus accounteth it) to all sacrilegious persons.

24. Philip being now employed in the War of Thrace, which was to the great damage of the Athenians, to lull them asleep, promised he would enter into a straight league and alliance with them, and pretending fair things, so corrupted some of the chief Orators, (a) (Æschines accuseth Demosthenes, and (b) Demosthenes layeth the load upon Æschines) that a peace was made up which continued seven years. (c) Demosthenes advised them to send away their Ambassadors to Philip with all speed, to ratifie the League, lest he delaying the matter according to his custom, should still proceed to incommode their affaires. Accordingly five Ambassadors were dispatched away, whereof one was Æschines; but coming into Macedonia, they were there forced to stay till Philip had settled all things in Thrace, according to his own pleasure, and passed through the Pyla or Straights into Phocis. The Athenians hearing of his coming, notwithstanding the place, were in great fear, and caused all their goods to be brought into the City. The Thessalians and Bæotians earnestly now desired of him that he would undertake the conduct of all Greece against the Phocians; and on the other side the Am-balladors of the Phocian, Lacedæmonian, and Athenian, earnestly dehorred him from the War. He hearing both sides, being accustomed to double dealing, promised them he would do as all had desired, and to making them secure hereby, seized upon the Straights of Thermopylæ.

25. The Phocians having sent to Lacedæmon for aid, procured 1000 Footmen of heavy Armour, which were commanded by Archimachus. Philip in conjunction with the Thessalians with a strong Army went down into Locrus, where finding Phalaecus restored to his Generalship, he hastened to decide the controversy by action, but the other lying at Nice, and perceiving himself too weak to fight, sent to treat with him, and they agreed that he should have freedom to depart with his men whither he pleased. Faith being given and received, he departed with his Mercenaries to the number of 8000 into Peioponnesus, and the Phocians being thus deserted, were forced to yield. So the War was ended by Philip without a stroke, in the tenth year after the beginning thereof, in the third year of the 108 Olympiad, according to Dio-dorus, when Archias was Archon; but as * Pausan as writeth, in the first of

26. Philip calling a Council of the Bæotians and Thessalians, it was resolved to remit the matter of the Phocians wholly to the judgment and sentence of the Amphyktiones. They decreed that Philip as a reward for his good service should be enrolled in the number of themselves, and have the double voice which the Phocians formerly had. That the Phocians should be debarred from the Temple. That they should neither have Horse nor Arms till such time as they had repayed the money which they had stolen from Apollo. All their Exiles and as many as were guilty of Sacrilege in their own persons should be accounted piacular, and it might be lawful to take them out of any place. All their Cities were to be levelled with the ground, and they reduced into Villages, not exceeding the number of Fifty little Families apiece, and distant a furlong one from another. They were to pay to the Temple a yearly tribute of Sixty talents, till the money stolen was made up. But from this punishment, Pausanias telleth us the Abæans were excepted, who alone had not contaminated themselves. The Council then took order for restoring of the Oracle, and for the establishment of peace in Greece; and Philip having confirmed their Decrees, embracing them all with singular kind-nesse, returned into his own Kingdom, flourishing with great glory both upon the account of Piety and Martial matters. This Expedition made not a little for the enlargement of his Empire, and the improvement of his design already hid, to procure himself to be chosen Captain General of Greece, and to make War upon the Persians.

27. Two years after, and in the 17 of his reign, he invaded the Illyrians his old Enemies with a potent Army, took therein many Towns, wasted the Country, and with rich booty returned into Macedonia. Then went he into Thessalie, where casting out the Tyrants out of the Cities, he much won upon the People, having a design hereby to make use of their favour, as a decoy to bring in the affections of the rest. And it failed not; for their neighbours led by their example, very readily entred into League with him. The year after he prosecuted this design to a further advantage, for Kerjobleptes the King of the Thracians much distressing the Greek Cities in Thrace, he exhorteth them to joyn together, and with a strong force going against him overthrew the Thracians in several battels, and forced them to pay the rents of their Lands to the Kingdom of Macedonia. He built Forts in such places as were convenient for the bridling of their power, whereby the Cities being delivered now from their fear, most gladly embraced his alliance and society.
 The year after this, Arymbas King of the Molossians died, who left a Son named Æacides, the Father of Pyrrhus, but Philip deprived him of the Kingdom, and gave it to Alexander the brother of his wife Olympias. * Another saith, that he deprived Arymbas yet alive, and expelling him the Kingdom settled Alexander therein.

City, situate upon the shore of the Propontis, the Inhabitants whereof in favour of the Athenians crossed his designs. With his utmost might, he fell upon it, continuing the storm without intermission, by fresh men sent in the place of the dead or wounded: he built Turrets higher than theirs, and with battering rams and mines brake down a part of the wall. But the defendants being relieved from Byzantium, manfully resisted, and built a stronger wall in the room of that which was thrown down. By this means the Siege being drawn on in length, and great talk being in Alexandria of the power of the Macedonian, Ochus the Persian King being now jealous of his power, thought it wisdom to ballance him, and for that purpose gave order to his Satrapæ upon the Sea Coasts to assist the Perinthians. They uniting their Forces together, gave them their utmost assistance, which with the natural strength of the place enabled them to stand it out. For it was seated upon the cliff of a Peninsula about a furlong in length, the houses were thick and high, rising one rank above another, according to the ascent of the hill, so that the whole Town represented the form of a Theatre. Hereby, though the wall was battered down, yet stopping the ends of the streets, their defence was little diminished, which Philip perceiving, and how all things necessary for the War were abundantly supplied from Byzantium, he left a strong party under expert Captains to carry on the Siege, and with the rest of the Army halted against that City, the inhabitants whereof having sent their men and arms to the Perinthians, were thereby much straightened.

29. By this time the grudges betwixt Philip and the Athenians were so heightened, that now the peace was held as broken on both sides. Phocion the Athenian was sent against Clearchus the Tyrant of Eretria, who was made by Philip, and cast him out, being by (a) Plutarch called Plutarch. (b) They sent aid also to the Byzantians, at the perswasion of (c) Demosthenes, contained in the fourth Oration of his Philippicks. With them joyned the Chians, Coans, Rhodians, and other Greeks, which so terrified Philip, as he was glad for the present to yield to necessity, and made a peace with them. For Demosthenes having persvaded his Citizens forgetting all committed in the Social War, to send relief to the Byzantians and Perinthians, and he himself being sent Ambassador to the Cities, wrought so effectually with them, that besides their ordinary Militia, they raised 15000 Foot, and 2000 Horse, and liberally contributed money for their pay; at which time the Associates desiring that the sum of the tax might be set, Crobylus the Orator said, that War had no set rate of allowance. At this time (d) Areas King of Scythia being invaded by the Istrians, sent to Philip for aid, promising him succession in his Kingdom; which being sent whenas the Istrians retreated, he also sent back the Macedonians, and recalled his promise concerning the succession. Philip hereupon demanded money to pay the men, but he also refusing it upon pretence of poverty, raised his Siege from Byzantium to go against him, and sent messengers before to let the Scythians know he had vowed to set up to Hercules a Statue upon the bank of Ister, and to desire peaceable access and recess for that purpose. He answered, that if he pleased to send the Statue it should be erected, but refused to give leave for him to enter his borders with an Army, saying, that if he set it up by force, he would pull it down after his departure, and turn the Brasse thereof into heads of Arrows. Philip entering Scythia, a battle was fought, wherein he overcame them by craft, who in courage exceeded, and took 20000 women and children, with multitudes of cattel, but neither Gold nor Silver. Twenty thousand Mares of the choicest were sent into Macedonia to breed. As Philip returned, the Triballi opposed themselves, refusing to give him passage except he would part with some of his booty. He disdainng the thing, forced his passage, but received such a wound in his thigh, that through it his Horse was killed under him, and being taken up for dead, so little care was had of the prey, that it was left. Isocrates the Orator taking occasion at this disaster, fought by his second Epistle to draw his mind to a peaceable inclination; but to no purpose.

SECT. 5.

30. Two years after, having drawn most of the Græcians into society with him, he longed after the Empire of all Greece, in his way to which the Athenians onely seemed the main obstacle. He resolved now to daunt them, and obtain his purpose, and for that end seized first upon Elatea a Citie of Phocæ, and calling his forces thither resolved speedily to make War upon them, hoping his work would be the lesse, because he should take them altogether unprepared, and secure upon the account of the peace. The Athenians exceedingly struck hereat for some time stood mute, after they were met together, being come of their own accord, for that the Magistrates caused an Allarm to be sounded all the night after they received the news. At length all their eyes were turned upon Demosthenes, who perswaded them to send to the Bæotians to desire their assistance in the vindication of the liberty of Greece, and being sent himself by his Oratory perswaded them to it, though they held themselves upon the account of the Phocian War obliged to Philip. The Athenians were encouraged by this accession of the Bæotians, which doubled their force, and dispatched their Army under the conduct of Chares and Lyficles towards Charonea in Bæotia, all of flourishing age willingly giving their names to the expedition, and the Bæotians admiring their readinesse hastened also themselves, and joyning to them expected the coming of the Enemy. He sent his Ambassadors to the Council, one whereof was Pytho an eloquent man, to withdraw them from the Athenians, but prevailing not, he notwithstanding resolved to fight them both, and with an Army of 30000 foot, and 2000 horse invaded Bæotia. He overmarched his Enemies as well in skill as numbers, all the Athenian Captains of note being now dead, and Chares Chief, who was nothing better for conduct than an ordinary Soldier. A cruel and bloody fight was fought with great animosity on both sides, and with equal successe, till Alexander, Philip's son, first made his Enemies give ground in his Wing, and then his father had the same successe in the other, and obtained the victory. Of the Athenians above 1000 fell, 2000 were taken, and of the Bæotians a great number. Demosthenes being in the battel made his actions far disagreeable to his words, and cowardly with the first casting away his Arms (though Good fortune was ingraven upon his shield) ran away.

31. Together with this battel was lost the liberty of Greece, and in effect the ancient glory thereof here had its period, being never able to recover its power, and first enslaved by one, and then another for ever after. (a) Isocrates the Athenian Orator was so sensible of the advantage Philip had got, that being ignorant how he would improve the opportunity, and resolved not to see Athens besieged the fourth time, killed himself by abstaining from all sustenance four dayes, aged 98 years. (b) Presently after the victory, Philip carouzed for joy, and walking amongst the Captives upbraided the badnesse of their condition, when Demades the Athenian Orator took him short, asking him, if he who had obtained the fortune of Agamemnon shamed not to act the part of Thersites? with the wit of which castigation he was so struck, that he cast off the former countenance, imbraced the author of it with singular kindnesse, with him gave liberty to all the Athenian prisoners, and forgetting his pride, made a League and Alliance with that Commonwealth. (c) He is also reported to have appointed a Boy every morning to bear this into his Ear, that He was a man. He was a great Master of his affections indeed. He was never passionate to his disadvantage, and upon this account, to procure that with more ease which he had long designed, he might thus gratifie the Athenians, whose interest in the other Estates being the same with the Common of all Greece, he might be unwilling to force them to the utmost. But he placed a Garrison of his own in Thebes; and Justin writeth, how he sold for slaves all the prisoners of that Citie, and the bodies of such as had been slain to their friends for burial: that of the chiefeft of the Citizens some he put to death, and confiscated the goods of the rest, being sufficiently sensible of their ingratitude. 32. (a) Philip by his succeſſe having utterly broken the courage of the principal Cities of Greece, now gave out that he would undertake a War against the Persian for the general commodity all the eſtates, and thereby, and with his great courteſie, gained much upon ſome ſorts of people. At length he called them together at Corinth, and largely diſcourſing of the War, ſhewed the certain hope of ſucceſſe, and earneſtly exhorted them to undertake it; to which all either out of love or fear aſſented. He was choſen Captain General for the expedition, allowance of men and money were appointed to the ſeveral Cities, the (b) Lacedamonians alone ſcorniſh both him, and the conditions of his peace, accounting that ſlavery, and not peace, which was impoſed by the Conquerour. The Auxiliaries of Greece amounted to 200000 foot, and 15000 horſe, over and above the forces of Macedonia, and the barbarous Nations thereto adjoyning. Whileſt he thus prospered in his affairs abroad, (c) great differences aroſe in his own houſe by his putting away Olympias upon pretence of incontinency, and marrying Cleopatra the Niece of Attalus. Olympias a woman of an high ſpirit, and melancholick nature, took it exceedingly to heart, & incenſed all ſhe could her ſon Alexander, who at the Wedding hearing Attalus in his Cups to exhort the Macedonians to pray for a lawfull Heir of the Kingdom from Philip and Cleopatra, calling him naughty fellow, asked him if he counted him a Baſtard, and therewith threw a Cup at him. Philip hereupon with his drawn Sword made at Alexander, but to the good of both, being light headed with Wine, and mad with anger, ſtumbled and fell. After this Alexander carried his mother into Epirus, and went himſelf into Illyricum, whence his father ſhortly recalled him by the procurement of Demetrius the Corinthian. Not long after Pexodarus the Governour of Caria ſent to offer his eldeſt daughter in marriage to Arideus the baſe ſon of Philip, whence great talk being raiſed that Philip did it on purpoſe to devolve the Crown upon Arideus, Alexander ſent one Theſſalus a player to Pexodarus, to perſwade him to neglect a Baſtard and a Fool, and transfer his affinity upon himſelf, which was very well liked by Pexodarus. Philip ſmelling out the matter, checked Alexander grievouſly, as degenerate, and unworthy of the hope of a Kingdom, being ambitious to become ſon-in-law to a Carian, who was no better than a ſlave to a barbarian King.

33. The next Spring having enquired of the Oracle concerning the ſucceſſe of the Persian War (which gave him answer as ambiguous, and to the ſame purpoſe as formerly to Craſus) he ſent three Captains over into Aſia under pretence of ſetting the Greek Cities at liberty; Attalus, Parmenio, and Amyntas. He himſelf, whileſt the forces were gathering together, made a magnificent ſacrifice to the gods, and celebrated the marriage of his daughter Cleopatra with her Uncle Alexander of Epirus, to which he invited all that would, and gave large entertainment, being willing to ſhow to the Gracians how thankfully he took their making him General of all Greece. Feaſting and Muſick there was in abundance, and the Feaſt being done for that day (but all the ſolemnity to be renewed on the next) whileſt it was yet night all the people ran together into the Theatre. Thither were carried twelve Images of his gods in ſolemn proceſſion, and his own next after in a Divine habit, as arrogating to himſelf a place in the Council of the gods. Then followed he himſelf apparelled in a white Roab in the midſt of the two Alexanders, his ſon, and ſon-in-law. As he thus proceeded in the ruff of his pride, the people ſending up loud acclamations to the ſkies, and Echoing his felicity, one Pauſanias met him in the ſtraighteſt place of his paſſage, and ſtabbed him into the ſide, the wound being ſo mortal that he fell

This Pausanias having been invited to a Feast by Attalus, had been carnally abused by him after he was drunk, and then prostituted to the filthy lust of base fellows, for which having complained to the King, partly because of their affinity, and because Philip intended to use him in the War, he could have no satisfaction, and for this cause took this revenge upon his unjust judge; yet Alexander objected to Darius that his father was made away by his procurement.

34. The murderer having mounted on horse-back had got away whilst the tumult was about the body, but that his shoe catching hold on a Vine he was thereby pulled down, and then slain by Perdiccas and others. This end had Philip after he had reigned 24 years, and lived 46. to which Olympias is reported by some to have contributed, by encouraging Pausanias to commit the fact, and neither knew they how to clear Alexander of the matter. She put a Golden Crown upon Pausanias his head as he hung on the Cross, and a few days after burnt his body upon the Reliques of her husband, and built him a Monument in the same place, and caused a yearly parentation to be made to him. After this having killed Cleopatra's young son in her bosom, she then hanged her, or as one saith, fried them both to death in a brazen Vessel, and consecrated the sword wherewith Philip was slain to Apollo, under the name of Myrtalis, by which she was called when young. The foundation of a great Empire was laid by Philip, and a great pattern left unto his son, which to make, was far more hard than what with greater glory was achieved by Alexander. The recovery of Macedon when there were two Competitors that had such assistants, was a work of much prudence and dexterity. The regaining of such places as were lost to the Illyrians and Olynthians, with the overthrow of the neighbouring Kings, and the State of Olynthus, were such things as would have seemed too difficult for many ages to his predecessors. The matters achieved by him required both Mars and Mercury for assistants, and therein he bred so many choise Commanders, as for their skill and valour being worthy to wear Crowns; He seemeth most to deserve that glory which his son by the influence of his abilities afterwards attained.

His great achievements.]

35. Alexander his son succeeded him, aged about twenty years, in the first of the 111th Olympiad, wherein Cleomantes was Victor, Pythodorus being Archon, in the first of the reign of Darius Codomannus, and the year of the World 3669. being by the father's side descended of Hercules, and the mother's from Achilles, neither of which lines he disgraced by the course of his fortunes. Of a great and lofty spirit he was from a Child, easie to be persuaded, but hard to be compelled. His father apprehending his wit, procured Aristotle to be his School-master, offering him very large rewards, whose Native Citie Stagera being before by him demolished, he re-edified for his sake. By such a Master he was not onely instructed in morality, but had some insight into the more abstruse Sciences, and seemed to have some skill in Physick, being wont to give directions to his friends about their health. Being sixteen years old, Philip undertaking an expedition against the Byzantians, left him his Deputy in Macedonia, where improving his time, he subdued the Medeans who had revolted, and taking that Citie, planted it with new Inhabitants, and called it after himself Alexandropolis. At the battel of Cheronea he behaved himself very stoutly, which with other his good parts drew great love upon him from his father (insomuch as he willingly suffered the Macedonians to call him King, and himself General) but Philip's mind towards his later end being withdrawn from his mother and fastned upon Cleopatra, thereupon ensued great dissatisfaction on both sides, whilst his mother stirred him to great indignation, insomuch as he escaped not suspicion of being privy to her designs against his father's life.

Alexander succeeded him.

36. Yet began he his reign with justice against such as had an hand in the murder, killing them upon his Grave, and blamed his mother that in his absence she had dealt so cruelly with Cleopatra. He renewed the discipline of War, and gained the affections of the Army; knowing also that Attalus upon the account of his Niece Cleopatra, lay at all advantages to do him mischief, he sent Hecateus with a band of men with order to attack him and send him over alive if possible, or else to kill him one way or other, which was at length effected. In the mean time Demosthenes having had secret intelligence of Philip's death, went to the people, and pretending to have dreamt it, stirred up the Athenians all wayes possible to contemn the youth of Alexander, and not to suffer him to obtain the Principality of Greece, and to this purpose they sent unto Attalus, and entered into conspiracy with him, how they might best effect it. The Ætolians intended to restore the Exiles of the Acarnerians banished by Philip. The Ambraciots expelled the Garrison there, and the Thebans decreed to do the same by that in Cadmea. As the Arcadians had refused to consent that the Father should be General of Greece, so were they now nothing better inclined towards the Son, and the rest of the Peloponnesians, as the Argives, Eleans, and Lacedæmonians were ready to do any thing for the asserting of their own liberty and power. The Nations about Macedonia began to stir, being altogether inclining to renounce their obedience.

His difficulties in Greece,

Which he overcometh.

37. Alexander as an earnest of his future successe easily removed those obstacles, reducing some by entreaty and good words, others by awe, and some by force of Arms. He first obtained of the Theffalians by a publick Decree to be owned as his Fathers Successor in the Generallship, and then easily bringing the neighbouring People to do the same, passing the Pyla, called the Council of the Amphyktionians, and procured by their suffrages to be elected the Captain General of all Greece. Having done this, to bring over the rest by fear, he led down his Army into Bæotia, where pitching his tents by Cadmea he affrighted the Thebans and the Athenians also so much, that they getting in all their goods to the City, and fortifying it as well as they might, they sent to beg his pardon, that they had owned him no sooner. One of the Ambassadors was Demosthenes, who came not with the rest to Alexander, but returned back when he was come on his way, either for that he stood in fear of him for the Orations made against his Father, or because he would not crack his credit with the Persian King, from whom Æschines accused him to have received much money. He answered the Ambassadors to their satisfaction, and then sent for the Deputies of the Estates to meet him at Corinth, where speaking very courteously to them, he was again declared General against the Persian, and aid decreed to him for carrying on the War; after which he returned into Macedonia. Whilst he here was in the Isthmus, many Philosophers came to salute him; * onely Diogenes the Sinopian made no reckoning of him. The King understanding this, vvent to visit him then at Athens, and finding him sunning himself in his tub, saluted him kindly, and desired him, to ask any thing of him vvhathsoever he pleased. He onely desired him to stand out of the Sun, vvhich greatnesse of mind Alexander so much admired, that vvhhen his follovers laughed and jeered at the man, he answered, that If he were not Alexander, he would be Diogenes.

But the Thebans fall upon his Garrison in Cadmea.

38. In the beginning of the Spring he made an Expedition into Thrace, vvhether he subdued several People, and afterwards prospered in the same manner in Pæonia and Illyria. In the mean time came intelligence, that many of the Greeks had a design to revolt, and not a few Cities, amongst which Thebes was most eminent, and had renounced his authority. Hereupon he returned into Macedonia; the Thebans in the mean while besieging his Garrison in Cadmea, which, being supplied with Arms by Demosthenes, they fell upon and slew many. They implored the assistance of the Argives, Eleans, Arcadians, and Athenians. The Athenians were perswaded by De- mosthenes to send them aid, who reigning in the Assemblies by the power of his tongue, wrote also to the Kings Captains in Asia, thence to oppose Alexander, whom he called a boy and a fool. But Alexander marching with speed into Boeotia, the valour of the Athenians well abraded, and Demosthenes himself grew very cool. The Thebans uncertain what their allies would do, and surpris'd with the Kings coming, called a Council of Officers to consult what should be done, where it was resolv'd to fight for their liberty, and this was confirm'd by the People, which with great alacrity prepared for resistance, though they might have had good terms of Alexander. Who delay'd also to do any thing, that they might have time to advise; for his mind being fully intent upon the Persian War, he would gladly have been rid of all trouble on this side of the Seas. But when he saw their wilfulness, he fully resolv'd to make this City a terror to the rest. Yet he first offer'd indemnity to all such as would come over to him, which they to cross, out of emulation, caused to be proclaimed from an high Tower, that if there were any who had a desire to joyn with the great King and the Thebans in vindicating the liberty of Greece, and suppressing the Tyrant thereof, they should repair unto them.

39. Then fell he with all his might and skill upon the City, which they as stoutly defended, knowing else what would follow, and encouraging themselves with their former successes at Leuctra and Mantineia, they made resistance to the wonder and discouragement of their Enemies; till at length Alexander perceiving a little dore to be left unguarded, sent Perdiccas thither with a party, who breaking into the City made way for the rest of the Macædonians. Now were the Thebans on one side by them, and the other by the Garrison in Cadmea (which like a tempest fell upon them) cut in pieces, the Law of War not being allowed them, because of that Proclamation they had made from the Tower. The Græcians also that served under Alexander, as the Phocians, Thespians, Plataeans, Orchomenians, and others, bearing them malice, spared them no more, so that great slaughter was made, they fighting it out to the last, having no other regard to their lives than this, to sell them at as dear a rate as possible. There were slain 6000 (Ælian* by some mistake hath 90000) and 30000 were taken captives. Alexander having buried all his slain (to the number of 500) assembled a Council of the Græcians, to which he referred what should be done with the Thebans. There their Enemies urg'd against them, that they had conspired with the Barbarians against the Græcians, in the time of Xerxes, had fought amongst other allies of Persia against Greece, and since that been acknowledged and rewarded by his Successors as well deserving of them. By these things they so incensed the Council, as to decree the City to be levelled with the ground, the Captives to be kill'd, and such as had fled to be sought for and brought to punishment. The King acquiescing in this severe sentence, executed it accordingly, selling all he had taken, except the Priests and those that had entertained his Father when he was young, and their kindred, with the posterity of Pindar the Poet, whose house alone he left standing. This famous City then was demolished the last day of the Eleusinian Solemnities then celebrated by the Athenians, the twentieth day of the month Boedromion, after it had continued in a serled condition almost 800 years.

40. Alexander publishing an Edict, whereby all Græcians were forbidden to receive the Theban Exiles, the Athenians alone refused to obey it, setting open their gates to them, being then celebrating the mysteries of Ceres. Hereat he was enraged, and when they had sent to deprecate his indignation the second time, forgave them only on this condition: to give up to him the ten (Plutarch nameth but eight) Orators who had stirr'd them up against him, and the principal whereof were Demosthenes and Lycurgus. The People hereupon not knowing how to demean themselves, Phocion the Good, who went ever cross to Demosthenes in managing State affaires, made a Speech, wherein he would have perswaded the Orators to kill themselves like good Citizens, rather than to bring their Country into danger; but the People ill-renting this, expelled him in a tumult. At length Demades the Orator being hired by Demasthenes with five talents, persuaded the People to mercy, and so framed an answer to the King, that it should signifie their readiness to punish them if they should find them worthy thereof. They sent him then to Alexander, with order, not onely to take up this matter, but also to enterecede for the Libean Exiles, and obtain leave for them to receive them. This he did by the power of his persuasions, saith Diodorus, although Plutarch saith it was done by Phocion, who after Alexander had cast away from him the former Decree, and rejected the messengers, was kindly received by him, after the King had understood that his Father respected him. He not onely admitted of his request but his counsel also: that if he loved an idle life he should lay aside all thoughts of War, but if he thirsted after glory he should transfer his Armies from the Greeks to the Barbarians. Justin writeth, that he gave them leave to keep their Orators, but forced them to banish their Captains, who going over to Darius much incommoded his affaires beyond the Seas. Arrianus onely mentioneth Charidemus to have fled to the Persians.

41. Alexander returned into Macedonia with his Army, where consulting about the Persian War, Antipater and Parmenio his choicest Warriours advised him first to marry, and beget children, and then to undertake the Expedition after he was provided of Heirs. But he being of a most quick and active spirit, and impatient of delay, would not hear of any such thing, seeing as he said, he was now created General of Greece, and had such Forces left him by his Father. After then he had by proposing the commodities of such an undertaking, inflamed the minds of his Soldiers with a desire thereof, he sacrificed to his gods, and solemnized the playes to Jupiter, formerly instituted by Archelaus his Predecessor. The solemnity continued nine dayes, one being allotted to each of the Muses, during which in his Royal Pavilion which had twenty beds to eat on, he feasted the officers of his Army, and the Ambassadors of the Cities. In the Spring, all things being now ready, he marched with his Forces towards the Hellepont. They who account the least, saith Plutarch, reckon 30000 Foot, and 5000 Horse, and who the most 34000 of them and 4000 of these. For the maintenance of such an Army Aristobulus wrote that he had no more than 70 talents. Darius said he had provision but for thirty dayes, and Onesicritus delivered, that he ought besides this 200 talents. And though he was thus slenderly furnished, yet before his journey making inspection into the estates of his friends, to one he assigned a Village, to another a piece of ground, to this a certain rent, and to that the Customs of such a port. When he had almost distributed all he had, Perdiccas asked him what he left for himself, and he answered Hope; then replied the other, That shall be common to us with thee, and refused to receive any thing, which was followed by many; but such as would be willingly gratified, and thereby passed away most of the revenues of Macedonia. He passed over his men in 60 ships to Troas, and first of all cast his spear upon the shore, and skipping out, as it were, took possession of Asia, in the second year of his reign, and the second of Darius Codomannus, the third of the 111 Olympiad; Evmenus being Archon, and in the third moneth before his leaving of the Office, and the succession of Ctesicles, under whose Government Diodorus placeth this Expedition, A. 42. To Antipater he committed the Government of his affairs in Europe, with whom he left 12000 Foot, and 11500 Horse, as Diodorus hath it, if 1500 be not rather to be read. The Lacedamonians after his departure grudged his successe, and lay watching for an advantage how to begin a War, and if possible divert the course of his good fortune, which after the battel of Arbela they supposed to be firily presented. For the issue of that battel being reported in Greece, many of the Cities who where jealous of his power resolved to contend for their ancient liberty, before the strength of the Persians should be utterly spent, which they might have to their assistance. They were incouraged to revolt from tumults now raised in Thrace, For Memnon being being sent General thither, having Soldiers at his devotion, stirred up the Barbarians to rebel, and got together a great Army. Antipater hereupon was forced to march against him and leave Macedonia; the absence of whom the Lacedæmonians thinking a sufficient occasion of working some notable fear, excited the Græcians to agree together with united force to recover their liberty. The Athenians conceiving themselves engaged to Alexander, who had respected them above all others, refused to stir, but most of the Peloponnesians, and some others, gave their names willingly, and raised amongst them 20000 foot and 2000 horse, which were commanded by Agis the Spartan King. Antipater hearing this composed the matters of Thrace as he might, and with an Army of 40000 men raised out of the Confederates of Greece marched against them, and joyning battel, after much opposition slew 5300 with the losse of 3500 of his own men. Agis himself fighting most valiantly, after he had received many wounds was to be carried out of the fight and so to be conveyed home. But being encompassed with Enemies, and seeing there was no hope to escape, he bade his men shift for themselves, and reserve their lives for the further service of their Countrey: he on his knees received his Enemies as well as he could, till having first killed some of them, at length he was slain after he had been King nine years.

43. Antipater having obtained this victory, was willing to put an end to the War out of fear of envy, by seeming to proceed further than the modesty of a subject should require. For he knew the high spirit of Alexander, who rejoiced in the victory, but not in him being Victor, which he not obscurely grudged at, thinking so much to be detracted from his own glory as was added to that of another. The Lacedæmonians therefore being constrained to send to him, he remitted them for answer to the Council of Greece, which having heard what could be said on both sides, referred the whole matter to the Cognisance of Alexander. They then gave up to Antipater fifty Hostages, and sent into Asia to Alexander to beg pardon. Most of such learned men as were Eminent during this period have already, upon occasion, been spoken of.

CHAP. III.

The affairs of Sicilie during this Empire.

SECT. I.

The first Names and Inhabitants of this Island, with a relation of such things as preceded the Persian Empire.

1. SICILIE is an Island of the Mediterranean Sea, lying over against Italy at five miles distance; from which it is thought to have been severed by some Earth-quake, or the violence of the Sea, being joyned formerly by an Isthmus, or neck of Land, to the Continent.

The old In-
Sicilie.

2. It was first, from the Triangular Figure, called Trinacria, then Sicania, and afterwards obtained the name of Sicilie. The most ancient Inhabitants were Cyclopes, or Gyants with one onely eye in their foreheads (as the Poets fancied) and the *Lestrygon*es of the same Original. After them succeeded the Sicani, by some said to be indigena, or naturals of the place; but by others a people of Iberia, or Spain, and so named from Sicanus, a River in that Countrey, whence they were expelled by the Ligyes, and coming into the Island

Island Trinacria changed its name into Sicania. After these, the Siculi a people of Italie (so named saith Thucydides from Italus a King of Arcadia) being expelled by the Opici, passed into this Island, and overthrowing the Sicani seized upon the best parts of it, and gave it the name of Sicilie, almost 300 years before the Greeks found it out. When Ilium was taken, some Troians fled by ship from the Achaens into this Countrey, and fixing themselves near to the Sicani, were all called Elymi, whose principal seats were Eryx and Egesta. To these were added some of the Phoenicians, of those who in their return from Troy being driven by Tempest into Libya, or Africk, thence passed into Sicilie. The Phoenicians also inhabited all over the Island in the Maritime parts, and the little Islands near adjoyning, for the benefit of Traffick with the Siculi; But after that many Greeks arrived, they removed, and joyned themselves to the Elymi, and inhabited Mosya, Soluns, and Panormus, because thence was but a little passage unto Carthage. So many Barbarians, and after this manner, inhabited Sicilie saith Thucydides, with whom in the main of their relations, consent Diodorus, Strabo, Dionysius of Halycarnassus, Pausanias, Constantinus Porphyrogenneta and others.

A.M. 2821.

Lib. 6, ad initium.

3. The first Greeks that came into Sicilie (as Thucydides proceedeth) were some from Chalcis in Eubœa, who under conduct of Theocles planted Naxus. The year following Archias the Corinthian, descended from Hercules, drove the Siculi from that place where stood the Citie afterward called Syracuse. About the same time Lamis brought a Colony from Megara, which he first placed upon the River Pantacius, in a place called Troilus. In the 45 year after Syracuse began to be inhabited, Antiphermus from Rhodes, and Eurymus out of Crete; with their several Colonies planted Gela, so named from the River by which it stood, the Inhabitants whereof 108 years after erected the great and Magnificent Citie Agrigentum, or Agragas, so called also from a River of the same name. Zancla was first inhabited by some Pyrates of Cuma, a Citie belonging to Chalcis; but afterwards by a multitude that came promiscuously from Chalcis and other parts of Eubœa, under the conduct of Perieres of Cuma, and Gratamenes of Chalcis, and were hence cast out again by the Samians and other Ionians, who fled from the Medes into Sicilie. Zancla was so named by the Siculi, from a Sicle, in their language Zancla, which it resembled. Not long after Anaxilas Tyrant of Rhegium banishing the Samians filled it with a mixed multitude, and called it Messana, after the name of his own Countrey. Himera was planted by the Zanclaans, and many Chalcidians amongst them, with whom also joyned certain Syracusians being expelled by the contrary faction, and called Myleride. Their language was mixed betwixt the Chalcidian and Dorick tongues. These were the Colonies which from several parts of Greece planted Sicilie. As for other Towns that were Colonies of these Colonies, they shall be told whose they were upon occasion.

4. That Gyants inhabited Sicilie (although to some it hath seemed no other than the invention of Poets, who usually speak monstrously of ancient things) the discovery of the last age hath made most manifest; at what time were in several places of the Island found the bones of such kind of men, and the perfect proportion of one or more within the earth, which upon touch mouldred all into dust. Cluverius in his Description of Sicilie, and Pazellus, herein give abundant satisfaction, which might be further strengthened from what the discoverers of America relate concerning men of such stature; but that the Testimony of Scripture alone sufficeth to make evident the being of Gyants. That they were indigena, or first Inhabitants of Sicilie, is probable, and the very same with the Lastrygones. As for the Sicani, no credit is to be given to the Testimony of Thucydides in this point that they came out of Spain, for that Diodorus being this Countrey-man, and certainly rather more concerned in the delivery of the Antiquities of it, than other Nations, averreth the most accurate Historians to have affirmed them indigena, which Timan, who lived under Agathocles the Tyrant, did fully demon-

SECT. I.

The Sicani
came not out of Spain.

demonstrate. Thucydides, who first obtruded this fable upon the Greeks, confesseth that they themselves were of a contrary opinion, and though they in a matter concerning their honour might not be heard, yet this may satisfie, that in Spain there is no such River to be found as ever had the name of Sicanus, which some of those who follow the opinion of Thucydides change into Sicoris (at this day Segre) and others speak of a Citie called Sicania, and one Sicanus Captain of the Colony, all which are as true as any. Neither could these Sicani be driven from their seats by the Ligures, whose habitation was not in Spain beyond the Pyrenean Hills, but in Gaul near the River Rhodanus and the Alps. Lastly, that difficult journey which those obscure people must have taken by Land (for the use of shipping was much later in Spain) through the Countreys of the Tyrrhenians, Umbri, Ligures, Aufona, Opici, Oenotrians, and other fierce and warlike Nations, after the passage of the Pyreneans, Alps, and Gaul, may justly induce as to give credit rather to the opinion of Diodorus, and of Demetrius Calatianus a most ancient Writer; who, as the *Scholias*t of Theocritus telleth us, derived the Sicani from the Cyclopes or Gyants.

Italic.

5. That the Siculi came out of Italy several grave Authors relate, as amongst others Diodorus and Dionysius of Halicarnassus from the credit of Hellanicus the Lesbian, Philistus, and Antiochus, both of Syracuse; but they so diversly relate the story, that it appeareth to be no other than dubious, and so intricate as nothing certainly can be pitched on. In Thucydides the Opici, in Antiochus the Oenotrians and Opici drove out the Siculi: But in Hellanicus instead of Siculi the Elymi and Aufona were expelled, with Siculus their King, by the Oenotrians and Japyges. Again, according to the mind of Philistus, neither any Siculi, Aufona, nor Elymi transported themselves out of Italy; but the Ligures under conduct of Siculus. Solinus and Martianus make this Siculus the son of Neptune, Isidorus the brother of Italus, Servius Captain of the Sicani, and Antiochus will have him a Roman Exile, whom Morges the Successor of Italus entertained. Further, Dionysius writeth, that the Siculi were Native Inhabitants of Latium, and thence beaten by the Aborigines, which is plainly out of the road of history, the Siculi never having been masters of Rome. It would be too tedious to recite the several opinions concerning the time when these Siculi should make their passage out of Italy into this Island. And what Thucydides bringeth for a confirmation of his opinion, viz. that in his time some of the Siculi remained in Italy, cannot but be false, no foot-steps of them being to be found out in that Countrey by the discovery of any Geography; so that others, on the contrary, grant that the whole Nation passed over. These arguments drawn from the uncertainty of reports constrain us rather to acquiesce in the opinion of Bochartus, who concludeth that no other stranger came from other parts to inhabit Sicily, but all were Indigenae, except the Greeks and Phœnicians, the Siculi and Sicani not being distinguished in Nation but onely in place. From the Phœnicians (who especially lived about the Promontory of Lilybeum, though they were dispersed throughout the Maritime Coasts) he sheweth the Island it self, and every notable Town and River to have been named, in the first book of that admirable work intituled Canaan.

Dedalus.

6. Sicily, saith Justin out of Trogus, was from the beginning the Countrey of the Cyclopes, which being extinct Cocalus made himself King of the Island. To him fled Dedalus for protection, from the presence of Minos King of Crete. This Dedalus was an Atheman, of the family of the Erechthidae, and a famous Artist in all manner of Graven and Carved works. It hapned that he had a Scholar, his own Nephew by his sister, named Talos, who going beyond him in skill, he privately murthered him, and the matter coming out, was forced to fly for his life, and went into Crete. There being courteously entertained by Minos, he wrought many rare pieces of Architecture, but at length so displeased the King in some thing which concerned Pasiphae his wife, that he also fled thence into Sicily, where he was entertained by Cocalus King of the Sicani, then reigning at Inycus, called also Camicus. Some thought thought that by the means of Psiphæ he escaped by boat, his Son Icarus accompanying him in another, and that having invented sails, (whereas before oars only were in use) Icarus not managing his with skill enough, his Vessel sunk, and thereupon arose the Fable that they escaped with wings made of feathers waxed together, and of the young man's soaring so high, till the Sun melting the wax, he thereupon fell headlong into that part of the Sea which afterwards bare his name. Others thought Icarus was drowned as he took water. But Minos getting notice whither Dadalus was fled, pursued him with an Army, and required Cocalus to give him up. Cocalus returned him a satisfactory answer, and invited him unto his house, where he stifled him in a bath, or else his daughters, for the love they bore to Dadalus, when they came to wash him (which was the custom for women and maids to do unto guests, according to Athenæus) instead of warm water, poured on him scalding pitch. He gave up his body to his men, pretending he had slipped by chance into hot water, and perswaded them to stay and plant in the Island, where they built Minos and Engyum, now Gangæ, the two first Greek Cities founded in Sicily, as some note. The Cretians afterwards in revenge for their King's death, came and besieged Camicus five years to no purpose, and were shipwrackt in their return upon the Coast of Italy, where then resolving to stay and hide their disgrace, they built Hyria, betwixt Tarentum and Brundisium, and from them descended the Lapyges and Messapii. This passage concerning Minos the younger, happened in the dayes of Hercules the Græcian, an Age before the Trojan War.

7. After Cocalus the several Cities (because they wanted rightful and successive Kings, as it seemeth, and lived under loose Democracy) became the prey of Tyranni, whereof no Country was ever more fertile than this Island, saith Justin. Of these, Anaxilaus his Justice vied with the Cruelty of the rest, and was not unrewarded. For at his death leaving his children young, whom he committed to the trust of Micythus his faithful slave, his Subjects so prized his memory, as they chose rather to obey him, and suffer the Majesty of a Kingdom to be managed by a slave, than desert his sons. But if by these Tyranni be to be meant, such as after the settlement of the Greek Colonies, made themselves Masters of the Cities (as we have no other ground than to believe; the name of Anaxilaus sufficiently declaring it's original) then Cocalus living an Age before the Trojan War, and the first Greek Colony mentioned by Thucydides being planted in the * II Olymp. * A. M. 2723. piad, this after Cocalus is with great liberty used by Trogus or Justin; several hundreds of years, (viz. five or six) intervening betwixt Cocalus and those Tyrants. For the Cities were many years after their founding governed by the People, according to the custom of Greece, till Phalaris usurped in the State of Agrigentum, which Suidas writeth to have happened in the 52 Olympiad, and Eusebius in the 54. This difference betwixt them may well be reconciled, if, with Cappellus, we believe that Phalaris coming to Agrigentum, there was kindly entertained for eight years, at the end whereof took occasion from a guest, and perhaps a Judge of Controversies, to make himself Tyrant, and the People slaves.

8. Phalaris was born at Astypalea a City in Crete; his Fathers name was Laodamus, who died whilst this his son was an infant. He married Erychia, and on her begat Paurolas, a little before whose birth being banished, and deprived of the greater part of his estate, he continued long in a desolate condition, not knowing what to do, till at length a Sedition being raised in the State of Agrigentum, he was sent for by the weaker faction, and in conclusion got all the power into his hands. He kept the Tyranny by the same arts he first obtained it, viz. fraud and cruelty, for which cause he was grievously hated by many, and his life laid at by those of whom he had well deserved. Erychia continued all her life with her son Paurolas at Astypalea, where though she was much importuned by many Suters, yet she remained steadfast in fidelity to her husband. The Citizens of Astypalea when they saw Phalaris had so advanced himself, either for that now their hatred was allai-ed, or out of fear of revenge, sent to him to intimate that they had revoked what had been formerly done against him, as unjust. He despised not this late repentance, but sent them his hearty thanks, and rewarded them. Having obtained a victory over the Leontines, his son Paurolas sent him a Crown of Gold, which he returned back unto his wife Erythia. She was at length poysoned by Pysbon one of her Suters, intraged at a repulie; which thing Phalaris took most impatiently.

Bull.*

9. It hapned that one Perillus an Athenian, and an excellent Statuary, came to Agrigentum, where shewing his rare skill, he was kindly entertained by Phalaris. He taking notice of Phalaris his cruelty, framed a brazen Bull, which being heated and a man put in his belly, would by the roaring of him that was thus tormented, imitate the voice of a natural one. Presenting him with this exquisite piece, as incomparable for the torturing of men, he admired his skill, but detesting his wickednesse, caused him first to make a try l of it, and excused himself to the Athenians, who took it ill, as having done nothing but what was just and meet. If Perillus had onely made experimentes, Phalaris had satisfied all reasonable men; but threatening his Enemies with this Engine, and making good his word upom them as often as he could have occasion, he thereby incurred, and slighted the hatred of mankind. At the same time flourished one Stesichorus a Poet of Himera, who died eight years before Phalaris. He wrote verses against the Tyrant, and raised an Army, animating the Inhabitants of Himera against him, with whom joyned Conon a most leud and naughty man, and divers others, all which, together with the Poet, at length fell into his hands. Conon was presently condemned to the Bull. He doubted at first what to do with Stesichorus, but at length beholding his worth, he not onely dismissed him unpunished, but with large gifts; and ever after mightily revered him both alive and dead; in somuch as he desired the Himerians to build him a Temple, and Altars (offering for that purpose men, money, and all necessaries) and most lovingly comforted his daughters.

10. He was so great a contemner of Popularity, and so conscious of his wickednesse and publick infamie, that he refused the honours offered him by them of Melita, not for any pride, but with a friendly admonition, that it would be to them infamous, and to him not at all advantageous. So when Stesichorus, Cleaneta, Theano, and others, thought of writing in his praise, he seriously desired they would forbear, wishing rather that his name might be buried in oblivion, than celebrated in the Writings of Learned men, and, to no purpose, adorned with false commendations. Being grievously provoked by the affronts of the Messenians, Caranians, Leontines, *Zanclean*s, and Tauromenites, he prosecuted them to the utmost, often saying, that he most certainly knew they would fall into his hands, which accordingly came to passe. He confesseth that he had tortured in the brazen Engine 37 men, seriously wishing they might be the last; but he foresaw that Lamachus and Epiterses, though absent, would increase the number. These things are related in the Epistles that go under his name, which some Learned Men think written by Lucian. But whoever so drew to the life another's disposition as he there doth his own, in somuch as Suidas accounteth them * very admirable. If one consider their style, accutenesse, and invention, there are no Epistles of any Tyrant, no not of any Orator or Philosopher to be compared with them. But if one look at the disposition of the man, he was a portentous thing, born for the chastisement of the naughtinesse of men, of cruel hatred and unparalleld cruelty; yet of a most propense and munificent mind towards his Friends, and withall reverencing Virtue so much in his very Enemies, that for it's sake he would pardon injuries, and relinquish hatred.

11. That is scarce credible which Clearchus relateth in (a) Athenaeus, that he was transported with so great cruelty, as to have served up to his table sucking and new born Infants. (b) Ælian hath a more likely story concerning Chariton and Melanippus. Chariton loved Melanippus with an extravagant and immodest Love, as appeareth from the historian. Melanippus having a contest with one of Phalaris his friends, was commanded, and at length forced to desist, which taking very ill, he complained of it to his Lover, and desiring his assistance for killing the Tyrant, thought of taking in other young men into the conspiracy. Chariton desired of him to trust him alone with the matter to take an opportunity to revenge him, unwilling that both of them should miscarry in it if it were discovered; and on a time made at Phalaris with his dagger, but was prevented by his Guard, which he had continually about him. Being examined concerning his Complices, he endured great tortures, so long, that Melanippus more sensible of them than he himself, went to the Tyrant, and revealed the whole matter. He admiring the courage and love of both, dismissed them, with this condition, that they should depart the same day out of Sicilie. This love which appeareth to have been no better than an unnatural lust, was afterwards by Apollo called divine, whence, as in other respects, these impure Spirits, the gods of Heathens, betrayed themselves what they were. And hence it is no wonder that the Philosophers of old, such as Socrates, Plato, Xenophon, Aeschines, Cebes, and the rest, might approve of this affection towards Males, which the (c) Romans yet abhorred in some Ages, the (a) Lacedemonians held as Capital, and the Lake wherein Sodom and Gommorah were swallowed up, evinceth to have been contrary to the Law of God and Nature. But as for Phalaris, after he had tyrannized sixteen years, he perished by the fury of all the multitude of Agrigentum, which, as (e) Cicero writeth, fell upon him. Some thought that his subjects conspired against him, being principled thereby the doctrine of Pythagoras, of which opinion is also (f) Jamblichus in the life of this Philosopher. But the whole relation concerning Pythagoras his intercourse with Phalaris is therefore deservedly suspected, because the Philosopher being yet young had scarce passed into Italy. The death of Phalaris hapned about the first year of the 58 Olympiad, and the twelfth year of Cyrus his Reign, reckoned from his first obtaining the Kingdom of Media.

Thero Tyrannus
of Agrigentum.

I. A Fter the death of Phalaris, the Citizens of Agrigentum recovered their liberty, and enjoyed it till Thero again brought them under. He was the son of Ænesidamus, and boasted that he was descended from Oedipus. He got the prize at the race with the Chariot in the Olympick games, and is celebrated by (a) Pindar the Poet, whose *Scholias*t reacheth us, that he was Father in Law to Gelon Tyrant of Syracuse, by his daughter Dimareta, and married also his brother's daughter: At this time Panatus made himself Lord of Leontium, and Cleander of Gela. Cleander, after seven years, was succeeded by his brother Hippocrates, who sore afflicted the people of Naxos, of Zancle, or Messana, and Leontium, whom he forced to acknowledge him for their Lord. After seven years, he was also slain in a battle against the Siculi, having before this made war with the Syracusians, and by composition got from them the City of Camerina. After his death Gelon the son of Dinomenes (descended of the race of the Rhodians, who with the Cretans and other Greeks had seated themselves in Sicilie) that had commanded his Forces with great successe, and to whom he committed the trust of his Children, breaking all obligations made himself Lord of Gela. After he was in possession of this Town, a Sedition happening in Syracuse, betwixt the Magistrates and People, he being called in to the assistance of the Governours that were driven out by the multitude, made himself Prince. Such being the danger and infirmity of all Governments, except rightfully successive Monarchy. This fell out in the second year of the 72 Olympiad;

SECT. 2.

when Hybrilides was Archon at Athens, the 3rd of Darius Hystaspis, and the same, as some reckon, wherein the battel at Marathon was fought. Now the comportment of Sicilian affairs constraining us to speak most concerning Syracuse, so considerable a place, both as to its self, as a Citie, and as the scene of so great transactions, requireth a more accurate description.

The Original of Syracuse.

2. Syracuse was first inhabited by some Greeks of Ætolia, and had the name of Orygia. These were expelled by the Siculi, who possessed themselves of the place, and at length were outed also by a Colony led thither out of Peloponnesus by Archias the Corinthian, in the eleventh Olympiad, Romulus then reigning at Rome, and the Messenian War being very hot in Peloponnesus. This new Colony, because of Archias, and for that many followed him from Corinth, owned that Citie for its Metropolis, which at that time was most powerfull at Sea. But many afterwards flocked out of other parts of Peloponnesus, and by little and little the Citie of Syracuse so increased, as it became not onely the greatest, and most beautifull of all in Sicily, but of Greek Cities whatsoever, as Cicero affirmeth. It contained, as he writeth, four great Cities; the Island, Acradina, Tycha, and Neapolis. Its compass was 180 furlongs, having, besides Suburbs, two Ports very commodious for shipping, being separated by the Island, and grounds about it very fertile, in some places rising into little Hills, but compassed about with Fennes. The first Inhabitants dwelt in the Island antiently called Orygia; then as the Citie increased the other parts were added, whereof the latest was Neapolis. As for the state of the Citie, after it received a new beginning from Archias, the form of the Commonwealth was without doubt the same that then was in the Metropolis under the Government of the Bechidea, viz. Oligarchical, bordering upon Aristocracie. Afterwards the common people waxing heady outed the better sort of the possession of the grounds, and seizing on the Government, made had to be worse, as the sad changes and desolations will shew. The Exiles (by Herodotus called Gamori) betook themselves to Gelon the Tyrannus of Gela, who coming to restore them with an Army, the people resisted not, but received him into the Citie, whereby obtaining the whole power, he restored it not to the Nobility, but made himself master of Syracuse. This hapned at the time aforesaid, and about 244 years after the Plantation of Archias.

The acts and power of Gelon.

3. Gelon so used his power as he was loved by all, and feared by none. He every way much enlarged, adorned, and enriched the Citie: out of all Conquered Towns he took the Noblest, and worst disposed Citizens, and brought them to Syracuse. He procured the affections of almost all that dwelt in Sicily, and so greatly strengthen'd himself, that he was able with a Navy of 200 Triremes, and as great an Army as all Greece could set forth against Xerxes, to help the Gracians in the Median War; and had gone to their assistance, if they would either have granted him the Command of the Land Army or the Fleet. When he could obtain neither of those, he employed his forces against the Carthaginians, who had been called into Sicily by the Egestans, and on the same day wherein the Greeks obtained their victory at Salamine, got so great an one over them at Himera a Maritime Town, that his glory is thought to have equalled, if not exceeded, the other of Themistocles. At this time the Carthaginians were very powerfull, and become Eminent; whose affairs being by necessity to be joyned with such matters as relate to this Island of Sicily, a more convenient place cannot be had, to speak something (as this work requireth) of the Original, and progresse of their Commonwealth.

The Original of Carthage.

4. Carthage was a Colony of Tyre, and Tyre of Sidon the most antient Metropolis of Phœnicia, mentioned by Homer with commendation for ingenious industry (who hath not one word concerning Tyre) and built by Sidon the eldest son of Canaan. Tyre was built about the 2747 year of the World, and 240 years before Solomons Temple, as (a) Josephus hath observed. The Greeks thought it received its name from Tyrus the Founder: and and (b) some invented a fable of a Nymph, called Tyros, beloved by Hercules. But Tfor in the Phœnician language signifying a Rock, the situation itself sufficiently declareth the Original of the name, which upon this account was communicated to three other places, besides this eminent Citie, viz. (c) two in the Continent, and another in the same Island. Near the Island of this famous City stood Palatyrus, or Old Tyre, mentioned by Joshua, and called a strong Citie even at the division of the Land of Canaan, which hapned about 200 years before the building of that whereof we speak. Now (d) Josephus maketh the Temple of Jerusalem to have been founded in the eleventh year of the reign of Hiram King of Tyre, who was son to Abibal, by Josephus called Abibalus, and by Eusebius, Abelbalus. Hiram, or Huram according to the Hebrews, (by the Greeks called Iom and Syron (for Horum) by Enpolemus) was a great friend to David, and supplied Salomon his son with materials, and work-men for building the Temple. He also proposed hard questions to Solomon to be unfolded, as Menander testified, who translated the Tyrian Annals into the Greek language: He strengthened, and enlarged the Citie of Tyre, as Dius also wrote, and reigned 34 years. After him his son Baleastarus reigned 7. and Abdastarus 9. who being slain by the four sons of his Nurse, the eldest of them reigned twelve years. Then Astartus the son of Baleastarus 12. his brother Astarimus 9. who was slain by his brother Phelles. Phelles reigned but eight moneths, being killed by Ishobalus the Priest of Astarta, who reigned 32 years; after him Badezarus his son 6. then Atetinus his son 9. and lastly, Pygmalion 40. in the seventh of whose reign his sister Dido built the Citie of Carthage in Africk. Therefore from the beginning of Hiram's reign to the building of Carthage intervened 155 years and eight moneths; and whereas the Temple was founded at Jerusalem in the twelfth of his reign, from the building of the Temple to that of Carthage passed 143 years and eight moneths, as Josephus collecteth from the Testimony of Menander the Ephesian, in his first book against Apion.

5. But Appian in his History of the Punick Wars, writeth that Carthage was built by the Tyrians, 50 years before the destruction of Troy, which precedeth the former date 360 years. He nameth as founders Zorus and Carchedon, according to the opinion of the Greeks, who thought them the Captains of the Colony; whereas Tfor, or Zor, was the name of the Metropolis, and Carchedon of the new Citie, Carthada signifying a New Citie in the Phœnician language, as Solinus witnesseth. Strabo again will have the Phœnicians to have led out Colonies as far as the Pillars of Hercules, and planted some, a little after the Iroian War, upon the Maritime Coasts of Africk, with which Virgil closing, seigneth Dido to have reigned at Carthage at that time; whereas she was 300 years later, according to the Testimony of the Phœnician Annals; so as Servius upon the Poet affirmeth the whole story of Aeneas and Dido to be a fiction, and utterly against the course of History. Further, Eusebius noreth that some accounted Carthage built 143 years after the destruction of Troy, about the 2966 year of the World, and the 23 of the reign of David, 164 years or more before the time assigned to Dido by Menander. For the reconciliation of these several assertions it must be considered that Carthage consisted of three parts, viz. Cothon, Megara, and Byrsa, whereof the first was the Port, and the last the Citadel compassed about by the second, called Magalia and Magaria, but more truly Megara, signifying properly in the Punick language, dwelling in a strange Countrey. 'Tis conceived that these might be built at several times; as that part about the Haven before the War of Troy; the other some time within 144 years after the destruction of it, which might rightly, in respect of the other, be called Carthada, or New Town; and lastly, the Byrsa by Dido 166 years after. For the Phœnicians being masters at Sea, might according to their pleasure, as they had occasion, send out Colonies, which they began to do from the time that Joshua expelled them out of the Land of Canaan. The Greeks themselves believed that Cadmus made an expedition into Africk, and there

Utica,

Dido.

there built many Cities, as appeareth out of Nonius; and he built the Citadel at Ihebes about the time of Joshua. In Procopius his age, who lived under Justinian the Emperour, about the 540 year of Christ, the two Pillars were yet standing, which those Canaanites erected that fled from the face of Joshua, in that part of Africk, called Tingitana, as the inscription testified, which we formerly mentioned, and Eusebius writeth that these same Canaanites led Colonies into Tripolis in Africk. Lastly, amongst several other Cities built by the Phœnicians, the most considerable, after Carthage, was Utica, some ten miles distant from it, which Aristotle, from the Phœnician Histories reporteth to be 287 years antienter than Carthage, and Velleius Paterculus to have been built by the Tyrrians a few years after Gades, about the time of Codrus, who being Contemporary with Saul, this Citie obtained the name of Utica or Icyca, that is (saith Bochartus) in the Phœnician language, Old or Antient.

6. Dido was sister to Pygmalion King of Tyre, & wife to Sichæus, or Sicharbas their Uncle the Priest of Hercules. Sichæus being murthered by Pygmalion for his Wealth, she out of hatred to, or for fear of her brother fled into Africk, with all she could take, & thereby disappointed the murderer of his prey. The story goeth, that coming into Africk, she & her Companions were repelled by Hiarbas the King of that place, till they craftily desired to buy of him so much ground as an Ox's hide would compass. The Africans laughed at their folly, and out of desire to see what use they could make of so little ground, swore to make good the bargain. The Phœnicians then cut the Hide all into one small thong, with which they encompassed twenty furlong, and thereon built a Castle, thence, (saith the Greeks) called Byrsa. But learned men explode this story of the Hide as a meer invention, and a fable raised from a false explication of the word, which in the Hebrew tongue is Bosra, and signifying a fortified place, or Castel, is changed into Byrsa for the better sound, because the Genius of the Greek language suffereth not S & R to be joyned together. Justin out of Trogus relateth that Hiarbas King of Mauritania sent for ten of the principal Carthaginians, and required Dido in marriage, threatening else to make War upon them. At their return they told her he desired some one who might teach his people breeding and manners, but none could be found that was content to leave his Countrey, and joyn himself with the Barbarians, whose lives were like to those of wild beasts. She blaming them all exceedingly, that they preferred their private commodity before the good of their Countrey, to which if need required they ought their very lives, they opened to her the whole matter, saying, that what she would impose upon others, she ought not her self to refuse. Being caught with this wile, she long called on the name of Sichæus, her husband, with many tears and great lamentation, then raking three moneths time for the doing of what there was necessity for, she made a pile of wood, as though to make a Parentation to Sichæus, and appease his Ghost before her second marriage. Having killed many beasts, she ascended the Pile with a Sword in her hand, and turning to the people said, that now she was going to her husband, and therewithall killed her self. Before the name of Dido (which some make to signifie Loved or Amiable, and others more probably Wandering or Erratick) she had that of Elissa, betokening a Divine Woman, or Virago. The Latin word Virago, in Greek written Ouirago, is in Eusebius corrupted into Origo, and being applied as a name to the Citie, and not to the woman, by a misunderstanding hath much perplexed Joseph Scaliger and others.

(b) Polybius saith it was composed of Kingly, Aristocratical, and Democratical Governments, and (c) Isocrates maketh it Oligarchical at home, and in War Monarchical. As two Kings at Lacedaemon had the first rank of Magistracie with equal power, so at Carthage two persons, by them called Suffetes, and by Aristotle, and Polybius, and Corn. Nepos, termed Kings, yet onely nominally; As the former were for life, so these were but Annual (in which respect (d) Levie compareth them with the Consuls of Rome) and their dignity being hereditary, those were yearly elected out of any noble Families. Such were especially preferred as were accounted most eminent for Virtue, and able to defray the charges of their place. Aristotle commendeth this above the Lacedaemonian custom, all but that concerning their wealth, imputing it as an error to the Legislator; who ought another way to have provided for Magistrates, that they might attend publick businesse without any detriment to themselves, and so be preferred meerly for their Virtue.

The Suffetes.

8. These Suffetes were more rightly in their own Language called Sophetim, the Hebrew name of those chief Judges amongst the Israelites, who from Joshua to Saul governed their Commonwealth, and the History of whose actions by us called Judges, hath the same title of Sophetim, for that interpretation which renders it Sophim (i.e. Overseers) at the first sight appeareth lesse probable. Their Office was to assemble the Senate, in which doubtlesse they presided and proposed. They decided causes Criminal, but their power was confined to home, nothing appearing of their meddling with warlike matters, or having command of the Armies. To these Suffetes was added a Senate, which because Aristotle compareth it with that of Lacedaemon, may be supposed elective out of the best sort and most antient men, and the Senators it's likely, injoyed the dignity all their lives. How many they were in number doth not appear; but that herein this Senate exceeded the other of Lacedaemon, is to be gathered from * Justin, who speaketh of 100 persons that out of it were chosen for Judges, to take account of the actions of all Generals at their return from the Wars. This Senate, as that at Rome, was the chief member, and as the Soul of the State, wherein the Suffetes propounding, as the Consuls there, all things of moment were brought to it; especially what concerned those great things of Empire: viz. Peace, War, and Leagues. The Suffetes deliberating with the Senate, if it was unanimous, and they resolved the same thing, their Decree was Law to the whole State; but if the Senate and Suffetes disagreed, then was the matter referred to the People.

Concio or Assembly.

9. In the Concio or Assembly of the People, any one of the rabble might speak his mind freely, and without danger contradict the Magistrates. The People's Decree concerning any thing referred, was taken for the ultimate determination of the whole and State, and being once passed was so binding, that it was not lawful to offer any thing against it, which Aristotle reprehendeth (and well may he) as too Popular, and too much declining from the best form of a Commonwealth, affirming this Constitution to have no place in the best modelled States. But * Polybius dissenting from the Philosopher, where he compareth the Carthaginian with the Laconick and Roman Commonwealths, sheweth that it was poised of the three kinds of Government, that the Suffetes were as Kings, the Senate held the place of Optimates or Nobility, and the People a convenient power. Yet he addeth, that when Hannibal made War upon the Romans, (which happened ten years after the death of Aristotle,) the State of Carthage declined from it's antient and best condition, the People having assumed more than formerly, when the Roman Senate's authority was yet whole. This he thinketh to have much incommodated their affaires, and brought great advantage to the Romans. But what authority the People had during the best and most ancient State, he no where in those Books and fragments that are remaining, declareth. Emmianus thinketh that it consisted in electing Magistrates, making Laws, Leagues, Peace,

SECT. 2. Peace, and War; in appointing and ordering Negotiations, Customs, Tributes, and such like things, which concerned the generality, and respected the profit of the multitude. But some of these things seem rather to have fallen under the consideration of the Kings and Senate; however the disorders that followed, as in all other such Governments, will satisfy the Reader in his opinion of the excellency of Monarchy.

Council of 104. 10. Besides the Senate there was a Council of 104 men, whereof Aristotle only informeth us, and which, according to the round number, from him we may call the Centumvirate. They had power to chuse five men out of their body, who had very large and great authority; Both these sorts of Magistrates retained their power longer than any other, enjoying it both before and after they came to be of the five, which thing was plainly Oligarchical. But in that they were not chosen by lot, but by the Suffrages of the People, and served without wages; in that they alone took cognisance of, and judged controversies, and publick actions, none being remitted to others, as the custom was at Lacedemon, this he taketh notice to be Aristocratical. He compareth the power of the Centumvirate with that of the Ephori at Sparta, whereby he teacheth us, that the power of judging lay in it. And as the Ephori were (according to him) Conservators of Popular liberty at Sparta, protecting the Plebeians against the power of the great ones, so it is likely, from these words of Aristotle, that those 100 men at Carthage were the Keepers of the Popularity. Herein he preferreth them before the Ephori, that they were not chosen out of the rabble, but the better sort of Citizens, wherein lay also a piece of Aristocracy; for mean persons being preferred to greatest places, do much hurt a Commonwealth, saith he, and have already endamaged that of the Lacedemonians. Amongst civil Officers there were some that made inspection into the manners of the Citizens, as Corn. Nepos telleth us in the life of Amilcar, the Father of famous Hannibal, from whom they removed a beautiful young man called Asdrubal, because he was reported to be more familiar with him, than modesty required. There was also a Pratorship which had authority to look to the Customs and Tributes, and also to prefer Laws, as appeareth by Hannibal, who being chosen into this office, not only reformed the Customers, but also taking notice of the corruption of Judges, procured a Law for them to be chosen every year. But whether there were more than one of these Officers, is not to be discovered from ancient Writers.

Faults in the Commonwealth. 11. Besides the faults before mentioned, Aristotle reprehendeth the Custom of chusing the Suffetes for their riches, which openeth a dore to avarice and indirect practices thence arising. He also noteth it as a fault, that one and the same man had several Offices, which yet they esteemed as a great honour. One detestable practice they used of old, to sacrifice to their gods humane Sacrifices, when any affliction or disaster fell upon them, and even their own Sons, as Plato witnesseth, which custom they seem to have brought with them out of Palastine, every year sending thither such kind of presents unto Hercules, as we find in Pliny. Another absurd Law they had, which forbade any Citizens to learn the Greek Language, lest they should hold intelligence with the Enemy, because one Suniator had so done with Dionysius the elder, as Justin writeth. This indeed was laudable, that this City abominated Drunkenness, and severely prohibited Wine as much as to be tasted in the Camp, as Plato recordeth in his Laws. This also Aristotle commendeth, that, for an encouragement to warfare, they had a Law which gave liberty to a Soldier to wear so many Rings as he had served times in the field. The People were by their natural constitution, morose and surly, obedient to their Magistrates, tyrannical towards their Subjects, most dejected in time of fear, and cruel in anger, resolute in their designs, notwithstanding all force of flattery, and so infamous for their breach of faith, that the Punick faith or trust became a Proverb. As for their greatness and Dominion, the description thereof is to be left to its proper place. Now must their affaires abroad in Sicily and other parts, be defined with the matters of that Island.

Lib. 30. cap. 9.

12. At what time, or upon what occasion the Carthaginians first came into Sicilie is uncertain, (a) Livie will have them first called in by the Sedition of the Islanders. in the year that T. Quintius (Surnamed Cincinnatus, as also Penno) and Cn. Julius Meno were Consuls, which was in the beginning of the Peloponnesian War, the 323 year of the City, 50 years after the passage of Xerxes into Greece, and consequently as many from the Victory which Gelon got over them; a grosse mistake. (b) Justin out of Trogus, having first related their impious custom of pleasing their gods by humane Sacrifices, addeth, that the divine powers being therewith displeased or averse to them, when they had long unhappily made War in Sicilie, they translated it into Sardinia, and there losing the greatest part of their Army, received a grievous overthrow, whereupon they banished Mazæus their General, (by whom they had conquered a great part of Sicilie, and done great matters against the Africans) with that part of the Army which remained. The Army taking this in great disdain, sent to the City to desire a repealing of the Act of banishment, and threatned by force to rescind it, in case they were thereto constrained by a denial of their sute. Their message being despised, they besieged the City, and after a few dayes took it. Mazæus calling the People together, complained of the injury, excused the necessity of the War, and inveighed against the contempt of his Victories. He said he would pardon all, but such as had been authors of the injurious Exile of their fellow Citizens; and accordingly putting ten of the Senators to death, he restored the City to it's Laws. Not long after being accused of an intention to make himself absolute, he was punished both for his parricide committed against his Country, and his own Son (as Justin termeth it) whom being a Priest, he had crucified, for refusing to come to him before he had finished his superstitious rites, and when he came appeared in his purple and other ornaments, which Mazæus thought unsuitable with the condition of him his Father. Him succeeded Mago, by whose industry the wealth, dominion, and reputation of the Carthaginians, for matters of War, increased.

(a) Decad. 1. lib. 4.

(b) Lib. 18.

13. Mago being the first, who by ordaining military discipline, had laid the foundation of Empire, and added to the strength of the City, as well by introducing Virtue as the Art of War, left two Sons behind him, Asdrubal and Amilcar, who by treading in his paths, succeeded as well to the greatness as the Patrimony of their Father. Under their conduct the State made War in Sardinia, and fought against the Africans, who demanded Tribute for the ground on which Carthage stood, which also at length they constrained the Carthaginians to pay. Asdrubal died of his wounds in Sardinia, whose death was ennobled by publick mourning, eleven Dictatorships, as Justin calleth them (by which seemeth to be understood no other than so many times sending out, or commissionating as General, with full power in the field, yet so as to be under the commands of the State) and four Triumphs: and the Enemies of Carthage took heart, as if with the Captain it's force and power was also dead. The Inhabitants of Sicilie then vexed with the continual injuries of the Carthaginians, betook themselves to Leonidas the brother of the King of Sparta, and a great War ensued, wherein both parties long struggled with various Fortune. At this time came Ambassadors from Darius (the Son of Hystaspes) King of Persia, commanding the Carthaginians to forbear offering humane Sacrifices, and eating mans flesh, requiring them to burn their dead rather than bury them, and demanding assistance against the Greeks, with whom he was about to engage in War. They denied to afford any succours because of their continual Wars with their neighbours; but obeyed him in the rest, lest they should seem too stubborn, saith Justin; yet that they stood not to their word, the testimonies of Plato, Diodorus, and Pliny, do certifie. Whilst these things passed, Amilcar was slain in the War of Sicilie, leaving three Sons: Amilco, Hanno, and Gisgo. Asdrubal also left so many: viz. Annibal, Asdrubal, and Sappho. Of these, Annibal is mistaken for Annibal the great, by one who hath made some short Notes upon * Justin, and Amilcar his Uncle, for Amilcar Bar-

14. For this Amilcar seemeth no other than the very same that was slain in the battel fought with Gelon of Syracuse, in the sixth year of Xerxes, Son to Darius King of Persia, from which was made a digression into the affaires of Carthage. With Amilcar perished 150000 Carthaginians; the Captives that remained of his Army, filled all the Cities of the Island, and the State of Carthage was constrained to beg peace, having, as some say, made this War at the instance of Xerxes, that thereby the Greeks in Sicilie might be diverted from helping their Friends. After this, Gelon was offered the Kingdom of Sicilie; but he generously refused it, whereby he obtained the greater glory and love. At length, having settled all things well, he died full of honour at Syracuse, after he had held the Principality about thirteen years. In the third year of the 75 Olympiad his elder brother Hieron succeeded him. He rebuilt Catana, and changed it's name into Aetna, the Mountain of which name about this time brake out into flames, as fifty years after it did also. In the beginning of his reign he was much unlike to his brother Gelon, being suspicious, cruel, coverous, and turbulent: then caught with a lingering disease, he was much amended by the conversation of most Learned men. After this he fought prosperously against the Carthaginians, who now again returned into Sicilie, overthrew Thrasydeus of Agrigentum in a great battel, and drove him to desperation: at length he incurred the hatred of the Syracusians, uncertain for what cause, and shortly after withdrawing himself to Catana, there died in the second year of the 78 Olympiad, when he had held the Principality from the death of Gelon eleven years and eight moneths.

15. After him his brother Thrasybulus seized upon the power, whose practices stirred up the Citizens to recover their liberty with the hastening of his ruine. For being set upon by them, he was overthrown, and reduced to such a straight, that he fled into Locri on the Coast of Italy, and there killed himself, having held the Sovereignty ten moneths from the death of Hieron. The Syracusians now gladly resumed their liberty; yet not therewith content, that they might the more secure it, they freed also many other Cities of Sicilie, from Tyranni and forein Garrisons. But not long after they fell into a most pernicious Sedition. For excluding those from honours whom Gelon had brought into Syracuse for the establishment of his own interest, they themselves bearing all Offices of Magistracy, and governing the Commonwealth, though they took not away from the other the freedom of the City, the lately made Denizons nor enduring it, conspired together, being in number 7000 of 10000 which Gelon had brought in. Three years after liberty recovered, they sodainly fell upon two parts of the City: the Island and Acradina. The natural Inhabitants overpowering them in numbers, besieged them close, and overthrowing them in a Sea fight, at length constrained them to acquiesce in the present state of things, or else quit the City, after the Sedition and tumult had endured two years. In the mean time by the conduct of Duceius a Sicilian, those planters that Hiero had placed in Catana, were thence ejected, and the old Inhabitants restored to the place, whom he had cast out: now also the whole Island was restored to it's anient condition, the Exiles being repossessed, and new comers driven out, who settled themselves at Messana, the utmost part of the Island.

the Syracusan Commonwealth.

16. That form of a Commonwealth was now established at Syracuse, which Aristotle properly calleth Policie, mixed of Oligarchie and Democracie; which, how dangerous it was, appeared shortly. For, after some years, the State continuing in this form, and the number of Citizens increasing, one Tyndarides, an Eminent man, and very rich, egged on by his ambition, brought it into great danger. For binding to him the indigent rabble by his gifts, and using them as a Guard, he manifestly pressed towards the sovereignty, but by the Union of those who were in greatest grace with the people, he was repressed, and when the beggerly sort would needs undertake his protection, killed in a tumult. When others not at all deterred by this example aspired after such power as threatened liberty, the people for to humble those that carried their heads highest, in imitation of the Athenians brought in the use of the Petalism. As they by their Ostracism removed such Citizens for ten years, who for their reputation and interest were dangerous to the freedom of the Citie, so the Syracusans by the Petalism removed such like for five years. This kind of banishment, without losse of honour, or fortune, was called in Greek Pesalismos, because his name whom any one would have banished was written in a leaf of an Olive, according to * Diodorus, both which in the same language were signified by the word Petalos. But this constitution, as the other at Athens, could not long continue. For those Eminent persons who were most fit for State Affairs, for fear thereof by little and little withdrew themselves from publick businesse to a private life. Hereby the Commonwealth fell into the hands of bold, rash, unskilfull, and the naughtiest sort of men, whence grievous incommodities and dangers followed. By these things the people were moved to abrogate the Law of Petalism, and the better sort returned to the care of the Commonwealth, after which it remained in quietnesse for some time, but again relapsed, as necessarily it must, from the infirmity of Antimonarchical Government.

The Wars of
sians*.

17. Abroad the Syracusans had War with the Tuscans in Italy; with Duceius Captain of the Siculi, as also the Agrigentines, Trinacrians, Leontines, and Egestans in Sicily, wherein most commonly they had the better, and either fully brought under, or bound to them by Leagues, most of the Cities in the Island. Leontium a most flourishing Town was utterly destroyed when it now gaped after the Empire of Sicily, the principal Citizens being removed to Syracuse, and the multitude driven into Exile. Out of these motions they fell into the Athenian War in the first year of the 91th Olympiad, concerning which we have already sufficiently spoken. Syracuse was so exhausted therein with expences and slaughters, that upon the brink of ruin it was meerly preserved by the wisdom and valour of Gylippus, a stranger of Sparta; and not onely preserved, but made victorious to admiration, and enabled to return to the Athenians so great overthrows by Land and Sea. This War which begun in the 50th year after the recovery of their liberty (by means of the Egestans, who craved aid of Athens against them and the Selinuntians) lasted not fully three years, leaving a sufficient warning to all, of the vicissitude of humane affairs, and shewing, that they who gape after Dominion, and are busie to enlarge their bounds, being carried out by the force of ambition rather than reason, often fall into a necessity of defending their own Estate, and sometimes lose all.

18. The multitude grown exceeding high upon this successe, would not rest satisfied with its former privileges, but so ordered the matter, that the temper of this Commonwealth more and more degenerated. Diocles a man of principal note, who had perswaded them to put to death Nicias and Demosthenes the Athenian Generals, being of a most severe and rigid disposition, eloquent tongue, and great reputation for wisdom, perswaded the people to change the Commonwealth, and elect Magistrates by lot, whereas formerly they were left to the suffrages of the people. The former way inclined to Oligarchy; but, by this, admission was given to the meanest and unfittest person to Govern, which ill agreeth with the fame of Diocles his wisdom. Some think that the multitude having got a promise from the great ones in by Diocles.

SECT. 2.

the late danger, in case they would well demean themselves, now wrested this Law from them, that Diocles perswaded the Nobility, and the better sort to give way to the time for avoiding some greater mischief, and then he with his Collegues having power from the whole State, as Diodorus addeth, form'd this new Commonwealth with convenient Laws, whereby this liberty was bounded, and other things defined as they thought, but falsely, made for publick good. This Diocles was in punishment of vice rigid, and inexorable, and yet most just in what was deserved by any man. His Laws were so well thought of by the vulgar, that many Cities of Sicily received them on their own accord, the whole praise of the invention being given to him, though he had others joyned with him in the work, that were excellent for wisdom and prudence. In after-times one Cephalus under Timoleon, and Polydorus under Hieron, were deputed to the making of Laws, but neither of them were accounted Legislators, but both Commentators upon him, who in the form of his speech was something short and obscure.

19. Diocles amongst other Laws ordained, that it should be Capital for any man to come into the Forum, or place where the people was wont to meet, with his Arms, and that neither the plea of ignorance nor any other excuse should stand him in stead that so offended. Afterwards it hapned that he himself having issued out against the Enemy who made incursions, as he returned with his sword, heard of a tumult in the Forum, and so went directly thither, not thinking what he had about him. Being for this reprehended by a private man as breaking his own Laws, he cried out he would do no such matter, but establish them with his blood, and therewithall killed himself. In the Commonwealth thus new modelled by him, 'tis uncertain what order there was, or what method was observed in acting. There was a Senate consisting of 600 men, as we understand from Diodorus; but the fame of it was very obscure, and the power, as may be gathered, exceeding small, which maketh it be so seldom mentioned. The multitude was sole Lord of all, and dayly meeting together created the chief Magistrates, disposed of the Militia, placing, and displacing Officers therein, decreed War, made peace, contracted Leagues and Alliances, exercised power as to life or death, granted Indemnity, banished, and recalled at their pleasure. Other things of lesser moment were left to Magistrates, which were various, as in other popular Commonwealths. They were annual, as the Generals abroad, 2. 3. 4. or more, as the people pleased, the General at home who was over the Militia of the Citie in time of peace, and had great authority. Others were chosen by lot, as Judges, Treasurers, Censors, and such like, amongst which were also those that oversaw the matters at Sea, the Citie having an excellent sit for trading. But things could not thus long stand, the Government being such, and wherein the wisest sort could do least, and the foolish unexperienced rabble was most powerfull, though having no skill in State affairs they little minded what they did, and onely aimed at their private advantage. Hereby they were easily led aside by one, who cunningly, though underhand, wrought his own designs. For scarce were 8 years passed over from the overthrow of the Athenians, when Dionysius the son of Hermocrates, a man of a subtile head, and deep dissimulation, so fooled the multitude, as obtaining from it a Guard for his person, he invaded the Tyranny in the fourth year of the 93th Olympiad, the very same that the Citie of Athens was yielded up to Lyfander. How this was effected must more particularly be related, to let the reader behold the danger of Antimonarchical Government, and the happinesse of a people under that of hereditary Kings.

Dionysius in-

How this was effected by degrees.

20. The Citizens of Agesta (who had entred into League with Athens against the Syracusians, and been cause of the Athenian War, by reason of the controversie betwixt the Selinuntians and them about some grounds) were in great fear after the overthrow of their friends to be called to account, quitted those grounds for which they had contested. But their adversaries not resting satisfied with the restitution of these Territories, but seizing also upon part of the adjoining Region, they sent to Carthage for help, giving up them-themselves into their protection. The Carthaginians were very desirous to be masters of this Citie, so fit for their purpose of Conquering Sicily, but on the other hand they stood in fear of the Syracusians, who had so lately grappled with, and worsted the power of Athens. Yet their ambition prevailing, they promised them aid, which they committed to the care of Hannibal, then one of their principal Magistrates, giving him Commission to make War if the case should so require. After the death of Amilcar the affairs of Carthage had been managed by his, and his brothers sons, being six in number, under whose conduct War was made upon the Moors and Nuvidians, and the Africans were also constrained to remit the Tribute which had been formerly paid them for the fire of the Citie. Now it was, that this great & numerous family being dangerous to the liberty of the Citie, by doing, and judging all things, 100 Judges were chosen from amongst the Senators, who received an account from the Generals at their return from the War, that by this awe they might manage affairs abroad, as having an eye upon Justice, and the Laws at home. To Amilcar in Sicily succeeded his son Amilco, who having good success in the War, both by Land and Sea, on a sudden lost his Army by the force of Pestilence, for which disaster there was a sad mourning at Carthage (as it is largely described by Justin) and he at his return killed himself. Hannibal was his brothers son, being the Grandson of Amilcar by his son Gesco, or Gisgo, as * Diodorus informeth us.

21. Hannibal having an inbred hatred against all Greeks, and an earnest desire by his own acts to redeem the credit of his family, was glad of an opportunity to gratifie his Countrey, and near upon seventy years after the overthrow, and death of his Grand-father, undertook the employment. He first sent to the Syracusians, referring the matter betwixt the two Cities unto them, that the Selinuntians refusing to stand to any award, as he knew they would, a more specious pretence might be obtained for the War. They accordingly opposing it, the Syracusians decreed to hold them as Allies and Confederates, and also to be at peace with the Carthaginians; but the two concerned Cities filling upon each other, both Syracuse and Carthage was thereby drawn into the quarrel. Hannibal then having both in Spain and Africk made great preparations, the next year landed at Lilybaeum the most Southern Cape of Sicily towards Africk, and setting upon the Selinuntians at unawares with a vast Army, took their Citie in the 10th day of the siege, wherein he made Captive 7000 persons, 16000 being slain, and 2600 escaped to Arrigentum. He permitted Empedion and his kindred to people it anew, under condition of paying Tribute to Carthage. This was the condition of Selinus, after it had stood 242 years from its first founding by the Megarians, who being descended from Megara in Greece first came into Sicily under conduct of Lamis, and built a Town upon the River Pantacius, called Trotilus. Thence Lamis departing with some of his Colony went to the Leontines and Chalcidians, with whom having lived some time he was driven out by them, and planting some Inhabitants in Thapsus, after his death they left the place, and under conduct of Hyblon the Sicilian King, who betrayed the Countrey, inhabited Megara, and were called Hybleans. After 245 years they were driven hence by Gelon of Syracuse, but 145 years before this, they sent out a Colony with Pammilus, which built Selinus.

22. Hannibal from Selinus marched to Himera, having a particular grudge against that place for his Grand-father's death. Falling on it with all his might, he was repulsed for a little time by the resolute valour of the Inhabitants, but the Wall being beaten down with his Engines, he shortly took it. Many Women and Children had withdrawn themselves out of the Citie; of those men which he took he carried up 3000 to the Hill where his Grand-father had been slain, and there killed them, being before used with all kinds of indignities; then rased he the Citie which had been inhabited 240 years, and dismissing his Mercenaries and Subjects of Sicily departed home, where he was received with greatest expressions of honour and affection for having having done in three months what other Captains would have required far larger time to effect. After his departure, Hermocrates the Syracusian (who having been sent as General to the assistance of the Lacedaemonians, was condemned to banishment in his absence, through the malice of his Enemies) returned with a considerable Force into Sicilie, and to ingratiate himself with his Country-men, repeopled Selinus, and fell upon the tributaries of Carthage. The more still to endear himself, he took up the bones of those Syracusians that fell at Himera, and in a carriage sent them to the City, well knowing, that this would procure as love to him, so envy and hatred to Diocles his main adversary, who having been the Captain of the slain, had taken no care for their burial. Diocles much opposed their publick Sepulture, but the People resolutely decreed it, then banished him, and yet they recalled not Hermocrates, being lealous lest he should improve his power and abilities to the making of himself absolute. He then being in despair of returning by fair means, attempted to do it by force, and getting in to the City, was amongst his complices killed by the multitude.

23. In the second year of the 93 Olympiad, the Syracusians sent to Carthage to complain of the late War, and to desire that for the time to come they would forbear all hostility, to which they returned an ambiguous answer, and made all possible provision for an Army, wherewith to subdue the whole Island. Before they transported any Forces they sent a Colony thither, which at the hot waters built a City, and called it Therma. The year following they ordered Hannibal to go over as General, who excusing himself by reason of his Age, they joyned with him Imilco the son of Hanno, one of the same Family. These two Generals then made Levies throughout Africk, hired Soldiers out of Spain, the Islands Baleares, and Italy; and got together an Army of 120000 men according to Timaeus, but after Ephorus his reckoning 300000. As they were passing over, the Syracusians met them, and sunk fifteen of their Vessels, but with the rest Hannibal passed safe over, and fell upon the rich and stately City of Agrigentum, which contained 200000 persons. The Agrigentines wanted not assistance from their friends, all the Greek Cities being deeply concerned in their welfare, and the Syracusians gave the besiegers a considerable defeat, who demolishing the Tombs and Monuments the better to get to the walls, had thereby pulled down a Pestilence upon themselves, saith Diodorus, wherein Hannibal died. But Imilco (or Imilcar) thereby not discouraged, continued the Siege, expiating the offence, as he thought, by sacrificing a Boy to Saturn, and drowning a company of Priests in the Sea as an offering to Neptune. His Soldiers mutinying for provisions, he supplied, by taking of the ships which loaded with necessaries were sent from Syracuse to the besieged. Hereby he starved them within, and constrained them to quit the City, being guarded to Gela by armed men. Imilcar found extraordinary rich plunder in it, whereof some rarities he sent to Carthage, amongst which was Phalaris his Bull, though Timaeus the Historian carping at all others, by denying that there was ever any such thing, is justly censured by Diodorus. For Scipio Africanus the younger, 260 years after, having destroyed Carthage, restored this Engine to the Agrigentines, with whom it was yet remaining when Diodorus wrote his History.

And Agrigentum.

24. Imilcar having, after a Siege of eight months, thus mastered Agrigentum, a little before the Winter solstice, destroyed it not presently, that therein he might quarter his Soldiers that Winter. All the Island was struck with great fear upon report of what had happened; some of the Sicilians departed to Syracuse, and others transported their wives and children with their wealth into Italy. The Agrigentines being got safe to Syracuse, accused their Captains, as having betrayed their Country, and the Syracusians were also blamed by the rest for having chosen such Generals, as by their dishonesty had brought Sicilie into extreme danger. A meeting being had at Syracuse, and great fear of a War possessing all men's minds, none dared to speak one word, or give any advice. All sticking at the matter, at length stood up Dionysius

absolute.

Dionysius the Son of Hermocrates, and accusing the Captains of having betrayed Agrigentum, earnestly moved the People to punish them forthwith, and not stay the time prefixed by Law. For this unlawful and seditious motion, the Magistrates fined him; but one Philistus a wealthy man, who afterwards wrote his History, bade him proceed, promising to pay his fine, though it were a whole day together. Animated hereby he proceeded, urging that the Captains had been corrupted to betray the interest of Sicilie, and accusing others of the better sort of Citizens as affecting Oligarchy. He therefore moved that new Officers might be created, such as were not eminent for power, but good will towards the People, for that the other usurping dominion despised the common sort, and made their own markets out of the publick; whereas those being of lower fortunes, by a consciousness of their own weakness could not attempt such a matter.

25. Having discoursed these things fitly to the humour of the multitude, and his own design, he made no small impression in the minds of the Vulgar, who having had the fidelity of the Captains in question before, gave credence to these slanders, and deposing them, made new, amongst which was Dionysius, having got much credit for his valour against the Carthaginians. The foundation thus laid, he beat his head all manner of waies how to accomplish his device, and resolved if possible to get his Colleagues removed. For this purpose he never would meet in council with them, giving out they hatched clandestine designs against the State, and seeing the Citizens much affrighted at an approaching War, procured the Exiles to be called home, hoping that they being obnoxious to him, and desirous of innovation, would be fit for his purpose, taking great delight in seeing their Enemies killed, and their goods sold, their own Estates being restored to them. At this time it happened that a Sedition falling out in Gela, he had an opportunity to lead thither 2000 Foot, and 400 Horse, where procuring their principal men to be put to death, and their Estates confiscated, he thereby much ingratiated himself with the multitude and Soldiers. At his return he found the People just departing from the shows of the Theatre, which asking him news, he said he knew none, but that their Governours were greater Enemies to the State than the Carthaginians, by whose flatteries they now kept holy day, and who fleecing the Commonwealth, cheated the Soldiers of their wages. Now was an innumerable Army hovering upon the borders, and ready to invade, which they not at all regarded. This he understood a little before, but now fully, having received a message from Imilco that desired his connivance. Wherefore for his part he would lay down his Office, not induring that others making merchandize of the Commonwealth, he alone should, together with the Citizens, bear the burthen, and undergo the danger; and yet also be accounted as treacherous as the rest. For this night every man in great fear went home to his house. The next day he called them together, and loading his Colleagues with great invectives, so stirred the multitude, that some beginning to cry out he was to be made Dictator, for that they had formerly had experience how convenient the conduct of a single Person was, by the example of Gelon his Victory over Amilcar; the multitude out of hand created him General with full power. Then to bind fast the Soldiers to him, he procured a Decree for double pay, alleging it would make them more valiant in that time of danger, and bidding the People take no thought about raising money.

26. The wiser sort had all along sufficiently understood whither these actions tended, but the multitude stopped their ears against all accusations, as proceeding from the malice of the great ones. But now upon further consideration they began to suspect him, and repent they had put the power out of their own hands, which he being aware of, lest the discontent should so seize upon the generality as thereby to procure him any let or hindrance in the full compleating his design, he drew out the Army to Leontium, which now was used as a Fortresse or Garrison, and there shutting himself close up, pretended a great conspiracy against his life. The day following he called the multitude together, and alleging many probable reasons to perswade them of the danger, obtained to have 600 men as a guard for his person, which he should chuse out where he pleased. This number he increased to 1000, picked out, and consisting of such as were desperate in fortune, and thereupon backed with stomach and resolution. He called the Mercenaries, and engaged them to him with good words, then new modelling the Army, gave such commands therein as he knew would best serve his own turn: he gave free admission to all Exiles and malefactors, knowing such would be effectual to all his purposes. Having thus in imitation of Pisistratus got him a guard, and made himself Tyrant, at his return to Syracuse he openly shewed himself such, placing his Tent in the Arcenal. The People murmured in vain, being beset with strangers and mercenaries at home, and in continual fear of a War hanging over them from abroad. To establish himself he took to wife the daughter of Hermocrates, who did such service against the Athenians, and was slain in attempting to seize on the City: he also gave his own Sister in marriage to his wives Brother, thinking it his interest to be allied to so great a Family. Then assembling the People, by his devices he procured Daphneus and Demarchus the most potent of his Adversaries to be put to death; and so from a Scribe and a man of mean condition, he became Master of the greatest Greek Cirie, continuing such for 38 years, unto his end.

27. Imilcar having wintred in Agrigentum, at Spring-time razed the City, and then fell upon Gela. The Inhabitants betook themselves to Dionysius for help; but his indeavours not well succeeding, they were forced to quit the Town, and leave it also to the disposal of the Enemy. Dionysius made the Citizens of Camarina to do the same, possessing them with a fear of the Carthaginians; so that departing thence in haste, some with their Gold and Silver, others with their wives and children onely, and the wayes being full of both sexes and ages, who miserably shunned servitude by exile, the Syracusan Horse-men picied them exceedingly, and accounting this but a fetch of their Tyrant, to make himself Master of the place, conspired how they might kill him in the way, and the rather, because they had observed how remisse, or rather industriously treacherous, he had been in the relief of Gela. He keeping the Mercenaries close to him, they could not execute this design, but rode fast to Syracuse, where being easily admitted, they rifled his Palace, and used his wife very harshly that she died. Being secure of him as at a great distance from them, he conjectured the same, and in post-haste coming to Syracuse, set fire on one of gates, and so got in. Then slaughtered he such of them as he could light on, as also of those Citizens whom he knew to be most averse to him, some he slew, and others he expelled the Town. Scarce were things settled, when a message came from Imilcar, inviting the Syracusians, though conquered, unto Peace. Dionysius most gladly imbraced the offer, so that it was made upon these terms: The Carthaginians were to have subject to them, besides their old Tributaries and Colonies, the Sicani, Selinuntians, Agrigentines, and Himerians, and also the Gelaens, and Camarineans, who might inhabit their Towns unvalled, but be tributary to Carthage. The Leontines, Messenians, and all Sicilians, were to be free, and the Syracusians subject to Dionysius. All ships taken on both sides were to be restored. These things confirmed, Imilcar passed over into Africk, having lost half of his Army by the Plague, which so raged also in Africk, as great multitudes both of the Carthaginians and their Associates fell thereby.

28. Dionysius knowing that the Syracusians now eased of the War, would busie their heads how to recover their liberty, to prevent such a design, fortified that part of the City called the Island, which he caused to be inhabited with his own confidants: he also divided the publick grounds to such as he thought fit, and admitted strangers to equal privileges with the Citizens. Having thus as he thought secured his estate, he resolved to march against such Sicilians as he thought most assisted the Carthaginians, and was about to besiege Erbessa, when the Citizens of Syracuse now armed, considering what an opportunity was put into their hands, and repenting they had not assisted the Horsemen in their revolt, resolved to declare for their liberty. The attempt generally took, the Citizens stood upon their defence, and the Tyrant was besieged, for whose head a great sum of money was offered. He was much cast down, and thought to resign his power, according as some advised him; but Phelistus turned his mind, and made him resolve to venture all rather than do it. Berhinking himself how he might circumvent the Citizens, he sent to them, pretending a willingness to quit all, if they would but permit him to carry away his goods; and at the same time he dispatched a message to the Campanians (mercenary Soldiers of Campania in Italy) offering them large rewards if they would stand by him. The Syracusians consented he should depart with five ships, and then, as if their liberty was fully recovered, grew secure, remiss, and idle, disbanding some of their men, neglecting their guards, and taking their pleasure in the fields: The Campanians allured by his promises broke in to him, some Troops of Mercenaries also came to his assistance, with which he set upon the Towns-men, and easily putting them to flight recovered his power. He hindered his men from killing, and a great number flying to Aetna, he sent to them, offering them pardon, which some embraced, and others refused to venture themselves upon it.

29. When he had well re-settled himself, he made War upon several Towns in Sicilie, some of which he took, and having an eye upon the Carthaginians, strongly fortified his City of Syracuse. He resolved with himself to make War upon them, hoping that all those Towns which in time of Peace willingly submitted to their yolk, would then revolt to him. Understanding that in the Athenian War a line had been drawn before Syracuse, from Sea to Sea, and thereby access into the Country cut off, with admirable celerity he raised a wall to prevent this for the time to come, labouring himself amongst the workmen, to cause them the more chearfully to undergo the toil: Then did he make extraordinary provisions of all sorts of Arms, compleatly furnished himself with shipping, and hired Soldiers from all parts. Thus provided, he caused all the goods of the Carthaginian Marchants, and others dwelling there, to be seized by the multitude of the Syracusians, to whom now he carried himself more mildly, being very ready to begin the War; especially upon so profitable terms. Other Sicilian Towns followed his example, out of hatred to the Carthaginians for their cruelty, of whom such as were amongst them they unmercifully handled in way of requital, which taught that State to deal more favourably afterwards with such as they took, in remembrance of the vicissitude of humane affaires. Then dispatched he a messenger to Carthage, to denounce war from the people of Syracuse, except they would set at liberty all the Greek Cities of Sicilie. They were much struck therewith, being exceedingly spent by Pestilence, but rejected the terms, and as they might, made provision for resistance. Dionysius besieged Morya one of their Colonies, and chief Fortresse for War; upon whose ships Imilco, as yet not sufficiently provided, made an attempt, and beating up the Camp presently retired again; so that Dionysius became Master of the Town.

30. Ere he had taken Morya he besieged Agesta, the Inhabitants whereof would not betray their trust, and made excursions into the Territories of their Friends. But the Spring following the Carthaginians having created Imilco King, sent him over with a vast Army, wherewith he first wrosted Lepines, whom Dionysius had commanded to attend his motions; then took Eryx, and presently recovered Morya. He had Panormus betrayed to him: he took Lipara, and after that Messana with his ships, the Inhabitants having sent their Forces out of the Town to meet his Land-Army. When he took Morya, Dionysius brake up his Siege and retreated to Syracuse; now hearing that he intended to set upon Catana both by Sea and Land, he sent Lepines with the Fleet after Mago the Carthaginian Admiral, and he himself marched by Land to meet with Imilco. Lepines according to order made after as

He therefore returned to the Citie, and dispatched away Messengers into Greece and Italy for aid.

Syracuse besieged.

31. Mago by Sea with nigh 200 ships, and Imilco by Land with 300000 foot, and 3000 horse, besieged Syracuse, who for that the Citizens refused to give battel, waited their grounds for 30 dayes, and after that took the Suburbs of that part of the Citie called Acradina. His Army was taken with a sudden Pannick fear, and seized by a sore disease; yet notwithstanding he drew a line for the Fortification of his Camp, and built three Forts upon the Sea, wherein he put his provisions, and sent into Sardinia and Africk for more. Afterwards Polyxenus father-in-law to Dionysius returning out of Peloponnesus and Italy with 30 long ships, and Pharacidas the Lacedemonian, to the assistance of the Syracusians, they took a victualling ship from the Carthaginians. They doing their endeavour to rescue it, the Syracusians drew out their whole Fleet, and ingaging, took the Admiral Gally, and spoyled 24 Vessels. After this the Carthaginians durst not stir abroad, and the Syracusians puffed up with this victory, thought of recovering their former liberty. Dionysius coming in at the Port, called them together, encouraged them in the War, and gave them hopes of finishing it shortly to their satisfaction. Here before his face, one Theodorus in many words exhorted his fellow Citizens to throw off the yolk, and either take the Militia into their own hands according to the Laws, or deliver it up to the Lacedemonian General. But Pharacidas the Lacedemonian, according to his instructions from his Superiours (who had now established an Oligarchy wherever they could, agreeable with their own Government and interest, or gave way to the power of a single man rather than that of the people) said openly, that he was sent to help them against the Carthaginians, and not to overthrow the power of Dionysius; so that the people were at so unexpected a thing utterly quelled, murmuring much against the Lacedemonians, who had now twice deceived them in the recovery of their freedom. Dionysius affrighted hereat, made shew afterwards of great humanity, to gain the affections of the people.

Another attempt against him.

Frustrated.

32. The Carthaginians were at this time seized with a most grievous Plague, which Diodorus attributeth to their rifling the Temples of Proserpina and Ceres, as the Meritorious cause, and to the unwholesomnesse of the place beset with Fens, as the effectual means that wrought the distemper.

A grievous plague seizeth on the Carthaginians.

A grievous disease had formerly fallen upon the Athenians in the same place. For before Sun-rise, because of a cold vapour that rose from the Fens, a cold and shaking seized on the body, then at noon a suffocating heat. So many men being gathered together into one place, the contagion first began with the Africans, who, though they died in great numbers, were at first all buried. Afterwards the number increasing, such as looked to the sick dying also shortly after them, none would venture to come near the infected. But besides want of attendance, no remedy could be had for the evil. For from the stench of the dead, and putrefaction of the Fennish aire, in the beginning of the disease a Cararrhe, and then presently an Angina, or swelling of the neck, took the patient. These were followed by a Fever, pains in the Spina, and numnesse of the legs, which drew after them a Dysenterie, and Spots over all the body. Some were taken with madnesse, and abolition of memory, who wandring up and down the Camp bear all they met. At length all the endeavours of Physicians were void, through the vehemence of the disease, and suddenesse of death, for on the fifth, or at furthest on the sixth day they died in great torment. Dionysius understanding this sad condition of the besiegers, thought it convenient to sally out upon them, and sent 80 ships to fall on

on their Navy. The Land Army first arriving took two of their Forts, and diverted them from their ships, which as soon as they saw in danger, they again retired to them; but with little advantage. For the Syracusians boarded and slaughtered them in great numbers, and Dionysius, with his Land Army, fired 40 of their Gallies that rode at Anchor in the Haven of Dasco. The night approaching broke off the fight, and then the Carthaginians sent to Dionysius 300 Talents, begging leave to depart; which he granted (with exception to all Sicilians and other Mercenaries) being unwilling they should be quite defeated, that through fear of them his Subjects might be the better contained in obedience. After the flight of the Carthaginians, the Sicilians departed home, and all the rest were slain or taken, except the Spaniards, who gathering themselves into a round body, sent to Dionysius to enter into Alliance with him; which he accepted.

33. Dionysius being secure of the Carthaginians for some considerable time, provided against his Mercenaries, which badly affecting him, he prevented, by taking of their Leader, and bestowing on them the Citie and Territories of Leontium. Then did he make new Leavies, and replanted Messana with its ancient Inhabitants the Messenians; but seeing the Lacedaemonians his friends offended with it, he removed them to another place near the Sea, which they called Lyndarides, and wherein they did thrive exceedingly, Conquering, and laying several places to their demesnes. Having fortified Messana, the Inhabitants of Rhegium (who formerly jealous of his growth, had shown their bad affection to him) conceived it to proceed from some design against their Citie, which stood over against it in Italy, upon the very Crag of the Promontory, where Sicily was supposed to have been broken off from the Continent, whence it had the name of Rhegium. They sent Hectoris to besiege Messana, whereupon he determined to make War against them; but the Sicilians seizing upon Tauromenium, he first resolved to recover it. He continuing his siege all Winter, in a dark night got a certain Fort into his hands, and made way for all his Army into the Town; but the Inhabitants gathering together, and resisting, from the higher ground, beat back his men, whereof 600 were slain, and he himself escaped very narrowly, after which the Agrigentines and Messenians forsook him. The year after, he set upon Rhegium on a sudden; burnt the Gates, and set Ladders to the Walls; but was repulsed by the strong opposition of the Citizens. By this the Inhabitants of these Sea-Coasts of Italy, seeing how far his covetousnesse and ambition extended, made a League amongst themselves, and appointed a common Council, both for the resistance of him and the Lucanians, who made War upon them at the same time.

34. Mago was yet in Sicily, and was once overthrown in battel by Dionysius. The year following his Superiours sent over great supplies, gathered as well out of Sardinia and Italy, as Africk, to the number of 80000 men, wherewith he overran the Countrey, and withdrew molt of the Cities from their obedience, till he came to the Agyrineans, whom he could neither remove by fair nor foul means from their resolution. Dionysius with his Mercenaries and Syracusians marched out against him, sending before to the Agyrineans to be in readinesse, who thereupon met him, and joyned their Forces with his Army. Mago now in an Enemy's Countrey was sore straightened for provisions, which made the other resolve to draw out the War in length, and not try his fortune quickly by battel. The Syracusians being earnest for fighting, upon his refusal forsook him and departed home. This put him upon a resolution to make free and lift all slaves, but even then came Ambassadors from Mago to treat of peace, which he accepted upon this condition, that the Sicilians should be under his authority; and so Mago returned home. After this Dionysius seized on Tauromenium, and then banished the greatest part of the Sicilians from that Town.

dition against Rhegium. He landed his Army, consisting of 20000 foot and 1000 horse in the Territories of Locrus, waiting all with fire and sword, his Navy, which consisted of 120 Gallies, attending his motions all along, till at length he pitched his Camp near the Straights. The Italians inhabiting that part of Italy called Magna Gracia, hereupon dispatched away sixty ships to help them of Rhegium, upon which he fell, and had taken or destroyed them, but that the besieged issuing forth, repelled him with Darts and Arrows, and taking the opportunity of a storm, drew the ships to Land; so that in this fight he lost seven ships with 1500 men, and escaping drowning but narrowly, fled to Messena. Then Winter drawing on, he made a League with the Lucanians, who after his departure, for a private quarrel betwixt them, invaded the Thurians. These sending for aid to the rest of the Italian Cities, would not stay for it, which they might justly expect according to Covenant, but issuing out against the Enemy, pursued them into their own Territories, who then taking them at advantage cut off many thousands of them. The rest seeing some ships sayl by, cast themselves into the Sea to swim to them, thinking they belonged to Rhegium. But it proved Dionysius his Fleet sent under conduct of his brother Leptines to aid the Lucanians; yet Leptines took pity of them, and landed them safe; he also perswaded the Lucanians for a pound of silver a man to release their Prisoners, passing his word for the money, and at length made them friends. But hereby he lost the favour of his brother (who hoped to devour both sides, and make himself master of Italy, when they should have sufficiently weakned one another) so that, being displaced, Thearides the other brother was made Admiral in his stead.

His third expedition.

36. Dionysius his mind was still upon Rhegium, to which Citie he bore mortal hatred, because some years before having sent to them for a wife, they returned him answer, that their Hang-man had a daughter, which if it pleased him to accept they would give to him. Therefore the year following he set sayl once more against them, who then looking for no mercy in case he should take the Town, sent to him, desiring they might be moderately used. He required a Tribute of 300 Talents, all their ships, with 100 Hostages, and then went against Caulonia, the Inhabitants whereof he removed to Syracuse, razed the Town, and bestowed the ground upon the Locrians. But his design was not thus accomplished against them of Rhegium; his resolution was not to dismiss them upon the former terms, but by taking away their ships to prevent the bringing in of provisions by Sea, that he might the more easily starve them in a siege. Bethinking himself how with any shew of credit he might break the League, at length hovering yet about the Straights, he desired a supply of provisions from them, pretending he would shortly return to Syracuse; but he put it off from day to day, excusing himself by his own indisposition, or some other pretext, so that plainly seeing his drift, at length they flatly denied to send him any more victuals. This he pretending to receive with great indignation as an affront, he laid close siege to the Town, and battered the Walls. The Inhabitants making one Physo their General, armed all that could carry Weapons, and making many brave sallies out upon him, burnt his Engines, and gave him a dangerous wound with a Lance. But the siege continuing, after eleven moneths they were driven to such want, as a Bushel of Wheat was sold for ten pounds, &c at length they were forced to come out of the Walls, and there graze like Cattel, whereat he was so far from being moved with compassion, that he sent beasts thither to eat up the Grasse from them. Great heaps of Carcasses lying in the Town, and the visages of the living being by famine rendred like unto them, they at last delivered up the Town. Such as could redeem themselves with a pound of silver he released, and sold the rest. Physo the General, after grievous torments, he drowned in the Sea, with his whole family.

Olymp.

Olympick games, there to repeat his Verses, which by their baldness drew the auditors into such a distast, that they rifled the Ambassador's tents. He called together the best Poets from all quarters to judge of his skill. He also drew over to him Plato the Philosopher, whom at first he used very courteously, but afterwards offended at him for his freedom of speech, he brought him into the common Cage, and there for five pounds sold him as a Slave. The Philosophers coming over on purpose redeemed him, and then sent him into Greece with this memento in his ear, That A Philosopher must either very rarely, or very pleasantly converse with Tyrants. A year or two after this he put out to Sea with 60 Vessels, pretending an intention to clear the Coasts of Pirates, but wanting money, according to his custom towards the Temples of Sicilie, he seized upon a Chapel near Argylla, on the Coasts of Italy, which being exceeding rich, he plundered of 1000 Talents, and got much spoil from the Inhabitants of the place, who opposed him. Being now furnished with money, he resolved to renew the War against the Carthaginians, and the next year drew divers of their tributary Cities from their obedience. The Carthaginians made great preparations for defense, raising a numerous Army, which they committed to the conduct of Mago. He poured out a great number of men both into Sicilie and Italy. In the Island, Dionysius overthrew him in a battel near Cabala, wherein were slain more than 10000 of his men, and 5000 taken: he himself with the rest retired to an hill, where fighting manfully he was slain, and his men sent to Dionysius to desire Peace.

38. Dionysius answered, that the onely way to obtain their desire, was to quit Sicilie, and pay the charges of the War. To this he seemed to assent, but alledged they had no power to deliver up the Cities, and therefore desired a truce for some time to advise about it. During the truce, Mago's son being advanced into his Father's place, trained the Soldiers, and exercised them continually, so as he brought them into a good condition for fighting, and then at the end of the Truce led them down, and gave battel in stead of receiving Peace. Now were the Sicilians so puffed up by their late Victory, as the other took advantage of their carelesness, and so played the men, that though Dionysius in his wing, and Leptines his brother in the other, fought most valiantly, and the former prevailed; yet the later being slain, his party was presently put to flight, in which great execution was done, the Carthaginians giving no quarter; so as 14000 Sicilians are said to have been slain. The Conquerours departed to Panormus, and thence sent to Dionysius, offering to have the quarrel taken up, which he gladly imbraced. Both sides were to retain what they already had, onely the Carthaginians took to themselves the City and Territories of Selinus, with so much ground belonging to Agrigentum as reached to the River Helycus, and required of Dionysius 1000 Talents. Long after this he rested from War, but still grudging the Carthaginians any footing in Sicilie. This moved him at length with great preparations both by Sea and Land to invade their Territories, wherein he took some Towns, wasted the Country, and besieged Lilybaum; but perceiving it very strong presently again rose up from before it. Then hearing that the Arcenal at Carthage was fired, he carelessly behaved himself, and sent 130 Gallies to seize on the Haven of the Erycinians, commanding all the rest to return to Syracuse; but the Enemy unexpectedly with 200 Ships well manned, fell upon them in the Haven, and took most of them; then winter coming on, they made Truce, and each departed to their own places. Not long after, Dionysius died of a Surfer he got by feasting, for joy he was pronounced Victor in Poetry at Athens, after he had reigned 38 years, in the first of the 103 Olympiad, A. M. 3637. 366 before the ordinary Aera of Christ. It had been told him by an Oracle, that he should die when he overcame his betters, which he had applied to the Carthaginians.

When he lay sick, Dion inquired of the Physicians concerning his condition, whether he was in any danger, that if so, he might move him about the sharing of his Kingdom; for that he thought his sisters children might justly expect their part therein. The Physicians told this to young Dionysius, who found himself so concern'd in it, that to prevent his Father's discouraging with Dion, he compelled them to give him that which laid him so fast asleep as he never could awake, and so he solely succeeded him.

40. Dionysius the younger at first gave such hopes of a pliable disposition, that Dion prevailed with Plato to return to Syracuse, thinking that by his instruction he might be made a good and temperate Prince. But Dion's emulators fearing he might be changed from his former course, which though bad in it self was more convenient for them, recalled Philisthus (one who was banished by the late Dionysius, and being a learned man, wrote the history of his life) that they might have one to oppose to Plato. He according to what was enjoined, and his private interest, upheld him in his extravagances, as many other flattering Philosophers did; especially Aristippus of Cyrene the Scholar of Socrates, who had so great a command of his own temper, that he could apply himself suitably to all times and persons. Plato, when he came, found Dion in great troubles, being for his nobility and courage both envied and feared by Dionysius, who, four moneths after, seeing the People much addicted to him, banished him to Corinth, pretending he sent him thither for the good of them both, that one might be out of fear of the other. Because he saw that this displeased all men, he sent him all his movables, but kept his wife and his son, marrying her afterwards by constraint to Polycrates one of his Guard. This much startled Dion's friends, and Plato amongst the rest, by whom Dionysius fearing that something might underhand be wrought against him, gave them good words, and laboured to keep Plato, who earnestly desired now that War was begun in Sicilie to be dismissed; especially seeing his mind far remote from the love of Philosophy. By his importunity he got leave to depart, upon condition that, when Peace was made, Dion should be recalled, and he return with him.

41. When the time came, Dionysius earnestly desired the return of Plato, but would have Dion discontinue a year longer, who earnestly besought Plato to return to Syracuse, for that it was reported that the Prince now was wonderfully taken with Philosophy. He stiffly refused to do it, objecting his age, with the breach of Covenants, but being again urged on all sides, a ship was sent for him, and large letters were written, wherein the Tyrant promised to deal with Dion as his friends should judge reasonable; many of the best sort also in Sicilie and his acquaintance were sent to accompany him over. Wherefore Plato once more undertook the journey, with intention to reconcile Dion to Dionysius, and reduce the Tyrant to a more strict and commendable life. But not long after his arrival Dionysius stopped Dion's Revenues, which Plato taking ill, once prevailed to have the stoppage removed, for otherwise he would be gone; but when the ships were departed, and Plato's passage thereby prevented, he again sequestered the Estate. After this he fell plainly out with Plato, for holding that faith was to be kept with Heraclides, who was suspected to have raised a Sedition, and put him out of his Court, so as the Philosopher was glad to take up his quarters with the mercenary Soldiers, amongst whom also slanders were spread concerning him, whence he signified his condition to his friends at Tarentum in Italy, who with much ado prevailed with the Tyrant to send him home safe. Such was the entertainment of Plato with Dionysius both father and son.

42. Though Dionysius had left to him an hereditary War with the Carthaginians, yet giving up himself wholly to luxury and sluggishness, he was unfit to manage publick affairs, and therefore made peace with them. But

Dione.Dion invadeth
Sicilie.

Dion being now at Corinth, together with Megacles his brother, and Charicles the General of Dionysius, raised as many Mercenaries as he could, which not in number passing 500, he transported in two ships of burthen into Sicilie, leaving Charicles (or rather Hercules) behind, to bring after more ships; such was his courage, that he durst venture with so inconsiderable a force upon so great a power. After his landing, multitudes flocked to him as he passed through the Island, and out of Syracuse it self, whom Dionysius in suspicion had disarmed. To them he gave weapons, having brought many over with him for such a purpose. By the time he got unto the City he was 5000 strong, which he easily entred, notwithstanding the opposition of those Captains that Dionysius had left there, who at this time was upon the Coasts of Italy. Upon his declaring to the People that he came to restore them to their ancient liberty, they made him and Megacles their chief Generals with full power. Dionysius seven dayes after returned and got into the Castle, which standing in the Island was severed from the rest of the City, whence he sent for Ambassadors to treat of Peace, that he might gain time. The People overreached, sent their Commissioners, whom he kept with him, till seeing the Citizens negligent and carelesse by reason of their hopes, he poured out his Mercenaries upon them; but Dion with much labour repelled them, and slew 800 men. After this he sent again to desire a Treaty, but Dion answered, that his onely way to obtain peace was to lay down his power, and content himself with certain honours; whereat he was much vexed, and took counsel how any way he might revenge himself.

He expelleth

43. Philistus whom he had made Admiral, fought with the Syracusians, now not inferiour to him in number of ships, and losing the day lost also his life; having either killed himself, because he would not be taken, or been tormented to death, after he fell into his Enemies hands, both which are said. Then did Dionysius offer half of his Kingdom to Dion, and afterward was content to quit it all; but he was answered by him, that he must leave the Castle, and be content with certain goods and honours: and it was agreed, that with his movables and Mercenary Soldiers he should have leave to passe into Italy. The People hardly granted this, as being confident to subdue him by force; but he leaving some stout men to defend the Castel, departed in the twelfth year of his Reign, with his treasure and rich stuff into Italy, undiscovered by Heraclides, who ere this arrived out of Peloponnesus with a good force, and was set over the Navy. Heraclides being much blamed for this, that he might re-ingratiare himself, perswaded one to stir up the multitude to an equal division of the grounds, which being opposed by Dion, he out of emulation procured him ill-will, and caused the People to create 25 Prætors, whereof he himself was chosen one. Dion's Mercenaries by this new Model deprived of their pay, desired him to use their help in revenging himself upon his ingrateful Country-men. He then took upon him to be their Leader, and marched away to Leontium. The Syracusians pursued, and opposed them in their way; but being forced with losse to retire, the Leontines received him with much honour, gave to the Soldiers their arrears, and made them free of their City.

44. But ere long there was an occasion for the recalling of Dion. The Soldiers whom Dionysius had left in the Castle of Syracuse, being distressed by want of provisions, resolved over night, that the next day they would yield it up; but that very morning appeared a Fleet sent to their relief, over which Nipsius a Neapolitan had the command. The Syracusians issuing forth against it, had the better; but then growing secure, and giving up themselves to gormandizing and drunkenness, Nipsius thought a good opportunity to be offered for the redeeming of his credit, and fell upon the City, sending some over the wall, who killing the sentinels, opened the gates for his Soldiers. The new Captains of the Syracusians being drunk, could take no order for resistance, so as great slaughters were made in every place, the Garrison Soldiers issuing out of the Castel, and great plunder with many prisoners were taken away. Now the Citizens saw that no help remained for them, but onely in Dion, to whom they sent, begging of him, that laying aside all thoughts of private injuries, he would now succour his distressed Country. He being armed by precepts of Philosophy against private grudges, marched for Syracuse, and was met by a number of old men, women, and children, who with lamentable cries implored his help. As the Garrison Soldiers were busie in plunder, and had set the houses near the Forum on fire, he brake in upon them, distributing his men to the several quarters of the City. They fell upon them all in disorder, and burthened with plunder, killed 4000; and so forcing up the rest into the Castel, cleared all.

Enviied

45. Dion having achieved much honour by this act, was made General of the Land Forces; but Heraclides his emulator still retained his Admirallship. This vexed him so, that he gave out some words that a Common-wealth could not be well governed by many, which procured him great envy, as if he thereby signified that he would get the Sovereignty over all. He studied not how to palliate the matter, but sought to cary on all things by an high hand, and in a way of force; and either procured Heraclides to be made away, or connived at those whom he formerly hindred from doing it; after which he seized on the goods of his Enemies, and distributed them to his Soldiers. But presently again money failing him, and having none to run upon but his friends, he was constrained either to lose them or his Soldiers, who being also displeased for want of pay, the common People might safely revile him, affirming that the Tyrant was not to be endured. Whilst he with thoughts of these things tormented himself, came to him one Callicrates (or Callippus) an Athenian, a most cunning dissembler and irreligious person. He told him, that seeing he was in such danger, both in reference to Soldiers and People, his best way was to have some friend, who counterfeiting himself his Enemy, should hold intelligence with his adversaries, and thereby discover all their plots and practices against him. This part, by Dion's consent, he took upon himself, and under this pretence really and indeed practised his destruction, which Dion's wife and sister hearing of, therewith acquainted him; but he regarded them not, giving too much credit to what Callicrates had promised. The women neverthelesse brought Callicrates into the Temple of Proserpina, and there made him swear, that he had not at all plotted against Dion's life; but he minding no Religion, but being egged on more forward to the accomplishment of his design, sent certain young men, natives of Zachynthus, in to him, whilst he was private in his chamber, who being easily admitted, for the knowledge his family had of them, fell upon and presently bound him: but being unarmed could not kill him, till one Lycus a Syracusan reached them a Sword in at a window; his Guard hearing, but stirring not. He died in the 55 year of his age, and the fourth after his return out of Peloponnesus, being much lamented after his death, though before called Tyrant, and what ever else could expresse him odious.

46. Callicrates after Dion's death seized on the Principality, which he held but thirteen moneths; for then Hipparinus son to Dionysius the elder, by Aristomache Dion's sister, expelled him, and placed himself in his father's Kingdom, which he enjoyed two years. Callippus (or Callicrates) with Leptines went against Rhegium, which was held by a Garrison of Dionysius his Soldiers, which taking, he was there slain by Leptines, and Polypharchus, it's said, with the same sword wherewith Dion was killed. After Hipparinus, Nasaus obtained the Sovereignty over Syracuse, and then Dionysius recovered it in the tenth year after his expulsion. In this time of his exile he made himself Lord of Locri, where his mother was born, and tyrannized over the Inhabitants six years in a most cruel manner; ravishing their Virgins, and playing other pranks suitable to his disposition. There he raised a Company of men, and coming over on a sodain to Syracuse, where finding all men in deep security, he expelled Nasaus, and erected his Tyranny afresh. When he was gone, the Locrians expelled his Garrison, and in revenge for his ravishing their Virgins tormented his wife and two daughters ters to death, by thrusting sharp Needles under their Finger Nails. The Commonwealth of these Locrians being very famous, is commended much by the antients, not onely Diodorus Siculus and Strabo, but more ancient than they, as Plato and Demosthenes; the former in his discourse which he maketh to have been betwixt Socrates and Timaeus a Locrian Philosopher of the Pythagorean Sect, concerning the nature of things, and Original of the World; and the later in his Oration against Timocrates, an Author of new and pernicious Laws. Something is therefore according to the nature of our design to be said of it.

47. Zaleucus (as he was accounted) a wise, just, and honest man, born of an Eminent family at Locri, was the modeller of this Commonwealth. Ensebius thinketh he flourished about the 29th Olympiad, but Diodorus and several others making him a Scholar of Pythagoras, who taught in Magna Græcia, reckon him as Contemporary with Charondas the Law-giver of the Thurians, another of Pythagoras his Scholars, and who is famous for the strictness and severity of his Laws, which he is said to have confirmed by his death in the same manner as Diocles did his; the same story being told of him. According to their account he must have flourished about the 80th Olympiad. In the beginning of his Laws, or his Preface to them, this to some appeareth to have been his design; to affect the minds of his people with piety towards God, as the Original of all Right and Justice, the Lord and Governour of Heaven and Earth, as also an hater and punisher of wickedness. Then mentioned he Laws, not very many in number, but most effectual for the defence of Justice, restraining Vice, preserving concord and tranquillity in the State, preventing innovations, and for the establishment of themselves; which as long as observed (and they were observed long) preserved the Commonwealth in safety. He thought a few stable and unalterable Laws well obeyed, to be more profitable for a State than an infinite multitude of weak ones, which are easily changed by those that have a mind to innovate, and he concluded, that the speediest way to the ruin of a Commonwealth was by change and innovation. That his opinion was true, the example of Athens abundantly demonstrated, which erring in this point paid dearly for it, as Demosthenes often complaineth; and Rome also, which being infected with this itching distemper, at length was constrained to submit to the power of one man. It being almost impossible, but that popular Governments should rotter, what ever might happen to this inconsiderable Citie. He commanded his Laws to be strictly observed, and the Magistrate to proceed according to the Letter of them, without giving his own glosse, or pronouncing sentence according to his private fancy. To this purpose is most memorable of all his Laws, that which Demosthenes and * Polybius relate concerning one who should afterwards prefer a new Law, abrogate any old one, alter any thing in it, or dispute concerning the meaning of it. He was to come into the Council of 1000 men with an halter about his neck, where speaking his mind, if to them he should demonstrate his opinion to be profitable for the State, then was he to be dismissed safe, and the Law admitted; but if it should appear contrary, then was he to be strangled forthwith in the sight of the Council.

The form thereof.

48. Zaleucus chose 1000 men out of all the people, in whom he appointed the Supream power to reside. It is not to be doubted but he ordained also a Senate of a far lesse number, by which dayly and lesser matters should be dispatched: that there were also certain Magistrates and Courts of Justice, which had orders prescribed to them, we need not question; though we find one onely Magistrate in * Polybius, called Cosmopolis, who seemeth either to have presided in the Senate, or the greater Council. Zaleucus took care for preventing dissensions amongst Citizens, pride in the greater ones, and either favour or hatred in Courts of Justice. For to cut off the pride and vanity of women, he forbade any to go abroad with more than one waiting woman, except she were either drunk, went out of the Citie by night, or betook her self to an Adulterer; to deck her self either with costly apparel, ex-

49. (a) Demosthenes maketh mention of another Law, commanding that he who struck out his Neighbours eye should be punished with the losse of one of his own, as a Lex talionis. It hapned that a naughty man bearing a grudge to his Neighbour that had but one eye, threatned him to strike it out, though with the losse of one of his own. The poor man terrified exceedingly herewith, and judging continual blindness worse than death, with a rope about his neck came into the Council, and asked a Law, that whosoever should strike out his eye that had but one, or deprive him of the use of one who was pur-blind, should lose both his own, or be punished with the like calamity and losse that he should bring upon his Neighbour. This as just he easily obtained, and this was the onely new Law which in 200 years time was brought in, the Insolency of innovators being repressed by the severity of the former constitution, as the Orator observeth. Another there was, that a thing controverted should remain in the possession of him whose it was when the sute commenced, till such time as a definitive sentence passed; concerning which

(a) Contra Timara.

(b) Polybius telleth a notable story of two men that contending about a slave, the one having had him long in possession, the other got him into his hands two dayes before the tryal, and then the former went and taking him away, possessed him the second time. The Judges referred the matter as an hard case to the Cosmopolis, who determined in favour of the first and last possessor; but the other contended with him about the sense of the Law, to whom he offered that both of them should go with ropes about their necks and dispute about it. The young man told him, he was old, and expecting but three or four years longer to live, dying now would be no great losse to him, whereas he expecting a far longer time, according to the course of nature, should have the far worse bargain; with which facete reply he handsomely ended the dispute, and the Judges confirmed the opinion of the Cosmopolis. (c) Aristotle mentioneth a Law of Zaleucus, which forbid inheritances to be sold except in urgent necessity, and this was to be proved, which Law being neglected amongst the Leucadians, made their Government degenerate into too much Popularity. (d) Heraclides mentioneth other two, whereof the one forbid mourning for the dead; it being the custom of the Locrians to feast after Funerals. The other inhibited all retailing shops, commanding Husband-men to sell their own Commodities. This was the form of the Commonwealth of Locri, called Epizephyrii, from the Promontory Zephyrium near adjoyning, being a Colony of Locri (e) Ozola, one of the two Locri of Phocis in Greece: whereof the other was called Locri Opuntii and Epicnemidii. Dionysius the elder having got footing in Italy, made himself master of this place; but yet left them to their own freedom, but Dionysius his son Tyrannized in the manner aforesaid.

The Syracusians beg aid of the Corinthians.

50. When Dionysius recovered his Principality over Syracuse, the Citizens were more inclining to one Hicetas born amongst them, who at that time was Lord of Leontium; yet notwithstanding all their attempts he kept his possession. But within awhile the Carthaginians from without invaded them, being thus at odds within amongst themselves, which constrained the Syracusians to send, and beg aid of Corinth their Metropolis. Hicetas with the Messengers sent some of his own, as desiring the same thing; but held secret intelligence with the Carthaginians. The Corinthians resolving to send

Timoleon send aid to their Colony, pitched upon Timoleon for their Captain. He was the son of Timodemus or Timenastus, of a quiet and loving disposition, but a great Enemy to such as mastered their neighbours, which he shewed effectually against his own brother, whom, having made himself Lord of Corinth by the help of some Mercenaries, he gave way to have killed, being in the room, and bursting out into tears, whilst his two companions did it. Some accounting this act as unnatural and impious, though others commended it, he thereupon abstained from all employment for twenty years, till this charge was laid upon him. Whilst he was preparing for the Expedition, Ictas dealt underhand with the Carthaginians, that he might be advanced into the place of Dionysius, wrote to Corinth to stop their proceedings, and procured the Carthaginians to send to forbid Timoleon from setting foot in Sicilie. He besieged Dionysius, but rising up upon other thoughts and returning homewards, the besieged followed him, and falling on his rear, forced him to fight. Having the better in this engagement, he killed 3000 of Dionysius his men; then pursuing the rest to Syracuse, got it all into his hands, except the Island. Timoleon being more earnestly pressed forwards by his fellow Citizens, upon discovery of Ictas his treachery, though he fell into the hands of the Carthaginians sent from him to intercept him, yet escaped, and arrived in Sicilie with ten ships, and 1200 men. The several Cities in the Island being accustomed to be deceived and ill used by others, suspected him also; but finding the Inhabitants of Adran to be part for him and part for the Carthaginians, he using admirable expedition, fell suddenly upon the Enemies Camp, which taking, he was admitted into the Town. After this diverse other places joyned with him, and with speed marching to Syracuse, he unexpectedly also broke into the City.

51. Syracuse was now held by three several parties, Timoleon's, and that of Dionysius, and Ictas, in so many several quarters; moreover the Carthaginians were in the Haven with 150 Gallies, which carried 50000 men. It troubled Timoleon to see himself overmatched, but presently things turned very well for him. Ten ships came laden with men and money from Corinth to his aid, and Mamercus Tyrant of Catana, and divers forts joyned themselves to him, which so discouraged the Carthaginians, as they weyed anchor and departed into their own dominions: Ictas being destitute of their assistance was quite discouraged, and Messana now also declared for Timoleon. Dionysius too being terrified at this his successe, sent to him, and yielded up himself with all he had into his hands, whom he suffered upon his delivery of the Castle, and laying down his Principality, to depart Corinth, some four years after the recovery of his former estate. Thenceforth, having lost all by his sluggishness, he lived in great contempt and penurie, so as he would walk up and down in poor ragged cloathes, frequent the Stewes and drinking houses, gaze upon that meat in the shambles which he had no money in his purse to buy, and at last took upon him the office of a Pedagogue, in which he might best imitate his former carriage towards his Subjects, in tyrannizing over his boyes. Ælian reporteth, that Philip of Macedon meeting meeting him on a time, asked him the reason why he kept not that great and strong Principality left him by his father; to which he answered, That his father left him that inheritance, but not his fortune, whereby he defended both himself and it. This was the end of the Tyranny of Dionysius father and son, 64 years after the first beginning of it, in the second year of the 109 Olympiad, A. M. 3661.

52. Ictas very unwilling to lose his hopes of preferment, procured the Carthaginians to return to Syracuse. Mago filled the Haven with his ships, and landing 60000 men, pitched his Camp in the City; Ictas then laid siege to the Castle, which the Corinthians now held from the resignation of Dionysius. Timoleon relieved them by provisions sent from Catana in little Vessels through the Carthaginian Fleet; whereupon Ictas and Mago drew out a strong party and besieged Catana, after whose departure, Leon Captain of the Corinthians sallied out of the Castle, and falling upon the besiegers lying in a secure and carelesse posture, killed some, and, the other flying, took Achradina the strongest quarter of the City. This the two Generals understanding, quickly faced about and returned; but missed of both places, out of desire to possesse both. Timoleon having secured Messana, returned with 4000 men towards Syracuse, whereupon Mago for fear hoisted up sails and departed for Africk, having by his lazinesse and cowardize lost a fair opportunity of reducing all Sicilie into the power of his Superiours. Afterwards Timoleon dividing his men, set upon such places of the City as Hicetas yet retained, and by force got them all into his power, without any bloodshed of his own party: then threw he down all the fortifications and monuments of the Tyrants, except Geon's Statue, calling the People to the work by a publick Crier. Then he applied himself to the making of Laws agreeable to a Popular Government, which yet he endeavoured but to little purpose so to restrain, as to prevent the inconveniencies which formerly had their rise from too much popularity. In explaining and illustrating Dioctes his Laws, he used the help of Cephalus, and Dionysius, both Corinthians. He ordained a new annual and chief Magistrate, whom he would have called the Servant of Jupiter Olympius, in memory of their recovered liberty, commanding that by his name the year should be signed, as by the Archons at Athens, and the Consuls at Rome. The first that bore this Office was Callimedes, a man of prime note, being chosen by the Suffrages of the People. Now whereas by reason of Wars, Seditions, and Banishments, the City was even exhausted, he recalled the Exiles out of Sicilie, Greece, and Asia, which being in number 10000, he increased by a far greater, consisting of Sicilians and Italians of Greekish Original, to whom being made free of the City, he distributed Lands and possessions.

53. Iccetas having retired to Leontium, Timoleon laid siege to that City; but finding it strongly manned, rose up from before it, and went about to other places, to which he restored liberty, expelling their Tyranni. In this mean while Iccetas went against Syracuse; but was forced to retreat with great losse. Timoleon's renown was by this time so spread abroad, that many towns of the Sicanians, and others subject to the Carthaginians, sent to him, to desire they might be admitted into the social League. The Carthaginians herein were so concern'd, as to prepare amain for the renewing of the War, procuring Soldiers out of Gall, Liguria, Spain, and Africk. Mago had killed himself after his shameful return, and his dead body was nailed to a crosse for the mal-administration of his Office; therefore in the third year after they sent over Asdrubal and Amilcar, with 200 long-ships, and above 1000 of burthen, wherein were so many men transported as made up those already in Sicilie 70000 Foot, and 10000 Horse, which with warlike Chariots marched against Timoleon. He, having composed the difference with Hicetas mustered all his forces, and judging it wisdom to transfer the War into the Enemies Country, for this purpose he chose out of all 12000 men, with which he marched away in haste; but in his journey a great mutiny happened amongst his Soldiers. For one Thrasius a rash impudent fellow, who with the Phocians had rifled the Temple at Delphos, cried out, that Timoleon being mad, led them into most certain death, for that the Carthaginians in number so far exceeded them: and he advised the Mercenaries to return to Syracuse, and demand the pay already due to them. Timoleon had much ado to take up the matter, and 1000 utterly refused to follow him. But he rejoiced that the mutineers had already fallen off, before they came to any engagement, and with the rest hasted toward the Enemy.

54. By the convenience of a mist he got near to the Enemy undiscried, then lying upon the River Crimesus. Ten thousand of the Carthaginians passing the River, he fell down upon them from the hills, and made great slaughter, and their friends coming in to their relief, the fight was sharply renewed, and the Carthaginians by their great numbers began to incompass the other round, when fell such a storm, as, together with the valour of the Greeks, forced them to their heels. Flying into the River by heaps, the Foot amongst the Horse, and Chariots, multitudes perished, being either pressed, wounded to death by the swords of their Companions, drowned through the swiftnesse of the stream then increased by rain, or else killed by the Enemy on their backs: the Sacred band so called, consisting of 2500 of the choicest Soldiers, fighting most valiantly, all died in the place. Near upon 13000 were slain, and 15000 taken, with 200 Chariots (the greatest part whereof was broken in pieces) and 1000 brigandines with 10000 shields; though most of the Arms were swallowed up in the water: Those Carthaginians that remained, in great consternation escaped to Lilbaam. Their friends at Carthage hearing of their defeat, were in no little fear, out of conceit that Timoleon would now come over thither. Wherefore they recalled Gisco the brother of Hanno out of banishment, and made him General over the Army, which they raised with money out of other Nations, not thinking it meet to thrust themselves into such danger for the time to come. But Timoleon returning to Syracuse, found it a convenient time to punish the mutiniers, whom he banished Sicilie, commanding them to depart the City before Sun set. Passing over into Sicilie they seized on a Town amongst the Bruttii, who rising and besieging them, took the place, and therein put them all to the sword.

55. Hicetas often mentioned before, and Mamercus Tyrannus of Catana, joyned with the Carthaginians against Timoleon, perswading them, for fear of losing their share in Sicilie, to send over some forces. They sent away Gisco, who hired some Greeks, the first which served that Nation. They cut off some hundreds of Timoleon's Mercenaries, and Hicetas invaded the Syracusan Territories, whence getting much booty he marched into Calauria, in contempt of Timoleon, who lay there now with inconsiderable forces in comparison of his. Hicetas being pursued by Timoleon, got over the River Damyrus, and then endeavoured to hinder his passage; but he pressing upon him, slew 1000 of his men, and putting him to flight, pursued him into the Territories of Leontium, where he took him alive, with his son Eupolemus, and put them both to death as Traitors to their Country, together with Euthymus his General of the Horse; for that in a speech to the Leontines he had scoffed at the Corinthians, saying, they needed not to be afraid, though the Corinthian women were come from home, terming Timoleon and his men no other than women. After this Timoleon overthrew in battel Mamercus, killing 2000 of his men, whereof the greater number were Carthaginians, who thereupon earnestly begged peace, and had it granted on these conditions: That they still retaining all in their hands within the River Lycus, it should be yet lawful for any one to remove thence to Syracuse with his goods and family, and to renounce alliance with them, and with all the Tyranni in Sicilie, which at this time had enslaved many Cities of the Island. Mamercus fled over into Italy, and Catana was delivered up to Timoleon, who he took himself to Messana, where he besieged Hippo by Land and Sea, and taking him in his flight, delivered him up to the Citizens, who put him to death. Mamercus yielded himself to Timoleon, who having promised him he would not be his accuser, he cast himself upon the People of Syracuse; but perceiving them as he began to speak enraged against him, he attempted to dash out his own brains, and that not dispatching him, he was taken up and executed as a robber.

Nicodemus &
put out of
their power.

56. Timoleon, after this, drove away Nicodemus, who ruled over the Centorippini, and forced Apolloniades to lay down his power, which he exercised over the Agynneans, whom having restored thus to liberty he made free of Syracuse. Then did he restore all the other Cities to their desired liberty, one after another, and received them into confederacy with Syracuse: and it was proclaimed by the voice of a publick Crier throughout Greece, that The People of Syracuse offered houses and land, to all that would joyn themselves as members to their Commonwealth. Hereby it came to passe that multitudes flocked thither as to a new inheritance. Timoleon setting himself to the care of the State, corrected and explained the Laws of Drocles, and and acted other things necessary, as he thought, to the well being thereof, till growing old he lost his sight, which calamity as he bore very moderately, so by reason of it he intermitted not publick business. Not long after, he died, and was buried by the confluence of all Sicilie, the affaires whereof he had settled; games being celebrated yearly in memory of him, as for an Hero. This happened in the 58 year of his government, the last of the 110 Olympiad, and the last also of the reign of Philip of Macedon father to Alexander the Great; about the year of the World 3668, the second of Arses King of Persia, and seven before the beginning of the Macedonian Empire, to the time whereof, what we have further to say concerning the affairs of Sicilie, is to be referred; which affaires will shew, that the infirmity of Popular Government is greater than that Timoleon by his constitutions could heal the distempers thereof, and further evince the worth of Monarchy.

The affairs of the Romans contemporary with the second Empire.

SECT. I.

From the Banishment of Tarquinius and first change of the Government, to the alteration made by the Decemviri, the space of 57 years.

Consuls.

Whence so called.

1. THe Kingly Office being banished with Tarquinius (though both rebelliously and impudently) that of Consuls succeeded. Who were so called a Consulendo. Festus observeth out of Verrius, that the word Consulas was used by the Antients, not onely for Consilium petas, and percontaris; but also for judices and statuas: Moreover the word Consulere is many times taken for providere, or prospicere. According to this Etymology various is the opinion of Learned Men concerning this Office. Some derive it from the duty or work of consulting the Senate, which was incumbent upon the Consuls. Others interpret it of judging, which, saith (a) Lipsius, I onely read in (b) Quintilian, who puts the question, whether Consul was so named from consulting, or judging, seeing that consulere was used also for the latter, whence arose that phrase: Rogas boni Consulas, that is, judices; but not only Quintilian, but Festus also, in the word Consulas, giveth this Etymology. Lastly, some derive it from the end of the Office, which was consulere, or providere, as (c) Florus and Justinian's Code. But those Magistrates were not first of all named Consules but Pratores, which name, although it was common to others, yet stuck to them by way of excellency. (d) Festus saith it expressly; and so doth (e) Justinian in his Novella Constitutiones. Xonaras saith the name of Prator continued till the Decemviri, who being banished, then at length crept in the name of Consul. But he should rather have said, that then the name of Judex crept in; for it appeareth out of Livie, that they were called Judices next after Pratores, before the name of Consuls came in. The Historian in his third Book speaking of such things as happened in the first year after the writing of the twelve Tables addeth: In these times it was the custom not to call the Consul by the name of Judex, but Prator. (f) Varro out of ancient Commentaries confirmeth this, and (g) Cicero giveth the Etymology of all these Offices thus, a praeundo, judicando, consulendo, Pratores, Judices, Consules appellantur. Some upon good grounds conjecture, that after the creation of Pratores, who were peculiar Judges, the name of Judex was left, and that of Consul succeeded, which continued to the last.

Their power.

2. The power of Consuls was at first the same with that of Kings, allayed onely by plurality of persons and shortnesse of time, so that Cicero calleth it Regium Imperium, and Regia potestas, and the Greeks chose to call them Hypatoi, which signifieth those that are most excellent or chief, as Dionysius telleth us. In the beginning they might imprison and sentence at their pleasure, having the power of life and death over the Citizens, though scarce the authority to make peace and war, as Lipsius affirmeth. By degrees this great power was diminished, and that especially by two things, viz. Appeal, and Interposing, called Provocatio and Intercessio. The former was presently brought in after the banishment of the Kings, by Valerius Poplicola, who preferred a Law for taking away animadversion upon Citizens from the Consuls, and giving liberty of Appeal to the People as the higher Judge. But by the Interposition of the Tribunes of the people who were afterwards created, all actions of the Consuls whatsoever might be obstructed, as by the voyce of the people it self, whose power and dignity thenceforth daily increased, and took authority over all Magistrates. Hereby was that of the Consuls much diminished; Yet not quite broken and dissolved as long as the Commonwealth continued; their Offices being both many and large. For first they were the head of the State, all ordinary Magistrates being subject and obnoxious to them, (except the Tribunes) in whose actions they might interpose. Secondly, they had the chief Command in the War over Citizens and Associates, as also over Provinces and Subjects, whom they might punish; and Authority to appoint Officers in the Army, as appeareth out of Cicero and Polybius in several places. Thirdly, they assembled the people, consulted with it, preferred Laws also, which if enacted bore their names. Fourthly, they received Letters from Governours of Provinces, from Nations and Cities: gave audience to Ambassadors, and what was to be done either by Senate or people passed through their hands as chief Ministers of State. Fifthly, as the Senate handled and executed all things in peace and war, so did they govern it in some sence, they assembled and dismissed it: therein they asked the Members their opinions, counted and divided them: and in conclusion they steered the ship of the Commonwealth. This was their power while the free State continued; but after it was subjected to the power of one person, their authority was again much impaired, few of all these privileges remaining to them; for that the Prince assumed the rights of all Magistrates, but especially those of the Consuls and Tribunes. Under the Emperours they were employed in consulting the Senate, administering Justice, assigning Tutors or Guardians, manumitting Slaves, letting out to farm the Customs (which Office formerly belonged to the Censors) and managing publick Games: besides, they had the honour of having the year Characterized by their names, as formerly. These things will be sufficiently evinced (at least most of them) in the sequel of this History concerning Roman affairs.

Certain Rites
them.

3. There were observed certain Consular Rites, which it will rather behoove us in this place to relate, than scatteredly hereafter to give an account of them. First of all the time wherein the Consuls assumed their Office was not set or constant, but various, till the year of the Citie 532. when both they and other Magistrates entred on the Calends of January, having before, as * Simp- son and others observe, Commenced on the Calends of Quintilis called July, as well as at other times. The first day was an high day, and very creditable to them, the Senate and people meeting at their houses, saluting, and accompanying them to the Capitol, where they took their Oaths and Sacrifified. Thence they went to the Senate house, where they were ordered by a Senatus Consultum to give thanks to the Prince of the Senate;
then sent they gifts to their friends, and threw money to the people, which later expense was afterwards taken away by the Emperours, and appropriated to the repairing of aqueducts. They twice swore to govern according to the Laws (as all other Magistrates did, none being to keep his Office above five dayes, except publickly sworn) when first they entred; once in the Capitol, and then again in the Rostra, in their hands to whom they succeeded : and at the laying down of their Office again at the years end they swore in like manner, that wittingly and willingly they had done nothing, contrary to the said Laws. Another Rite there was, as Lipſius termeth it, about their power, which thereby was so increased as to become as absolute as the Kingly was. This was onely upon an extraordinary occasion, or in extreme necessity, when all lay at the stake, and the Citie was in danger. Then a Decree of the Senate passed in this form : Viderint Consules nequid Resp. detrimenti accipiat, or Dent operam Consules nequid Resp. detrimenti Capiat, as * Salust hath it, who addeth, that this greatest power was given by the Senate to these Magistrates, to raise forces, make War, all manner of wayes to punish Citizens, and associates, to have, both at home, and abroad in War, absolute command and judiciary power. Otherwise without the command of the people no Consul could do any of these things. In a word, by this Decree was restored to them that power (or rather more given) which was taken away by the Appeal, and other Laws.

The age capable of this Office.

4. What the Ornaments and Ensigns of the Consuls were, we have formerly observed out of Dionysius, to which shall be added upon occasion what may be thought requisite. As for the age wherein a man was capable of this Office, (a) Tacitus observeth, that of old it was lawfull at any age to sue for the Consulship, and the supream power of Dictator. But afterwards being taught otherwise by experience (in the 573th year of the Citie) the Romans thought fit to set bounds to juvenile heat and ambition. This was, as (b) Livy writeth, by a Law which L. Julius (or Villius) Tribune of the people preferred, whereby was limited a certain age before which it was not lawfull to stand for any place of Magistracy ; but from Cicero it should rather appear that there were several Laws made for the several Offices ; and at length the Lex Julia or Annaria, included, and abolished all the rest. For (c) he maketh them many, calling them in the plural number Leges Annales ; and Livy, saying that then first of all a Law was preferred by Julius, in effect contradicted himself, relating elsewhere a (d) passage concerning Scipio Africanus, that when he stood for the Edileship, the Tribunes of the people opposed him, alleging that he was not yet arrived at the lawfull age which was required for that Office ; and yet he was many years before Julius or his Law. Cicero (e) declareth the 43th year to have been the age of Consulship, saying, that Alexander the Great having died in his 33th year, came ten years short of the Consular age. If his words be taken strictly, the 43th, but if more largely, the 42th was the year, and this rather as many examples do confirm. A grave age became this most grave and weighty Office ; but sometimes the people dispensed with the Law, as will be shewn, the Emperours neglected it, and Caesar Dictator before them, who made Dolabella Consul at 25. Lastly, as for the Term or duration of the Consulship, it was annual, as we before hinted in Brutus his model, and so continued, till Julius Caesar made several in one year, so that afterwards Consuls were nominated for three, two, and one moneth, and others substituted one after another. Hence came it to passe that there were two sorts of Consuls, Ordinary and Substitute, the former beginning on the Calends of January, and the later at other times. This custom continued till Constantine, who again made the Office Annual, and instead of the Suffecti, or Substitute, ordained a new kind, called Consulares, and Consules Honorarii, whose Office was not called Consulatus, but Consularitas, having derived its Original from the Consular Ornaments invented by Julius Caesar. Of this titular promotion, (f) Cassiodorus is to be consulted.

Its duration.

The first Consuls.

Their A&rs.

5. But (to come to the matter in hand) the first Consuls were L. Junius Brutus, and L. Tarquinius Collatinus, who began this Office, according to (a) Dionysius his Computation, in the beginning of the 68th Olympiad, wherein Ischomachus of Crotone was Victor, Isagrus being Archon at Athens. Because they could not deny that many good things had been done by Kings for the Commonwealth, they would have the name preserved for ever in the State,

State, and therefore gave order to the Pontifices and Augurs to chuse out some one, who taking care of Superstition, and being exempted from War, should be called Rex Sacrificulus, to which Office allotted unto the Patricians, Manilius Papirius of that Order first attained. Next after this, fearing that the people might have, as they well might, an ill opinion of their intentions, and say that for one they had got two Kings; to diminish envy, whereas each of them had as yet twelve Axes carried before them, as the Kings used to have, they ordered that but one of them should have twelve Axes, and the other twelve Lictors with Rods alone, and each his moneth should have the Axes. This contained the people better in obedience, as other things whereby they laboured to render themselves popular. For they revived the Laws of Servius Tullius, concerning publick meetings and assemblies, with other things which conduced to the satisfaction of the common sort, who now looked upon their lawlesse liberties as recovered.

6. Tarquinius after his banishment first stayed at Gabii for some time, whither many of his party flocking to him, after he could not prevail with them of that place to make War in his behalf against the Romans, he betook himself into Toscany, or Etruria, where he could claim kindred by his mother, and there winning mens minds by his munificence, and moving them with his tears, he procured Ambassadors to be sent to Rome in his behalf. First they moved that he might be received again, promising on his behalf very good demeanour for the time to come, and when this equity could not be heard, they (or others sent afterwards, as Plutarch writeth) desired he might have his goods, especially such as were descended upon him from Tarquinius Priscus his Grand-father, who had in no wise ill deserved of them. Brutus, according to his furious and malicious temper, very vehemently opposed it, saying, that it would few little forecast in them to furnish him with money to imploy against themselves; but his Colleague was for restoring the goods, and prevailed to have the Decree passe on his side, by one Vote onely overpowering the contrary party, according to Dionysius. The Ambassadors having it in charge to labour with the friends of Tarquinius, that they might do something effectually, drew out the time in length, pretending they wanted carriages, and must sell such things as could not be removed. They stayed so long as to draw over to them some of the two notable families of the Aquillii and Vitellii, viz. two persons of this, and three of that. Of all these Collatinus the Consul was Uncle, and Brutus also had married the sister of the Vitellii, by which he had several Children, whereof two youths they drew in, having convinced them of their fathers vehemency, madnesse, and folly, and given them good hopes of great things to be done for them by Tarquinius.

7. These men met in the house of the Aquillii to ripen their businesse. There in the dark, a certain slave, Vindicius by name, fearing to be found in that room when they came in, and not with any intent to harken, had himself behind a Chest, and heard their whole debate concerning their purpose of killing the Consuls; about which they gave Letters then to the Ambassadors (who lodged in the house, and were present at the meeting) to be delivered to Tarquinius. The Slave in this case knew not how to carry himself; for, to go to Brutus, and to accuse his own sons to him seemed an hard and bold attempt, as also no lesse to do it unto Tarquinius their Uncle; no private person he knew to whom he might communicate so great a matter, and yet a thing of such consequence he thought was not to be buried in silence, nor yet the discovery thereof deferred. At length he betook himself to P. Valerius, who had also a great hand in casting out the King. Valerius exceedingly struck with the thing, that he might proceed warily, first secured the slave to have him forth coming, then sending his brother Marcus to seize the Kings house, and watch the servants there, that they should carry away no Letters, he himself with his Clients and Friends went to the house of the Aquillii, where he got into his hands what was written to Tarquinius. The Aquillii being abroad met him at the Gate, where they endeavoured to recover by force the Letters from him ; but he through the help of those about him drew them in- to the Forum, as his brother also having seized on other Letters at the King's house, forced some of his servants thither. The tumult being appeased by the Consuls, Vindicius related the Story, and the Letters were read. The parties said nothing for themselves ; all were astonished and silent ; at length some to flatter Brutus mentioned banishment ; Collatinus shedding tears gave the prisoners hope, and this was increased because Valerius held his peace.

8. But furious and implacable Brutus calling both his Sons by their names (Titus and Tiberius) asked them why they said nothing to what was laid to their charge, and when they answered not at the third time, he turned to the Lictors or Executioners, and said, Now is it your part to perform the rest. They presently took the youths, and stripping them tied their hands behind them : then did they beat with rods, and after that beheaded them, he, whilst others could not behold so abominable a spectacle, feeding his angry eyes with the object, till all was done. Then left he the rest to the discretion of his Colleague and departed ; after which a stupidity, horror, and amazement, as the things required, for a time possessed all. Collatinus his backwardness and delay encouraged the Aquilii to desire time to answer, and that Vindicius their Slave might be given up to them, and not continue in the hands of their accusers. The Consul was about to do both, when Valerius who kept the Slave all this while in the midst of his followers, would neither deliver him, nor suffer the People to depart without censuring the accused, though Collatinus was ready to dismiss the Assembly. He laid hands upon the Aquilii, and sent for Brutus, crying out, that Collatinus did unworthily, to impose upon his Colleague a necessity of killing his sons, and think of granting the lives of the other unto women. The Consul being vexed, commanded the Lictors to take away Vindicius, so that they laying hands on him, wounded those that kept him, and Valerius his friends fighting in his behalf, the People cried out for Brutus. When he came he said, that by his full authority he had animadverted upon his own Sons, and left the other delinquents to the People, giving leave to every man to speak. There was no need of this, saith Plutarch (though Dionysius relateth a great contest betwixt the two Consuls) but the rabble called to the vote, condemned them by all their Suffrages, according to which sentence they were beheaded. Collatinus now, who for being a kin to the King had been suspected, and whose name was hateful to the People, having by his carriage in this business offended the generality, voluntarily laid down his Office and departed from the City, seeing now to what a sad passe he had helped to bring things, and too late repenting of his rebellion. To him succeeded Valerius (the Comitia being held for an election) whom Brutus much desired to have had his Colleague at first, but that the greatness of Collatinus carried it from him.

9. Valerius being with the good-will of all the multitude created Consul, thought the first fruits of his Office due to Vindicius, whom manumitted he made free of the Commonwealth, this privilege being given to him first of all Liberti or Freed-men, according to Plutarch, (which Appian long after communicated to them all) and from him a perfect and full manumission had the name of Vindicta. This done, the Consuls gave the goods of the King to be rifled by the People, demolished his house, and laid the Campus Martius which he had to himself, open as before, wherein lying Corn cut down already, they threw it into the River, and sending trees that grew there after it, these receiving gravel and such rubbish as came down the chanel, at last grew into an Island called Insula Sacra : though some say, this happened in after times, when Tarquinius a Vestal Nun gave the adjoining field to the Publick, and for that obtained great honours, as these amongst the rest ; of all women alone to appear as a witness in any cause, and liberty to marry, which she refused. But Tarquinius seeing that reason failed, betook himself to force, and brought a great Army of *Tuscan*s against Rome.

The Consuls opposed him with another, and when they came to joyn, Arms the son of Tarquinius, and Brutus the Consul, with greater wrath and fury than discretion, singled out each other, and so carelessly demeaned themselves, as both of them lost their lives. A great and bloody battel was fought betwixt the Armies, which night onely broke up, and that with such equal fortune, as neither party could boast it self, till at length either by a voice out of a grove, as the story goeth, that the Etruscans had lost one man more, or some other way, the Romans were so revived, and the other discouraged, that the latter forsook their tents for fear, and being fallen upon by the Enemy, were nigh 5000 taken prisoners, having lost 11300 in the fight. Valerius triumphed at his return to the City (leaving an example to posterity which was duly followed) and then buried his Colleague with great honour, making himself a funeral Oration in his commendation, which custom Dionysius will have more ancient at Rome than in Greece; although Anaximenes wrote that Solon was the Author of it.

Valerius suspected

10. But when the People considered how Brutus the father of their liberty, as they accounted him, would not govern alone without a Colleague, and yet Valerius made no haste to take a partner, they began to complain, that he had not taken to himself so much the place of Brutus (which yet not at all belonged to him) but that of Tarquinius, and were much offended with him. They confirmed themselves in their hard opinion, from his having all the Rods and Axes caried before him, and with them, in greater state than Tarquinius used, marched from his house, which was much larger than the Palace that he demolished. His house was very fair, situate in such a place as afforded him prospect round about, and had a difficult ascent; so that the convenience of the site, considered with his Kingly port and attendance, seemed to threaten their infant Commonwealth, now an Orphan by Brutus his death. His friends remonstrating to him these particulars, he contended not; but that very night sent for Carpenters, who demolished the house ere morning: the next day the People were presented with a new and unexpected sight, which fully altered their opinion concerning Valerius, who now wanting an house of his own, was glad to accept of the courtesie of friends, till the People give him a place, wherein he built a mansion lesse stately than the former. Further, that he might render not onely himself, but also his Office, in stead of terrible, familiar and acceptable to all, he removed Axes from the bundle of Rods, and, the Rods themselves, when he came into the Assembly, he bowed or vailed to the People, thereby intimating, that in them lay the chief power: which custom his Successors followed. Hereby, as to his own person, he lesned not himself, but cut off envy, and got so much power, as he renounced of liberty, the People willingly submitting to him, because he flattered them, out of which respect they give him the Surname of Poplicola, not Publicola, as Sigonius hath evinced. He gave free leave to any to sue for the Consulship; but before a Colleague should be joyned with him, being ignorant what might happen, and fearing he might either through emulation or ignorance crosse his designs, by his sole authority, he gave birth to several Popular Constitutions, which at length produced such effects as shewed the excellency of that Government which he had helped to destroy.

Cleareth himself.

His constitutions.

11. First he filled up the Senate which had been exhausted, by an addition of 164 Persons, as some delivered the number. Then made he several Laws, which gave beginning to that paramount or rampant liberty, whereof the People was afterwards possessed. By one he gave leave to an accused person, to appeal from the Consuls to the People. By another, he made it death for any one to take upon him an Office of Magistracy without the People's order. A third gave relief to poor Citizens, by taking awy the payment of Tribute. Another punished disobedience towards the Consuls, and appointed the mulct to be the price of five Oxen, and two Sheep: the price of a Sheep was ten Oboli (each Obolus was worth 1 d. q.) and 100 the value of an Oxe. For at that time the use of money was but rare amongst the

SECT. I. Romans; wealth consisting in plenty of Cattel; whence riches were afterwards called Pecunia from Pecus, and upon the ancient money an Oxe, Sheep, or Hog was stamped, which gave it the name of Pecunia: and hence they imposed upon their sons (as Plutarch observeth) the names of Suillii, Bulbi, Caprarii, and Porcii. Another Law Valerius made, which gave power to any man to kill him unheard, that affected the Supreme power, if he could demonstrate the crime. The last was a Law for the creation of two Quaestors or publick Treasurers, as Plutarch writeth. For it being necessary that the People should contribute money for maintenance of Wars, he would neither undertake the keeping of it himself, nor commit the care of it to his friends, neither thought it convenient that the Publick money should be kept in a private house: therefore he made the Temple of Saturn the Aerarium, or Treasury, and caused the People to chuse out two young men to be

The Quaestors. Quaestors. The first were P. Volturnus, and M. Minucius. A great quantity of money was now brought into the Aerarium. For at the Census 130000 were cessed or valued, besides Widdows and Orphans. Thus much Plutarch delivereth concerning this Office.

When first made,

12. But some give a more ancient beginning to the Quaestors, making theirs antienter than any Office, except that of the Kings. (a) Gracchanus a Lawyer wrote, that both Romulus and Numa had their Quaestors, created by the consent of the People; however he saith it is certain that Tullus Hostilius had his. (b) Ulpian confirmeth the later, and (c) Tacitus seemeth to agree with either of them, affirming that under the Kings there were Quaestors, which the Lex curiata sheweth, that was renewed by L. Brutus. He addeth, that the Consuls had power to chuse them, till the People took that honour to it self, and first of all created Valerius Potitus, and Emilius Mamercus, that they might follow the Army, in the 63 year after the banishment of Tarquinius. Lipsius thinketh this number should be read 23, that it might agree with (d) Dionysius, and also (e) Livie, who first mentioneth the Quaestors in the 269 year of the City, 23 years after the banishment of the King, and differeth onely in one of their names, having for Emilius, Caso Fabius. Concerning the antiquity of these Officers (f) Pomponius also the Lawyer agreeth with the rest. They had their name à querendo saith (g) Varro, because they made inquiry after publick money, and also Malefactors, or the actions of such, which later employment was afterwards committed to the Triumviri for capital matters, so that Quaestor is written as for Quasitor. Justus Lipsius is of opinion, that though the Kings might have these Officers for the punishment of vice, yet the Treasurers were not created till the change of the Government, when the Publick Treasure being increased there was need of such. At the beginning they were but two by consent of all; and those were made for the City, retaining afterwards the name of Urbani. But afterward when they were to look to the paying of the Armies abroad, and selling plunder and booty, then were there other two made, to accompany the Consuls, as Livie saith, which hapned about the 232 year of the City.

Their number.

13. This number long continued, until all Italy was brought in; then was it again doubled, no fewer than eight being thought to suffice for the Tributes of the Provinces; and this hapned when Silver money was first coined, about the 439 year of the City, as may be gathered from the Epitome of Livie's 15 Book. Not long after Sylla procured by a Law, that twenty should be made for the assistance of the Senate, as Tacitus writeth, to which he had delivered the judicial power: and for such an end did Cesar cause forty to be created. The Quaestorship was the first step to Offices of Magistracy. Their duty, as is clear from several Authors, was to gather, lay up, and pay out the publick revenues, to keep the military Ensignes of Gold and Silver (for they then used no banners) in the Treasury, to sell plunder and booty, receive, lodge, and carry out Ambassadors. They had also the government of certain places, as Ostia and Cales. They received from Augustus the privilege of keeping the Senatus consulta, which formerly belonged to the Atilas and Tribunes. And the Emperours had a certain Quæstor of their own called Curidæus Principis, and Quæstor Principis, or Augusti, whose Office Ulpian describeth. This gave original to the Quæstor Palatii (saith Lipsius) to whom was granted great authority, as to make Laws and Decrees, subscribe Petitions, return answers, and to be as it were the keeper or President of the Laws, which name is now changed into Chancellour. But, to speak something of the Treasury, the Temple of Saturn was first made use of to this purpose, as Plutarch telleth us. Here also were kept the Libri or Treasury. Elephantini, Books wherein the 35 Tribes were written, and the Decrees of the Senate; but the Libri Lintei, or the Annals, were kept by the Pontifices, who therein recorded such things as were memorable. In the Ærarium was also a more secret place, where the twentieth part of the revenues were reserved for cases of extremity onely. The Ærarium was afterwards called Fiscus, from the Fiscella, or bag; wherein the money was kept, according to Varro. The first Advocatus Fisci was instituted by Adrian the Emperour, as Spartianus witnesseth. Amongst other tributes, the People of Rome had the twentieth part of all revenues of Corn throughout Italy, besides Salt, which was the device of Livie, thence surnamed Salinator. Those that farmed the Tributes or Custom were called Publicans, and the principal of them Mancipes, according to Pedanius, whom Volaceranus followeth.

14. Valerius Poplicola having finished his constitutions of Settlement, held the Assembly of the People for the election of another Consul. Lucretius the father of Lucretia was chosen, to whom, as the elder, Poplicola granted the Fasces or bundle of Rods; which respect of age was ever after observed by their Successors, till the time of (a) Plutarch, as himself writeth. This granting of the Fasces was yet but for the first moneth, which indeed afterwards was wont to be granted to the elder Consul; but no longer than till the Lex Julia, in the seventh Chapter whereof this privilege was given to him who had most children, either still in his own power (that is to be understood not emancipated) or already lost in War. But if both Consuls had an equal number of children, he who at present was a married man was preferred. If both were husbands and fathers alike, then the ancient custom returned, and he who was eldest had first the Fasces. Concerning such who were both unmarried, had the same number of children, or were both married and had no children, the Law commanded nothing. But I hear, saith (b) Gellius, that those who were exempted, were wont to yield the Fasces of the first moneth to their Colleagues that far exceeded them in age, or in birth, or entered upon their second Consulship. In the mean time that Consul who had no Fasces, that he might be known by some note of distinction, had an Accensus (a certain Bedle or Crier, concerning whom (c) Varro is to be consulted) that went before him, and Lictors followed with Rods and Staves, as (d) Dionysius, (e) Livie, and (f) Suetonius de testifie.

15. Lucretius died also a few daies after his creation, to whom succeeded M. Horatius, who continued the Colleague of Poplicola for the remaining part of the year. Now was the Capitol finished which had been vowed by Tarquinius Priscus, and begun by Superbus his grand-son. Poplicola had a great ambition to dedicate it, but the Nobility envied him the honour, and stirred up Horatius to stand for it, whom when the other was constrained to be absent in the War, they injoyed by a Decree to do it, and carried him up thither, knowing that in the presence of Poplicola they could not have prevailed. Some write, that by lot the War fell to Poplicola much against his will, and the Dedication to Horatius. On the Ides of September, which fell in with the full Moon of the Greek moneth Metaginion (answering to August the 28 of the Italian year, as Jacobus Cappellus compute) when many flocked to behold the Solemnity, Horatius having commanded silence, and finished all the usual rites, touched the door, and pronounced the words of Dedication. Then Marcus the brother of Poplicola standing near for that purpose, and watching for an opportunity, said, Thy son O Consul is dead in the Camp, whereat when all others were struck, Horatius nothing disturbed disturbed answered onely, Then cast him out whither you please, for I admit not of mourning, and went on with the matter in hand. Neither was the story true, but feigned by Mercus to deter him from the Dedication. The same fortune hapned to the Dedication of the second Temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, after this was burnt in the Civil Wars. For Sylla having rebuilt it died before the Dedication, as Tarquinius was banished, and so that honour came to Carulus. When this had perished in the sedition of Vitellius, Vespasian built the third, and was herein more fortunate than Sylla, that, as he died before the Dedication of his, so the Emperour lived not to see the destruction of this, which presently after his death was also burned. The fourth which stood in Plutarch's time was both built and dedicated by Domitian. Tarquinius, as was reported, spent 40000 pounds of silver in founding his Temple; but the fourth was not gilded for so little as the wealth of the richest private man. The Marble Pillars Plutarch saw at Athens, being then of a thicknesse answerable to their length, but afterward when they were new cut at Rome, they got not so much splendour as they lost of proportion and beauty, being rendred too slender in bulk or substance.

The first League betwixt the Romans and Carthaginians.

16. In the * Consulship of Junius Brutus and M. Horatius (that is in * Polyb. lib. 3. p. 160. the same year that Horatius succeeded, though not immediatly, into the place of Brutus, who with Tarquinius his Colleague governed but 4 moneths) when the Temple of Jupiter Capitolinus was Consecrated, 28 years before Xerxes his expedition into Greece, the first League was made betwixt the Romans and Carthaginians. Herein it was provided, that the Romans should not sayl beyond the Fair Promontory, which lay before Carthage towards the North. Polybius thinketh the cause was, for that the Carthaginians would not have them take notice of the places about Ryzacium, nor the little Syrus: which for the fruitfulness of the soyl they termed Emporia. But if it hapned that any, either by Tempest or Pirats, were forced in thither, they promised they would furnish them with all things necessary, but forbade any thing to be taken by force, and commanded all to be core thence within five dayes. It was lawfull hereby for the Romans to Traffick to Carthage, and all that part of Africk which lieth on this side the Fair Promontory, as also Sardinia, and that part of Sicily then under the Carthaginians, who promise upon their publick faith that all Justice shall be duely executed. From this League it appeareth that the Carthaginians speak of Africk and Sardinia as absolutely their own, but far otherwise concerning Sicily expressly distinguishing of that part thereof which they had subdued. The Romans also include in this League onely Latium, making no mention of the rest of Italy, which was not in their power. After this another League was made, or rather this renewed, wherein the Carthaginians comprized the Tyrians, and the people of Utica. To the Fair Promontory were added Mastia and Tarseium, beyond which it was neither lawfull for the Romans to make any depredations, nor build a Town. These things Polybius observeth concerning these Leagues, which he also exemplifieth, and to which we referre Students in History.

Porsea war-reth against Rome.

17. Tarquinius, after that great battel wherein he lost his son Aruns in a Combat with Brutus, betook himself to Clussum, the King whereof Porsea by name (one of great account for his power and munificence amongst the Kings of Italy) he procured to take upon him his quarrel. He first sent to Rome, commanding them to receive their King according to their duty, and upon refusal, both threatned, and made War upon them. Now were created Consuls Poplicola the second time being absent, and T. Lucretius Tricipitinus on the Calends of October, according to the Pompilian year, which answered to September 14. of the Julian in the new Moon. Jacobus Cappel- lus observeth that the Consuls Commenced at this time of the year from the first of Poplicola, till fifteen years after, in the 261st year of the Citie. Sp. Cassius and Posthumius Cominius began their Office a moneth sooner, v. z. on the Calends of October. The reason might be, for that the new Moon fell in with the Autumnal Aequinoctial on the 25th of Julian September, from

from which the Pompilian, or Numan, September seemeth to have Commenced that year, the Moon increasing, although without order. For the Calends of October ought rather to have been on that day; but such errors were frequent in the Pompilian year, either through the negligence, or wilfull neglect of the Priests. After the third year the Calends (or first day) of January recovered their true place, viz. the next new Moon to the Winter Solstice; but September obtained to be the beginning of the year untill the 278th year of the Citie, wherein the Comitia for Creation of Consuls were cast back to the Calends of the moneth Sextilis (afterwards called August) at what time A. Virginus Tricostus, and Sp. Servilius Struſtus were made Consuls, in the Summer Solstice, as Dionysius observeh.

18. Poplicola returning to Rome, first resolved in magnanimity to out-vy Porſena, and for that purpose, when the King was now approaching, founded the Citie Sigliucia (or rather Signia) which with great expence he fortified, and then planted it with 700 Inhabitants, making hereby a show that he could without any trouble or fear sustain the War. But Porſena laying close siege to Rome, very fiercely with all his might set upon the Citie. The two Consuls with much ado repelling the Toſcans, at length were both so wounded as they must needs be carried off, after which the Romans fled from before their Enemies, who in their retreat into the Town followed them close, and flocked upon the bridge. There Horatius surnamed Cocles (either for that he had but one eye, having lost the other in War, or because his Nose was so depressed that both his Eyes seemed to go into one, whence intending to call him Cyclops, by ignorance of the language they pronounced it Cocles) together with Herminius and Larsius, opposed himself against the Toſcans. Cocles stood before the bridge, and repulsed the Enemy so long till it was broken down behind him, which done, he cast himself armed as he was into the River, and swam out to his friends, having received a wound with a Spear. To requite him for the lameneſſe he contracted by this wound, and in admiration of his valour, Poplicola caused all the Romans to give him, every one so much provision as would serve one for a day, then conferred he on him so much ground as he could plow round about in one day, and they erected to his memory a Statue in the Temple of Vulcan. But Porſena drawing out the siege in length sore straitned the Citie. Poplicola now executing his third Consulship, together with his last year's Colleague M. Horatius Pulvillus, led forth his men, and giving the King battel, overthrew him, and killed 5000 of his men. Yet this little availed, the honour of finishing this War being reserved for the valour and policy of Mutius Cordus.

19. Mutius a man of excellent courage, and no lesſe skill in War, resolving with himself to ly in wait for the life of Porſena, put on the Tuſcan habit, and using that language, came into the King's Camp, where observing the place in which the King was, but being ignorant of his person, he stabbed his Secretary who sat with him amongst several others. Being taken in the act, when they went about to examine him, he thrust his right hand into the fire, as intending to punish it for so great a mistake, and whileſt it burned beheld Porſena with a stedfast and angry countenance, who admiring his resolution dismissed him, and reached him back his sword from his seat. Mutius took it with his left hand (whence he had the name of Scaevola, which word signifieth one that useth his left hand, saith Plutarch) and telling the King that he was now overcome by his bravenesse of spirit whose threats he had contemned, he said in way of requital he would reveal a thing to him which no force of torment could have compelled him to discover. He affirmed there were 300 Romans now in his Camp watching an opportunity to kill him. As for his part, having been by lot destined to make the first attempt, it did not trouble him that he had failed in killing him a right good man, & one much worthier of the friendship than harred of the Romans. Porſena hearing this, inclined presently to a compoſure of the difference, not so much out of fear of the 300. as admiration of the Roman courage. Poplicola having notice hereof, was glad of such a friend, and content to make him Umpire bebetwixt the Commonwealth and Tarquinius. He often challenged Tarquinius to put the matter to arbitration, to which the King answered courageously, that he would not admit of any Judge, much less of Porfena, who having promised him aid now basely falsified his word. Porfena hereat displeased, especially through the sollicitation of Aruns his son, made peace with the Romans on these conditions: that they should quit those Tuscan grounds they had got into their hands, restore all prisoners, and receive all their fugitives.

Clælia.

20. For the establishment of this peace the Romans gave up twenty Hostages, viz. ten young youths, and as many Girles, amongst which was Valeria the daughter of Poplicola. All acts of Hostility ceasing, the young Virgins went down to the River to wash, and taking an opportunity, when none were present to hinder them, got over the water, and returned home. Some reported, that one amongst them named Clælia went over on horse-back, and perswaded the rest to swim after. When they presented themselves to Poplicola, he neither admired their resolution, nor approved of their return, fearing it would be objected as a breach of faith to the Romans; so that apprehending then all, he sent them back to Porfena. Tarquinius aware hereof placed in ambush a party to encrap them and their Convoy; but Aruns the son of Porfena hearing of it, came in, and rescued them out of danger. When Porfena saw them, he demanded which had been the cause of their departure, and finding Clælia the principal, bestowed on her one of his own horses sumptuously adorned. Then to give a further Testimony of his respect towards the Romans, besides other things wherein he shewed his magnificence, he commanded his Soldiers to depart out of the Camp onely with their Arms, delivering up to the besieged his Tents furnished with victuals, and all other good things. Therefore for a long time after, when publick goods were set to sale, first of all the stuff of Porfena was cried, to preserve the memory of his kindnesse: And about the Court-house was erected his Statue in a plain and antient fashion. For the next year Dionysius nameth as Consuls, Sp. Lartius and T. Herminius, of whom Livie maketh honourable mention, but not as executing this Office. He writeth that at the bridge Sp. Lartius and T. Herminius both nobly descended, together with Horatius Cocles, sustained the first brunt of the Hebruscans. But Learned men tell us that it ought to be written Lartius, not Largius.

War with the Sabines.

21. The year following being the 250 of the Cirie, and the fifth after the banishment of Tarquinius, the first of the 99th Olympiad, saith Dionysius, wherein Ischomachus of Crotone was Victor, Acestorides being again Archon at Athens, in the 18th year of Darius Hystaspis King of Persia, A. M. 3501. M. Valerius the brother of Poplicola, and P. Postumius Tubertus were Consuls. Now the Sabines made depredations in the Roman Territories, and proceeded so far in their injuries that it engaged the parties in a War: Marcus by the Counsel and assistance of his brother obtained great honour in his undertakings. He overthrew the Sabines twice, in the later of which battels were slain of them 13000. and not one of the Romans lost. Wherefore besides triumphs this was given him as an addition of honour, to have an house built for him in the Palace on the publick cost. Besides, whereas all the doors of other houses opened inwards, they would have this of his house to open outwards toward the street, as a mark of honour in this respect, that he was ever ready to move for the publick good. Indeed all the Gates of the Greeks are said most antiently to have opened this way, and that by Testimony of the Comedies, wherein they that are going out first knock within, that such as either go by or stand near, may prevent being hurt of the door, which was cast forward into the street. The next year, wherein Poplicola was Consul the fourth time, and his Colleague T. Lucretius Tricipitinus, the whole Nation of the Sabines with the Luzines conspired against Rome, which was also much disturbed by superstition, for that all the women with Child miscarried of mutilous birchs, and nothing came into the World perfect. When these things much dejected the minds of the Romans, another erected them, and

Atius Clausus, afforded considerable encouragement to the War. Appius or Atius Clausus, an eminent man amongst the Sabines for riches, valour, virtue, and eloquence, being much against the War, was therefore malign'd by his emulators, as favouring the Romans, and designing to bring his Country under their yoke. His Enemies gaining credit with the Vulgar, he feared to put himself upon trial, and therefore raised a commotion, which retarded the War. Then did Poplicola invite him to Rome, whither he came with 5000 Families of his friends and dependents. The Families were made free of the City, and to every man assigned two Akers of Ground by the River Aniene; but to Clausus himself twenty Akers, and the degree of a Senator. Having got this opportunity, he so improved it, as to become equal to the greatest, and raised his house so much, that the Clausi, afterwards called Claudii, became inferiour to no one Family.

22. His revolt much more exasperated the minds of his Country-men to the War, who coming with an Army to Fidena, placed in ambush 2000 Foot, and then sent some Horse to make incursions, commanding them to retreat, as if they fled, and so draw on the Romans into the snare. Poplicola, having notice hereof by certain fugitives, divided his Army into three parts, and taking the advantage of a mist, fell upon the Sabines on so many sides, and did such execution, as the nearness of Fidena onely hindred the destruction of them all. The Romans, beside the advantage of much plunder, obtained that good by this Victory, to be furnished with courage for all assaies; yet imputed they the whole merit to the Consul, and stuck not to say, that he delivered into their hands their Enemies, blind and lame, onely to be dispatched with the Sword. Having triumphed, and given up the charge of the Commonwealth to the two new Consuls, Agrippa Menenius Lanatus, and Publius Posthumius, shortly after he died, finishing his life, as he had lived, in great grace with the multitude whom he had so flattered. The People, as if they had nothing at all required him when living, but ought him yet his whole reward, decreed he should be buried at the publick charge, every one contributing a small piece of money. Some say, that he was so poor, as he left not enough to bury him. The women by universal consent mourned for him, as formerly they had done for Brutus, an whole year. He was by a special Decree buried within the City, (which honour (saith Dionysius) hath onely happened unto him to this day) and that privilege was also granted to his family. But now, (Plutarch writeth) none of them is there interred: the Funeral is onely drawn out thither, and the coffin being set down, one puts under fire, and presently again taketh it away, showing, that the deceased hath a right there to be buried, but on his own accord quitteth the privilege. This being done, the body was carried away.

23. The same year that Poplicola died, the Sabines provided of numerous Forces, invaded the Roman Territories, as far as the City walls. The Consuls taking the field against them, Posthumius was entrapped in an Ambush, and escaping narrowly himself, lost many of his men, which defeat struck the Citizens with great terror, who now ran to the walls, expecting the Enemy would fall upon the City. But nothing being attempted in this kind, they marched out, resolving to redeem their credit; and Posthumius, much more concerned in honour than the rest, so behaved himself, as he made amends fully, and both the Consuls obtained a notable victory, which had been compleated by the slaughter of all the Sabines, if the darknesse of night had not interposed. The Senate ordered the Consuls to return in pomp; Menenius with full honour in triumph, sitting in a Chair, drawn in way of a Chariot, but Posthumius, because of his late defeat, in a more humble manner, which the Romans called Ovation, so named (saith Festus, or Paulus from him, as he from Verrius) from the letter O, which the Soldiers in way of joy were wont to eccho at their return from a Victory; or corruptly pronounced for the Greek word Euaſte, as Dionysius conjectureth. Ovation differed herein from a Triumph properly so called, that the General entred not the City in a Chariot, but on foot before his Soldiers; for the Robe interwoven with Gold, he onely wore the Prætextatoga, the ordinary habit of Consuls and Prætors; neither had he a Scepter, but onely Laurel; and on his head a wreath of Myrtle, when the War had not been denounced, or finished without bloodshed. The year following, wherein Sp. Cassius Viscellinus, and Opiter Virginus Tricostus were Consuls, the Sabines were overthrown in a great battel at Cures, 10300 being slain, and about 4000 taken, which defeat caused them to beg peace, and purchase it with Corn, Money, and part of their grounds. Whilst Sp. Cassius did this good service against the Sabines, his Colleague subdued the Camarinaans who had revolted, and having put to death the Authors of the injury, sold the rest, and razed their City.

24. The year that followed, being the first of the 70 Olympiad (wherein Nicaas of Opus (a Town of Locri) was Victor, (Myrus executing the Annual Office of Archon at Athens) had for Consuls Posthumius Cominius, and T. Lartius. Now all the Latines (to the number of thirty several Cities, saith Livie) conspired against Rome, by the procurement of Mamilius Octavius, son in Law to Tarquinius (who at present was with him at Tusculum) though Valerius the Roman Ambassador pretended to answer to such accusations as were made, and laboured to dissuade the several People of Latium. In the mean time also the Slaves at home contrived how to seize upon the Capitol, and burn the City, but were discovered, and nailed to crosses. The following year wherein Ser. Sulpitius Camerinus, and Manius Tullus Longus, were Consuls, a Faction in Fidena, having received some men from Tarquinius, killed or expelled their adversaries, and caused the Town to revolt from the Romans. The Senate would not make War upon the Latines in general, knowing many amongst them were inclined to Peace, and thought it sufficient to block up Fidena, for which they sent out Manius with a strong Army. The besieged implored assistance of the Latines, who in their general meeting heard also the complaints of Tarquinius, and though they were much importuned by some amongst them, yet they onely ordered Ambassadors to be sent to demand the reception of the King, and the removal of the siege from Fidena, which was done also meerly to gain time, giving the Romans a year to consider of the matter, and taking so large a space for to make preparations, in case the overture were rejected. Tarquinius and Mamilius having little hopes to prevail this way, seeing that the minds of the generality were averse from War, endeavoured to bring his right about in an easier way, by raising in Rome an unexpected and intestine difference betwixt the rich and poorer sort.

of his Kingdom.

25. For at this very time, as Dionysius writeth, a great part of the common People, especially the indigent and such as were burthened by usury, did not like of the present state of affaires, which dissatisfaction was caused by the extravagant course of Creditors, who seizing upon the bodies of their Debtors, used them no better than Slaves purchased with money. Tarquinius not being ignorant hereof, sent certain of his friends with Gold, who gave them some in hand, promising more after the King's restitution, and procured thereby a conspiracy of many poor Citizens, with such Slaves as had been offended with their Masters the year before, for the severity shown towards their fellows. The matter was discovered to Sulpicius, who after he had returned a denial, though very civilly, to the Latin Ambassadors, by a wile drew the Conspirators into the Forum; where encompassing them about, he put them all to the Sword. The stirs being thus allayed for a time, the Consuls of this and the following year looked abroad, and, in the next, Fidena was yielded up to T. Lartius Flavus. Hereat the Latines were exceedingly startled, and now all railed on their principal men, for that no order had been taken for relief of the Town. Tarquinius and Mamilius so improved this opportunity, that all the Cities (24 in number, as they are reckoned by Dionysius) decreed War against the Romans, ingaging that none should forsake their associates, nor make Peace without common consent, sealing it with an oath, and direful curses against such as should break the the League, who were to be held as Enemies by all the rest. They gave liberty to Tarquinius and his son in Law to levie what Forces they thought convenient, and that they might have some kind of pretence, sent a message to Rome, whence the Senate returned a stout and resolute answer.

War with the Latines in his behalf.

26. Great were the preparations of the Latines; the Romans sending round about, could make no friends, and yet were not dejected, but trusting to their domestick strength alone, were thereby rendred much more resolute and courageous, as such upon whom lay a necessity of being valiant. But a great difficulty was found in listing Soldiers; for the poor, and those that were surcharged with debt, of which there was a great number, being cited, would not appear, saying, they had nothing to do with the Patritians, except their debts were remitted by Decree of the Senate, nay some talked of leaving the City, and exhorted one another not to stay in that place, where no good thing was communicated to them. The Patritians by good words laboured to appease them, but all in vain; so that the Senate fell into a serious debate about so weighty a matter. Some were for a free remission of the debts, after the manner of the Athenian Sischibeia, as the onely way to remove all prejudice, and beget a fair correspondence betwixt Nobility and Commons. Others condemned this as too great a condescension, and which would encourage them to like Seditions for the time to come, thinking it the better way to list such as would give their names, and not at all value the rest, who though gratified at present, would hereafter be unserviceable. Betwixt these extremes several other wayes were propounded; but this at length prevailed, that nothing should now be determined, but the War being happily finished, the Consuls should report it again to the Senate, and in the mean time all sutes and proceffe concerning debts were to cease, that Magistrates might make effectual provision for the matter now mainly incumbent. This expedient, though something it wrought, had not sufficient strength to end the difference; and therefore the Senate was put upon another exigent. Whereas by the Law of Valerius, power of life and death was taken away from the Consuls, and all constraint, by an appeal to the People, so that no man could be forced to the War; It seemed necessary to create a Magistrate, who for six moneths should rule as absolute above the Laws, and from whom should lye no appeal. Thus having renounced Monarchy in effect, they had again recourse to it, and shewed as well the necessity as excellency of it.

The Dictator.

27. This Supreme Officer was called Dictator, either for that he was dictus, or named, by the Consul, according to (a) Varro, or rather from dictating, or shewing and commanding what was to be done, which Etymology (b) Dionysius approverth. He was also called: (c) Magister Populi, and (d) Pretor Maximus. Both name and thing came from the Albans, whose Dictator Metius Sufferius we have formerly mentioned. Spartianus saith, it was an ordinary Magistrate of old Latium. Dionysius bringeth the testimony of Licinius Macer for this opinion; yet he thinketh the Office first taken from the Greeks, who had their Æsymneta or extraordinary Kings made upon some urgent occasion, with absolute power. The Dictator was created upon some urgent occasion of War or Sedition, for fixing a nail in time of a Plague, to hold the Comitia for election of Consuls, celebrate Games, make inquisition, choosing Senators, or in sum, when there was need of a sodain and extraordinary command. The manner of his creation was not, as of other Magistrates, by the Suffrages of the People; but, at the command of the Senate, the Consul named some one of Consular dignity whom he pleased, in the night, and who was approved by the Auspicium, or divination from birds, a ceremony observed ever in the election of some Officers. The occasion being many times sodain, they could not stay for the Suffrages of the People, and the design being to restrain, or constrain, the multitude, many times, he was not to be chosen out of their body, although sometimes these rules were not fully observed, either through the absence of the Consul, or some other respect. L. Cornelius Sylla alone was named by the Interrex, as

His power.

C. Caesar by the Prætor; both which nominations Cicero in his Epistles conceiveth done contrary to right and order. The authority of the Dictator was exceeding large. He had power of Peace and War, to levie Forces, lead them forth, and disband them, and act all things according to his pleasure, without referring them to the Senate. So that not onely had he the power of both Consuls (whence the Greeks called him Dissypatos, or Double Consul) but more also, in that upon his Creation all other Magistrates, except the Tribunes, laid down their Offices, and the whole Government was left in his hands. He could punish as he pleased, without all appeal, and for the ostentation of his power, had 24 bundles of Rods caried before him, with as many Axes, or Hatchers, as Plutarch and Polybius do testify; although Livie dissenting from them, will have Sylla first of all others to have had 24 bundles. Hence this Office came to be so terrible, as the Edict of the Dictator was ever observed as the command of a Deity.

The bounds of his Office.

28. It was necessary, according to the Roman Government, that this extraordinary power should be bounded by certain limits, wherein might lie redresse of inconveniences thence arising. Six moneths were the time assigned for it's duration, and never was it lengthned, except for meer necessity, as might be instanced in Camillus, L. Papirius, and Fabius Maximus: for the perpetual Dictatorships of Sylla and Caesar were notorious violations of the Laws. And not onely the time but the place also was limited, it being unlawful for the Dictator to stir out of Italy, lest being out of sight, he should take advantage at the distance of place, to attempt some new matter; and this constitution was never violated but once whilst the old Commonwealth stood, by Attillius Collatinus. He was not to come on horse-back, but march continually on foot, to shew, saith Plutarch, that the Roman strength lay in the Legions, or rather to teach him humility. Now because in great Expeditions this could scarce be observed, he formally before his departure asked leave of the People that he might ride, as Livie informeth us. But those restrictions were inconsiderable, in respect of the Appeal which afterwards came to be made from him to the People. Festus in these words Optima Lex, saith, that first the power of the Magister Populi, or Dictator, was full or absolute, as that of Marcus Valerius; but afterwards an Appeal lay from this Magistrate to the People. Livie seemeth also to hold out the same thing, where he bringeth M. Fabius in behalf of his son thus speaking to L. Papirius the Dictator: Seeing that neither the authority of the Senate, nor mine age, which thou goest about to bereave of my son, neither the virtue and Nobility of the Master of the Horse-men named by thy self, prevaileth with thee; nor yet prayers and intreaties, which are wont to appease an enemy, and the anger of the gods: I appeal to the Tribunes of the People, and the People is self which I make our Judge, (seeing thou regardest not the judgment of the Army and Senate) which alone can do more than thy Dictatorship. I shall see whether thou wilt give place to that Appeal to which the Roman King Tullus Hostilius yielded. Hereupon the People assembled, and the Tribunes were present at the meeting. Papirius demerth neither the power of the one nor the other, but continueth resolute for the punishment of the Master of the Horse-men, who had fought in his absence contrary to his command, shewing how all discipline else would be destroyed. A way was found out to preserve the honour of both Offices, the power of People, Tribunes, and Dictator, with the strength of discipline. For the People betook it self to intreaties, and was seconded by the Tribunes. Whereupon the Dictator pardoned the party, granting his life to the request of those, who, as he confesseth, might have commanded it.

him.

Lib. 8.

29. At what time this Appeal was brought in, or how long it continued in force, seeing that Sylla and other Dictators made use of the old and absolute power, is uncertain. It is probable, that the People being overwitted in ratifying the Decree of the Senate (as Dionysius telleth us they were) grew sensible, how they had thereby given the power again out of their hands;

hands; it being lawfull for the Senate at any time when they should pretend a necessity, and that for the bridling of the People it self, to give order to the Consul to name a Dictator, and therefore resumed its antient power of Appellare, without which no lawlesse freedom could be enjoyed. But in the declining condition of the Commonwealth, when Dictators grew more imperious, their Soldiers more dissolute, and the Tribunes of the people especially more factious, an opportunity might be wanting for it to exert that right which as yet it had not given up to any other. If what Dionysius writeth of the Dictator's being approved by the people after the Consul's nomination be true, the State stood in lesse need of the Appeal; but it being not possible for a multitude never to mistake in its opinion of a person, this defect might at length experimentally be discovered, and thence a recourse had to that remedy which was ever certain whilst it could be applied. By these cautions and restrictions, with the modesty of the Romans, this Grand Office was for 400 years managed for the publick good, as it was accounted, till Sylla, and afterward Caesar, converted it into a Tyranny, as the multitude counted it, and rendred the very name thereof so odious, that after Caesar's death, in the 710 year of the Citie, when M. Antonius and P. Cornelius Dolabella were Consuls, a Law was made (from the former Consul called Lex Anonia) whereby it was for ever banished. The Dictator when he was Created made choice of one who had either been Consul or Prator, to be Magister Equitum, who, saith Varro, had chief power over the horse-men, and Adules (Criers, Beadles, or publick Messengers) as the Dictator had over the Roman people, whence he also was called Magister Populi. The rest, because they were of lesse value than these Magistri, were named Magistratus, as from albus Albatus. If the Dictator was absent, the Master of the horse-men executed his place in the Army, but if he present, he commanded the horse, yet so as to be obedient to the Dictator's orders, and not to fight, either contrary to, or without his command. In the second Punic War, M. Fabius Buleo was made Dictator for filling up the Senate, without a Master of horse-men. But he alleged, that he could not approve of two Dictators to be at the same time, nor a Dictator without a Master of horse-men, and having perfected his work on the same day laid down his Office.

De Ling.
Latina. lib. 4.
p. 22.

30. Concerning the time of the first Dictatorship, Authors differ in the space of two years, and do not full agree about the person. Dionysius, a grave, faithfull, and wary Author (by consent of the most learned sort of men) referreth it to the 255 year of the Citie; but Livy, and most Latine Authors assign it to the 253. Dionysius saith expressly, that T. Lartius was the first Dictator, being Consul that year. Livy saith it could not be certainly known from antient Authors who was the first, yet confesseth that the most antient mentioned Lartius, and upon good grounds approveth of their opinion rather than that which maketh M. Valerius the son of Marcus yet living, and Grand-son to Volusus the first of all, which Festus seemeth to follow. Livy mentioneth no other cause of the Original than a falling out with the Sabines, and the conspiracy of the 30 Latine Cities, putting off the Sedition till after the finishing of the Latine War; but as there can little hold be taken of one who uncertainly relateth matters; so no need would there have been of an absolute Authority for the Latine War, if no stir had been made in the Citie, all giving their names with alacrity, and obeying the Consuls, as in former Wars. And if the Consuls had been suspected to favour the cause of Lartius (as some wrote they were) then new ones might have been made in their rooms, nothing being prevalent to alter the ordinary form of Government, but a necessity of absolute power for a time; and no ordinary accident about War could make this necessity; so that compulsion must have been the end, and the taking away that help from the multitude, which was unalterably given to it against the Consuls by the Valerian Law. Thus might the Nobility, if they had had that duty, have seen cause to repent in time of their Kings banishment.

The Magister Equitum.

SECT. I.

T. Larginus the first Dictator.

31. T. Larginus, the first Dictator, having named Sp. Cassius for his Master of horse-men (who had born the Office of Consul in the 70th Olympiad) caused Axes to be carried before him with the Rods, as had been wont, till the time of Poplicola, before the chief Magistrates, both Kings and Consuls. Having with these & other Ensigns of power terrified the Seditious, he began the Census after the Pattern of Ser. Tullius, according to the Tribes, taking the names and ages of such as were Censied, and of Children. In a short space, fear of losing freedom of the Citie, and Estates, so prevailed, as 150700 of such as were ripe of age gave their names, which he distributed into four parts, whereof taking one to himself, he gave the rest to his Master of horse-men, and two others, one being to continue in the Citie for the defence thereof. This done, he sent some who underhand dealt with the several Latine Cities, and procured them to suspend the War, and make a Truce for a year, notwithstanding all that Mamilius and Sexus Tarquinius could do to the contrary. Then returned he home with the Army, and ere his 6 moneths were out, the Consuls being appointed, laid down, no Citizen being killed, banished, or otherwise chastized by any grievous punishment; which carriage was imitated by his Successors, untill the third age from that wherein we live, saith Dionysius. But in the time of our fathers, 400 years from the Dictatorship of Larginus, L. Cornelius Sylla first of all others behaved himself cruelly in this Office, so that the Romans conceived then what before they had cause to be ignorant of, that the Dictatorship was a Tyrannis.

The Latines overthrown at the Lake Regillus.

32. When the Truce betwixt the Latines and Romans was ended, both parties prepared for the War: The former were against their wills, 'tis said, drawn in by the interest of Mamilius; but the later with all cheerfulnesse imbraced the opportunity. The Romans thought fit a Dictator should be Created, and accordingly Virginus the Senior Consul named A. Posthumus his Colleague, who chose for Master of horse-men T. Ebutius Helva, and hasting his Levies, divided his Forces into four parts, whereof one he kept to himself, assigned the second to Virginus, the third to Ebutius, and the fourth to Sempronius, who therewith was to defend the Citie. News being come that the Latines had taken the Field, the Dictator with speed marched to the Lake Regillus (at this day called Il Lago di Santa Severa) in the Countrey of Tusculum, where he fortified his Camp against the Enemy, who as yet had not united his forces, & expected assistance from the Volsi. The Roman Army divided into three parts encompassed the Latines, who indeavoured to beat off Ebutius from an Hill he had seized on betwixt them and home; but he kept his ground in despite of them, and fortified himself. The Latines hereupon being hindered from all Provisions, resolved to fight: the Dictator at first was minded to end the War without blood, by famishing his Enemies, but understanding that the Volsi were expected within three dayes, changed his resolution. The right Wing of the Latines was led by Mamilius, the left by Sexus Tarquinius, and the middle battel by Titus Tarquinius his other son. On the other side against Mamilius stood Virginus, Ebutius was opposite in the right Wing to Sexus Tarquinius, and the Dictator led the middle battel against Titus, and the Roman Exiles. The Romans brought into the field 24000 foot & 1000 horse, but the Latines 40000 foot and 3000 horse. When they joyned, both parties missed of their expectation; for the one trusting to their numbers, and the other to their valour, thought to bear all down before them. The Dictator gave the first opportunity of victory by over-powering Titus, after which, though Mamilius and Sexus omitted nothing requisite to valiant and able Captains, yet both losing their lives, their followers were discouraged and overthrown; scarce 10000 escaping home of the whole number. Of the Romans fell M. Valerius, whose dead body his two Nephews by his brother Poplicola, Publius and Marcus, endeavouring to get off, were also slain in the attempt.

33. After the fight, the Volsi, whom the Latines had expected, arrived at the Camp, which seeing full of dead bodies, and learning the issue of the battel, some of them were for falling on the Romans now weary; but another other party prevailed to send Messengers to the Dictator, to tell him they came to his assistance, thereby to ingratiate themselves with the Conquerors. But the Dictator convinced them of falshood by their Letters which he had intercepted, and giving leave to the Messengers to return, whom the multitude would have pulled in pieces, resolved on the morrow to fall on them; but in the night they deserted their Camp and fled. From the place of this action the Dictator obtained the surname of Rhegillus.

The Latines sent to deprecate the anger of the Roman State, laying all the blame upon their Nobility. The Ambassadors managed their work with such earnestness and humility (casting themselves at the Feet of the Senate, and making great lamentations) that the motion of Largius prevailed in their behalf for the former League to be renewed. This was the end of the War which in behalf of the Tarquins had been carried on for fourteen years: Tarquinius himself being onely left behind of all his stock, now almost ninety years old, for that the Latines, Hebruscan, and Sabines, refused to harbour him, as also all other neighbouring Cities which were free, went into Campania to Aristodemus the Prince of Cume, with whom he shortly after died. Of the man we may judge charitably, because his story was onely related to posterity by his bitter Enemies. However, his banishment our religion must censure as rebellion. And such were the stirs, seditions and tumults afterwards, and so many changes and rechanges, as if the Reader seriously consider them, he will see that the Romans suffered much for want of Monarchy, and the contrary Government did not contribute to their happiness. That this may appear, he hath here a fuller view of their changes than in any other modern Writer.

Great stirs
in the Citie

34. The Romans now freed from this War, fell into a grievous sedition in the Citie, the Courts of Justice being again opened by the Senate, and the processe against debtors revived. The Plebeians alleged they were not able to pay their debts, by reason of their losses sustained in the late Wars through want of tillage, and plundering of their Cattel by the Enemy. Their Creditors replied, that these losses had also befallen them, which made the remission of the debts impossible; and so neither sort would yield at all, but many tumults were raised, wherein the parties did not abstain from blows. Posthumius the Dictator perceiving some expedition to be necessary for the quiet of the Citie, created Consuls for the following year, and laid down his Office. The Consuls were Appius Claudius the Sabine, and P. Servilius Priscus, who being of the Dictators mind as to the War, resolved to go out against the Volsi, who had assisted the Latines against the State, and now were making new preparations for War; when they came to make Levies none of the Plebeians would give their names, complaining that they having already undergone the heat, and danger of the War, both for liberty and dominion, they were by their fellow Citizens at home kept in bondage (it being the custom then for Creditors to make use of them as Slaves bound in fetters) and many times cruelly beaten, till they could pay their debts. They cried out, that the security of the common sort was more provided for in War, and amongst their Enemies, than in peace, and with their friends. The disagreement of the Consuls amongst themselves added to the present distemper; Servilius being willing to comply something with the desire of the poor, but Appius inveighing against them with great bitterness, and earnestly urging force and rigour to be the most suitable means for appeasing these tumults. The Senate was forced to betake it self to the popularitie of Servilius, who with fair words drew the people out against the Sabines, and when he had by this good service deserved a Triumph, the honour was denied him through the suggestions of his Colleague to the Fathers, for that by bearing with the multitude he impaired the Dignity of their Order.

Diverted by War.

35. After the finishing of the War the common sort thought again of their own concerns, and expecting performance of what Servilius had promised, Appius exacted the payment of debts as rigorously as ever: This doubled doubled the people's rage, and made them carry on all things by force, so that they rescued their Companions out of the hands of Sargeants, and holding secret councils by night, denied to the succeeding Consuls to take Arms, till they could have a relaxation of their burthens. This putting the Senate to a stand, Appius still urged that nothing was to be granted to the rabble, and procured a Dictator to be created. When most looked upon him as fittest for the time, the Consuls judged quite otherwise, and made choice of M. Valerius the brother of Publius, and son of Volesus, a popular man, being perswaded that the terror of the Office alone would do the work, and that a man of mild temper would best manage it. The Dictator promised the People, in case they would freely follow him, not onely what they justly required concerning their debts, but other rewards also, and by this means lifted ten Legions against the Volschi, Aequi, and Sabines, who were all up in Arms, which being brought under, he divided amongst his soldiers some grounds taken from the Volschi, but requesting of the Senate, that his and their promise might be made good, was checked for his love to the multitude, and because he was an old man above 70, being unfit as he said to contend, he laid down his Office. The People hereat much enraged, kept private meetings, and consulted how to separate themselves from the Patritians, which when the Senate perceived, they gave order to the Consuls not to disband the Armies, pretending that the Sabines and Aequi had conspired against Rome. The Soldiers being bound by the Oath taken at their listing (called by them Sacramentum, and ever strongly observed) could not forsake their Standards, but the Consuls having their Camps near to each other, they all went into one by the advice of one Sicinius Bellulus, and taking away the Ensignes from the Consuls, departed to the Mount called afterwards Mons Sacer, lying three miles from the City beyond the River Aniene, now called Taverne.

The first separation of the Commons.

36. Notice hereof being brought into the City, filled all places with marvelous tumults. The Patritians were in great fear lest War should be made upon them; the Plebeians grew exceeding high, and many flocked to the Army, though the other hindered it as much as possible. The Fathers had also great strife amongst themselves, while some pleaded for the multitude, and others would hear of nothing but carrying the matter through by strong hand. But the former sort prevailed to send a message to the Armies, desiring them to return home; promising that for the future all things should be forgot, and the Senate would be ready to reward their faithfulness and serviceableness to their Country; withall, the Ambassadors had it in charge to know the utmost of their desires. To the message nothing would be returned but disdainful words, and high complaints, something mixed with threatening language, which more grievously afflicted the Fathers, not knowing what way to procure a reconciliation; and now would not such as they had by their authority and interest hitherto retained in the City, be with-holden from going to the Army. The time for creation of new Consuls was now at hand. The old ones appointing the Comitia, no Candidates (so called because they appeared in white garments) would stand for the Office, nor any accept of it, till at length the Consuls appointed by their sole authority Posthumus Cominius, and Sp. Cassius, who had born it before, and were equally in favour with the Nobility and Commons. They having entred on the Calends of September (sooner than usual) in the 72 Olympiad (wherein Tesicrates of Crerone was Victor, and Diognetes Archon) first of all consulted the Senate about the return of the Commons. Agrippa Menenius a man of great wisdom and temper, being first asked his opinion, by all means possible exhorted the Fathers to a compofure. He shewed what necessity there was of it in regard of the Roman Dominion, which could not be either preserved or increased without the inferiour sort of People, and made it clear, that they could not expect to have any of better temper than the present were, for as much as all, whosoever they were, who by their labour and blood obtained power and Sovereignty for the City, would expect to be sharers in it's advantages.

tages. He pressed the danger they were now in from their Enemies round about, and having used other motives, concluded with his advice, that they would send messengers with full power to treat and conclude what they should find convenient, without any more consulting the Senate.

37. After Menenius spake M. Valerius, and upbraided the Senate for not giving him credit when he foretold these distempers, He advised them to cure the wound while it might be healed, shewed what reason the Commons had to be concerned more of late, because of the Dictatorship, which took from them their former Appeal, as also for that the Senate had denied the honour of triumph to Servilius when they desired it for him, because he was suspected to favour them, and for that neither he, the Consul, nor he himself the Dictator, could at all profit them in what had been promised. He inveighed against the avarice and cruelty of creditors, and particularly fell foul upon Appius for his rigour, and raising a Faction, which if others were not wise to prevent, would utterly destroy the Commonwealth. Lastly, he commended the advice of Menenius, and desired it might speedily be executed, so as whatever the Commons required might be granted. Appius a man of an high spirit, most studious of the Patrician dignity, and also of a sober and venerable carriage, being asked his opinion next, in excuse of himself recriminated Valerius. With great animosity he noted the ambition and senselessness of the multitude, admiring that any of the Fathers should be so absurd, as having denied remission of debts to them when friends, would grant it to them now Enemies, who would not * rest here, but require also a communication of honours, and what not? so that at length the power would come into the hands of the rabble, and the Commonwealth degenerate into a Democracy. He lessened, or rather endeavoured to remove, the danger which threatened either from the Armies revolt, or the hostility of old Enemies. He endeavoured to perswade them, that they were able enough to reduce them by force, having their wives and children in the City; and alleging for further confirmation of this, that the multitude were without any persons of good conduct, whereas the Patrician order abounded with experienced commanders, concluded with this advice, neither to send any message to them, nor remit them their debts, nor do any other thing which might shew the least fear or trouble: If they would lay down their Arms and returning into the City, submit to the Senate, then moderately to determine concerning them; seeing that all fools, especially the Vulgar, are insolent against such as condescend, but cowardly towards those that resolutely demean themselves.

of Appius con-

rabble.

38. The wise speech of Appius so inflamed those of his party, especially the younger sort, that nothing could be determined for the heat of contention. This put the Consuls upon dismissing the Senate for that time, admonishing the younger sort to carry themselves more respectfully and modestly for the time to come, or else they would neither use them as Advisers nor Judges, but prefer a Law for limiting a certain age for Senators. The graver men they exhorted also to concord, letting them know they had a way to end the controversy, by referring the matter to the decision of the People, which had right to judge of it, as a case about Peace and War. At the next meeting the ancient men were of the same opinion as formerly, but the younger modestly referred themselves to whatsoever they should determine; so that the major part by far, being wearied with the cries and solicitations of those who had relations in the Army, rather than any reason, notwithstanding Appius stuck close to his former resolution, resolved to follow the advice of Menenius, who with nine others were commissioned with full power, both by Senate and People, to compose the difference. At first the offers of the Commissioners could not be heard through the instigation of two cunning and turbulent fellows, Sicinius, and L. Junius, who conceited of his abilities, affected the name of Brutus also. Menenius, to give full satisfaction, promised that such as were unable to pay their debts, should be discharged both from obligation and imprisonment, and for the time to come matters of this nature should be ordered by the joyned consent both of People and Senate.

SECT. I.

Then adding the Fable of the several members falling out with the belly, as consuming all which they provided, and thence the ruine and decay of the whole body, he so improved it to the present occasion, likening the Senate to the belly (which digesterh and distributerh sustenance to all the rest, though they provide it) that the whole multitude convinced of the necessity of Union, cried out, He should lead them home without delay.

39. Little wanted of their departure without any other security than the bare word of the Commissioners. But Junius Brutus a Plebeian formerly mentioned with-held them, saying, that they were gratefully to acknowledge the kind offers of the Senate; but whereas some men of tyrannical spirits might reserve their anger to a convenient opportunity, the Commons wanted such good security for the time to come, as might defend them from the unreasonable malice of great ones, and he moved, that they might have certain Officers created yearly out of their own bodie, whose power should onely be to give relief to such Plebeians as were injured, and suffer none to be defrauded of their right: and therefore not to resist the Consuls, as some thought. This being received by the multitude with great approbation, was insisted on to Menenius, and his fellows, who thought not good to admit of a matter of such large consequence, without leave from the Senate, and demanded time to know the pleasure thereof. The Consuls reporting the matter, Valerius thought this favour was to be granted to the Commons, and, though Appius opposed it earnestly, crying out, calling their gods to witnesse, and truly foretelling what calamities they would bring upon the Commonwealth, yet the major part inclining to Peace, it was caried for them, and the Commissioners were sent back with the resolution of the house. The Commons by the advice of Menenius, first sent to take from the Senate a religious confirmation of this privilege, and afterwards in the Assembly of the Curia elected L. Junius Brutus, and C. Sicinius Bellutus, to whom they afterwards joyned C. and P. Licinius, and Sp. Icilius Ruga. These five first entred this new Office on the fourth of the Ides of December, according to the History and computation of Dionysius, sixteen years after the expulsion of Tarquin.

40. These Officers were called Tribuni Plebis, there having been from the beginning other Tribunes in the City named Tribuni Celerum, so called from the Peoples being divided into three parts at that time, from which so many were sent into the Army, as (a) Varro and (b) Pomponius derive the word; or because they were elected by the Tribes, or oversaw them, as others. Varro seemeth to hold that the Tribuni Plebis were called Tribunos, because they were first made of the Tribunes or Colonels of the Soldiers. Livie nameth C. Licinius, and L. Albinus, for the first two, to whom were shortly after added three more, viz. Sicinius, the Author of the departure, and two others, concerning which, saith he, Authors differ. In the 297 year of the City five more were added, and this number of ten so continued. As these Officers were elected by the Commons, so ever out of their body, except where we read in Livie (in his third Book) of two Patricians; Nay most commonly of the lower sort, till a Law ordained that they should be created out of the Senate; that is, out of such Plebeians as were admitted into the Senate. What time this Law was preferred, cannot certainly be discovered. (c) Appian saith, it is not certain whether Sylla did it. It should appear from (d) Gellius, that there passed a Plebisiscium or Decree of the People, for this purpose, called Plebisiscium Atinium; but what Atinius this should be is also obscure, there being one P. Atinius Tribune of the Commons when Julius Caesar and Bibulus were Consuls. As concerning their power, (e) Cicero saith, they were opposed against the Consuls: but this is not true, the occasion of their making not rising from the Consuls. At the beginning their power was onely to relieve the oppressed, as a shield to keep off evil, and not as a weapon to inflict it. They nulled the unjust (as they accounted them) Decrees, and Commands of the Senate and Magistrates; and to shew their readinesse to protect the meanest,

They interposed by this one word Veto solemnly pronounced. They procured themselves afterward to be accounted Sacro-sancti, so as by a Law confirmed with an Oath, none might compel a Tribune to do any thing, as one of the vulgar, neither strike, nor command him to be beaten; neither kill, nor command him to be killed. If any did contrary, he was to be held as Sacer, and his goods being Confiscated unto Ceres, it should be lawfull for any to kill him. And lest afterwards the people should abrogate this Law, they made all the Citizens take the most solemn Oath that could be devised, both for themselves and posterity, to preserve it for ever inviolable, as (k) Dionysius writeth, who hath also exemplified the Law it self. To this (l) Cicero addeth, that they were not onely by sacred Laws fortified against Force and Arms, but against words also, and interruption of speech.

power.

41. But as their power of Interposing was most powerfull against Consuls and Senate, so also against themselves; the dissent of one man being sufficient to hinder whatever all his Collegues designed. This appeareth to have been the onely constant effectual means for moderation of that power which afterwards they assumed, when the Patricians could prevail with one of the College to interpose. By that awe which their Sacro-sanct Magistracy struck into all men, improved through their prompt boldnesse (very common in men of meanest condition) they took advantage to enlarge their bounds. * Valerius Maximus writeth, that at first it was not lawfull for them to enter into the Senate, but they had seats placed before the door, where examining the Decrees of the Fathers, such of them as they suffered to passe they signed with the letter T. But nothing in Dionysius is more common than their speaking in the Senate, and their contentions with the Members thereof in that very place at the very time, and that in the infancy of their Office. However, these fellows at first presumed not to Tyrannise and disturb all, as afterwards they did, they presumed not at first to assemble the Senate, which afterward they did in the 277 year of the Citie, & in processe of time to dismiss it also, when called by another. Within a small time they assembled the people, preferred Laws, executed their sawcy Decrees against the Magistrates themselves, commanding the Consuls to be carried to prison, (especially after the enacting of the Hortensian Law, whereby the Plebiscita obliged the whole Roman people) for that they were the chief Officers of the Commons.

42. Great were the Seditious and Tumults, which turbulent spirits backed with such liberty, stirred up; so as notwithstanding their first end was to preserve right, Lucan rightly termeth them Turbantes jura. Sylla was the first that bridled their extravagancy, by depriving them of liberty to prefer Laws, to make Orations, and obtain any Office of Magistracy; but after his death Aurelius Cottia by a new Law restored the later privilege to them, and all the rest they recovered when Pompey and M. Crassus were Consuls. Their power thus recovered they kept till the Emperours swallowed it up themselves, and left them little more than a name, which continued till the time of Constantine. As for the Ensigns of their Office, they wore not the Prætecta, had no Lictors or Sargeants, neither used they a Curule Chair; onely a sort of Beadle, called Viator, went before them. For want of these Ceremonies, as because they entred not at the beginning of the year, and laid not down their Office upon the Creation of a Dictator, which others did, Plutarch writeth that some held them to be no Magistrates, but rather a curb and restraint to such. Lastly, besides these Tribunes, and the Tribuni Celerum formerly mentioned, there were afterwards many other sorts, as Tribuni Militum, and Tribuni Aerarii, during the Commonwealth: under the Emperours are found Tribunus Voluptatum, Tribunus Matrimoniorum, Tribunus Chartariorum, Tribunus Provinciarum, Tribunus Fori, and Tribunus created.

43. The Commons having got from the Senate a confirmation of the Office of Tribunes, obtained further, that they might yearly chuse out of their own body two, to be as Ministers to these Officers; to Judge certain causes referred to them from the Tribunes, take care of publick buildings and provisions. These were first called the Ministers and Assistants of the Tribunes; but afterward saith Dionysius from one of their Duties had the name of Ædiles. Many things of great consequence were committed to their trust, being very much like to the Agoranomi amongst the Greeks. Festus acknowledging that in the beginning Ædiles was a Magistrate who took care both of publick and private buildings, yet saith he was so called, quod facilius ad eum plebis aditus esset. Truer is the derivation which Varro giveth, agreeable to that of Dionysius; that they were named Ædiles, from Ædes the buildings, of which they took care, or those particularly, wherein the Ple-biscita were kept, of which they had the over-sight. This later Etymology is rendred by Pomponius, who in his second book of the Original of Law, describing the several Offices of Magistracy, maketh the end of the constitution of the Ædiles to have been, that they might take care of that house where the Decrees of the people were laid up. Whence soever the word was derived it came out of Latium, being a name of certain Magistrates in the Latine Towns, as was also Dictator and Dumvir, as some observe out of Spartianus. To these Ædiles Plebis, who were instituted in the 271 year of the Citie, at the same time with the Tribunes, were added two more out of the Patritian order 117 years after, called for distinction Ædiles Cu-rules, because they used the Curule Chair, whereas the other onely sat on Benches, as the Tribunes and Quæstors. The occasion of creating those shall be shewn in its place, the end was onely then for celebrating of Games.

Their Office.

44. This number continued till the time of C. Julius Caesar, who in the 710 year of the Citie added two more, whom he would have created also out of the Patritians. They were called (a) Cereales from Ceres, being appointed to take care of, and make provision for Corn. This number of six thus distinguished, continued till the time of Constantine, as is probably conjectured, and were as most other Offices of Magistracy taken away by him.
The Ædiles, saith (b) Cicero, are the Curators of the Citie, of provisions, and of solemn Games. Of the Citie, because they looked to publick works and Temples; made provision against fires (which Augustus seemeth to have charged upon them saith Lipsius) had inspection over Funerals, and such like Rites of smaller moment; over Marriages and Adulteries, Baths, Aqueducts, Sinks, and Streets, both for repairing and cleansing of them. Of Provisions, for that they had the over-sight of all things to be sold, men, and other creatures, determining, judging, and censuring by their words and edicts. Of solemn Games, and onely solemn (not votive and private ones) as the Ludi Florales, Circenses, Megalenses, Romani, &c. Sometimes at their own charge they made these shews, and ever examined the Fables written before they were acted. And (whether from this inspection of Play-books it came or no is uncertain) they seem to have been Licensers and Judges of other writings, being ordered by a Decree of the Senate, as (c) Tacitus telleth us, to burn the Papers of Cremutius Cordus. It is further (d) observed, that the Generals when they returned home after some victory, delivered up the Corn and Provisions which had been made prize, to them, as the Captives to the Prætor, and the money to the Quæstor. All such Victuallers as offended against the Laws, as also Monopolizers and others that transgressed in this kind, they accused to the people, and with the Fines celebrated Games, made Presents to their gods, or some publick works. Lastly, 'tis observed, that they took care that none but Roman gods, and those after the Roman manner onely, should be worshipped.

War with the Volsci.

45. But, to return to the story, the rabble having obtained these Officers, willingly gave their names to the Expedition against the Volsci, under conduct of Posthumius Cominius the Consul. He took Longula and Polustia with no great difficulty, and presently laid siege to Corioli a strongly fortified Town, and the head of the Nation. The Antiates coming to the relief of this place, he left part of the Army to continue their siege under the Command of Titus Largius, and with the other went to give them battle. Largius attempting to storm the Town, the Inhabitants sallied out, and charged the Romans so furiously, that they forced them back into their Camp: all but a few whom C. Marcus, a Patrician of great Nobility, and greater Valour, kept about him. This Marcus with so small a Company received the violence of the Enemy, and doing great execution, forced him at length into the Town, and following himself rushed in with him, whereat the besieged were so affrighted, that not considering their own numbers, they fled to the contrary part of the Citie, and suffered him to let in the rest of the Army. When the Soldiers now fell to plunder, he suffered them not, but hastened to the battle to help the Consul, and with the good news of his success to cheer the Army.

Marcus.

46. He desired of Cominius that he might be suffered with his men to fight against the middle battle, wherein the chief strength of the Enemies lay, which obtaining, he shewed there more valour than formerly, and was the greatest cause of the victory. The day following the Consul gave him extraordinary commendations, and a good share of booty before it came to be divided amongst the Soldiers; but he would accept of nothing except an horse, which gained him greater honour from the whole Army, and moved Posthumius to bestow the surname of Coriolanus upon him for his incomparable valour shewn at that place. The Volsci were by this overthrow forced to submission, and made their peace. This year was the League of Amity and Confederacy renewed with the Latines with all cheerfulness, because they had been faithful in the late Sedition and War, and had sent to congratulate for the peace made betwixt Nobility and Commons. The Senate for this Civil Union decreed supplications or thanks to their gods, a third feria, or Holy day, to be added to the other two Latine Feria, whereof Tarquinius had dedicated one, when he Conquered Hetruria, and the People the other after the banishment of Tarquinius. In this Consulship died also Agrippa Menenius, whom the People out of gratitude resolved to bury at the publick charge, every man contributing something, because he died poor, and when the Senate would needs defray the charge out of the Treasury, they bestowed the money upon his Children. Now also the Census being celebrated above 110000 heads were Censd.
